N this generall joy of affectionate and loyall subjects, testissed by their frequent confluence from all parts, longing for nothing so much as the sull fruition of that beautifull Star, which lately upon the souting in of evening with us after our long Summers day, immediately by his radiant beames maintained still a twilight from the North, and within some few houres appeared bright shining above our Horizon, suffering neither the dark night and consused Chaos of Anarchy to overspred and subvert, nor the turbulent tempests and

Vouch (a) therefore, my dear Lord and dread Soveraign, to accept that now at my hands, whole and entire, which in part Trajanus the best Roman Emperonr that ever was, received sometime from the first Authour and Stock father himfelf: Protest the same in English bahit, whom in French after Augot Dedicated to the late most Christian King: and deign unto her notes a favour and grace, than her younger Sister, to wit, the History or Parallele Lives, bath already obtained: which being transforred out of France into England by that worth Knight Sir Thomas North our Country wan, was katronized by our late Soveraign Lady of samous memory Elizabeth. And the rather, for that considering the prerogative of birth-right, and the same accompanyed with more variety and depth of knowledge, I may be bold to pronounce as much in her commendation, as the Poet wrote of Jupices in comparison of his brother Neptune:

These regards, albeit they were sufficient motives mahemselves to induce me, for to attempt none other Paironage than the Name of my Liege Lord so gracious ; nor to submit my labours to the censure of any person, before a King so judicious : yet was I more animated to enterprise the same, by the former experience that I had of a Princes benignity in that behalf: what time as I consecrated my Enclish Translation of the Roman History written by Titus Livius, unto the immortall memory of the faid Noble and renowned Queen. OF THE NURTURE AND EDUCATION OF CHILDREN

The Summary.

ro is athaiae.is ar.il..ora ylle vog A

He very title of this Treatife discoveresh sufficiently the intention of the Author; and who lover he was their idealed the Model and mixt worker of his into one entires Volume, what well advised, and had great reason to crange this presipen Disconfigure to the first and formost place: For unless one minds be framed unto vertue from our intention and heart of the configuration of the

the power, and essent speces;
Moreover, in this Treasse he provesh first of all That the generation of Infantioughe in no wife to be defaused with the blot either of Adultery or Drunkennesses. Then, he entreth into a discourse of their Education: and after he hat blowed, that Nature, Reason, and Usage ought to concur in their Education: their caucation: and after we nathprowed, that Nature, Keajon, and Mage ought to concur in their infruction, the teacheth how and by whom they floud be not treed, brought up and taught, where here-proveth flourly the floath ignorance and avarice of fome tailers. And the bester to declare the exception of the fe benefits, namely, good infruction, knowledge and verine, which the flud of Philosophy doth promile and teach, he compared to fe sure with all the greatest goods of the world: and so confequently fetteth down what vices especially they are to some and avoid, who would be capable of sincere and true literature.

But before he proceedeth further, he describeth and limiteth how fur forth children well borne and a god prentage (hould be urged and social by compulsion: deciphering briefly the praise of morall Philosophy: and concluding withall. That the manishlessed with both helpfuls to his neighbour as is becommeth, and alogood unto himsself. All these points above rehearsed, when he hash enriched and embelished with smittendes; examples, apophibetiques, and such like ormanents, he propounded divers visite printent to be institution of young children which done, he pass throws tender childhood evoyouthall age showing what government there oughts to be of young ment. In from whom, he benished and chaleto fluterers especially, and for a shall conclusion discourses for from whom, he benished and the good example that they are to vive unto their Children. the good example that they are to give unto their Children.

The Education of Children.

Oralmuch as we are to confider what may be faid as touching the Education of children free borne and descended from gentle bloud, how and by what discipline they may become honest and vertuous, we shall perhaps treat hereof the better, if we begin at their very generation and nativity. First and somost therefore, I would advise those who desire to be the fathers of such children, as may live another day in honour and reputation among men, not to match themselves and meddle with light women, common Courtizans I mean, or private Concubines. For a reproach this is that followeth a man all the daies of his life, and a shameproach this is that solower is immain the cases of missie, and which so in the solower is the solower in the solower is there any one thing that preferrach it selfemore readily unto his deverage, and sooker is in their mouth when they are disposed to checkstaunfand revile, than to twit him with such parentage, in which regard, withy said the Poer Enright: When as the ground is not well laid

At first for our nativity; With parents fault, men will upbraid ... Both us and our posterity.

A goodly treasure then have they who are well and honeftly borne, when in the confidence and affurance thereof they may be bold to beare their heads aloft, and speake their minds frankly wherefoever they come: and verily they of all others are to make the greatest account of this wherefoever they come: and verily they of all others are to make the greatest account of this beffing who wish to have faire iffue of their bodies lawfully begotten. Certain, a thing it is that ordinarily daument and casteth down the heart of man, when he is privy to the basenesse of his birth, and knoweth ome defeet, blemith, and imperfection by his parents. Most truly therefore, and to the purpose right fitly spake the same Poet:

The privity to fathers vice Or mathers fault reproachable, Will him debase, who otherwise Is haughty flout and commendable.

Whereas contrariwife, they that are known to be the children of noble and worthy parents, bearethemselves highly, and are fill of stomack and generosty. In which conceit and losty spirit is is reported, that Diaphania the son of Themisacles, was wont to say, and that in the hearing of many, That what soever pleased him, the same also the people of Athens thought well of: for, that which I would have done, quoth he, my mother likewile faith Yeaunto it: what my motheis mind (tands to, Themispecles my father will not gain lay it: and look what likes Themispecles she Athenians all are will contented the rewith. Where by the way, the magnanimity, and brave mind of the Lacedemonians is highly to be praifed, who condemned their King Archidamus in a great fine of money, for that he could find in his heart to espouse a wife of little stature, alleading therewith a good reason: Becanse, say they, his meaning is to get, not a breed of Kings, but Dwarf-kings, or divers Kings, to reigne over us.

Well, upon this first advertisement concerning children, there dependent another, which they who wrote before us of the like argument, forgat not to fet down; and what is that ? namely, That they who for procreation of children will come neare unto women, ought to meddle with them either upon empty stomacks, and before they have drunke any wine at all, or at leastwife, after they have taken their wine in measure, and soberly: for such will prove commonly winebibbers and drunkards who were engendred when their fathers were drunken: according to that which Diegener laid upon a time unto a youth whom he saw beside himselfe, and sar overseene with drinke: my lad, quoth he, thy father gat thee when he was drunke. And thus much may suffice for the generation of children.

As touching their nurture and education, whereof now I am to discourse: That which we are wont generally to fay of all Arts and Sciences, the same we may be bold to pronounce of vertue, to wit that to the accomplishment thereof, and to make a man perfectly vertuous, three things ought to concur. Nature, Reason, and Ulage. By Reason, I understand doctrine and precepts: by usage exercise and practice. The first beginnings we have from Nature; progresse and proceeding come by teaching and inflruction: exercise and practise is performed by diligence: And all three together bring forth the height of perfection. If any one of these faile, it cannot otherwise be, but share true also should have her desect and be maimed: For Nature without learning is blind: Doctrire wanting the gift of nature is desective; and exercise void of the other twaine, imperfect. And verily it fareth in this case much like as in Husbandry and tillage of the earth. For first and formost requisite it is, that the ground be good: Secondly, that the Husbandman be skilfull 3 and in the third place, that the feed be cleane and well chosen. Semblably, Nature resembleth the foile: the Master who teacheth, representeth the labouring Husbandman; and last of all, the rules, precepts, admonitions, and examples are compared to the feed. All these good means (Idare with confidence avouch) met together, and inspired their power into the minds of these worthy personages, who throughout the world are so renowned, Pythagoras I meane, Societies, Plato, and all the red who have attained to a memorable name and immortal glory. Blessed then is that man and entirely beloved of the gods, whose hap it is by their favour and grace to be turnished with all three. Now if any one be of this opinion, that those who are not endued with the gift of naturall wit, and yet have the helps of true infirmation and diligent exercise to the attaining of vertue, cannot by this meanes recover and repaire the foresaid defect: Know he, that he is much deceived, and to say more truly, quite out of the way: for as idlenesse and corrupt the goodnesse of nature: so, the industry and diligence of good et adition supplieth the detect, and correcteth the detault thereof. Idle and floathfull persons (we see) are not able to compafie the things that be easie: whereas contrariwise by study and travell, the greatest difficulties are atchieved. Moreover, of what efficacy, and execution, diligence and labour is, a man may easily know by fundry effects that are daily observed. For we do evidently perceive that drops of water falling upon the hard rock do eate the fame hollow: Iron and brafs we fee to weare and confume only by continuallhandling: The fellies in Chariot wheels, which by labour are bended and curbed, will not returne and be reduced againe, do what you can, to their former ftreightnesse: Like as it is impossible by any advice to set straight the crooked flaves that Stage-players go withall. And evident it is, that whatfoever against nature is by force and labour changed and redreffed becommeth much better and more interhanthole things that continge in their own kind. But, are these the things only wherein appeareth the power of study and diligence? No verily. For there are an infinite number of other experiments, which prove the fame most clearely. Is there a peece of ground naturally good? Let it lie neglected, it becommeth wild and barren: Yea, and the more rich and fertile that it is of it selfe, the more waste and muitlefle it proveth for want of tillage and husbandry. Contrariwite, you shall see another plot hard, rough, and more stony than it should be: which by good ordering and the carefull hand of the husbandman foon bringeth forth faire and goodly fruit. Againe, what trees are there which will not twine, grow crooked, and prove fruitleffe, if good heed be not taken unto them? Whereas, if due regard be had, and that carefulnesse employed about them which becommeth, they beare fruit, and yould the same ripe in due season. Is there any body so sound and able, but by neglect, riot, delicacy, and an evill habit or custome it will grow dull, seeble and unlustic, yea, and fall into a misliking and consumption? On the other side, what complexion is there so faint and weake, which is not brought to great strength and perfection in the end by continual travell and ordinary exercises? Are there any horses in the world, which if they be well handled and broken while they are colts, will not prove gentle in the end, and fuffer themselves easily to be mounted and manned? Contrariwife, let them remaine untained in their youth, firong-headed, Hiffe-necked and unruly will they be alwaies after, and never fit for fervice. And why thould we marvell at theic and such like matters, confidering that many of the most lavage and cruell beatls that be, are made gentle and familiar, yea, and brought to hand by labour and paines taken about them? Well faid therefore that Theffalian, wholeever he was, who being demanded, which The falians of all others were most dull and softest of spirit, Answered thus, Even they that have given over warfare. But what need we to stand longer upon this point? For certaine it is that our manners and conditions are qualities imprinted in us by tract and continuance of time: and wholoever faith; that * Morall vertues are gotten by custome, in my conceit speaketh not amisse, * Grass milist. but to very great purpole. And therefore with one example and no more produced by Lycinillustrates as touching this mater, I will knit up and conclude my discourse thereof. Lycingus, him I illustrates 716 meane who established the Laws of the Lacedemonians took two whiches of one litter, and com- 1620. maing both from the same fire and damme: Those he caused to be notifified and brought up diverfly, and unlike one to the other; that as the one proved a greedy and ravenous cur, and full of threwd turnes: fo the other was given to hunting, and minded nothing but to quest and follow the game. Now upon a certaine dayafterwards, when the Lacedamonians were met together in a frequent Affembly, he spake unto them in this manner, My Maffers, Citizens of Laordamon, Of what importance to engender vertue in the heart of man, custome, nurture, discipline and education is, I will prejently shew unto you by an evident demonstration: and with that he brought forth in the fight of them all thole two whelps, and fet directly before them a great platter of fops in broth, and therewish let loofe allo a livehare: but behold, one of them followed immediately after the hare, but the other ran thraight to flap in the platter aforesaid. The Lacedamonians wift not what to make of this, nor to what purpose he shewed unto them theletwo dogs beforefaid untill he brake out into this speech. These two dogs (quoth he) had one damme, and the same fire but being bred and brought up diversly see how the one is become agreedigut, and the other a kind hound. And thus much may ferve as touching custome and diverfity of education.

It were meet now in the next place to treat of the feeding and nourifhing of Infants newly borne. I hold it therefore convenient that mothers reare their babes, and luckle them with their own breafts: For feed them they will with greater affection, with more care and diligence, as loving them inwardly, and (as the Proverbe faith) from their tender nailes, whereas milch nurfes and foster-mothers carry not so kind a heart unto their numelings, but rather a fained and counterfeit affection, as being mercenary and loving them indeed for hire only and reward. Furthermore, even nature her felfe is sufficient to prove, that mothers ought to suckle and nourish those whom they have borne and brought into the world; Forto this end hath she given to every living creature that bringeth forth young the food of milke: and in great wildome the divine providence hath furnished a woman with two teats for this purpole, that if happily she should be delivered of two twins at once, she might likewise have two fountaines of milke to yeeld nourishment for them both. Moreover, by this meanes more kind and loving they will be unto their children: and verily not without great reason: For this fellowship in feeding together is a bond that knitteth, or rather a wrelt that ftraineth and ftretcheth benevolence to the utmost. The experience whereof we may see even in the very brute and wilde beasts, which hardly are parted from their company, with whom they have been nourished, but fill they lowe and mowe after them. Mothers therefore (as I have faid) ought especially to endeavour and do their best for to be nurses of their own children, if it be possible. But in case they cannot, by reason either of some bodily infirmity and indisposition that way, (for so it may fall out) or that they have a defire, and do make haffe to be with child againe, and to have more children : then a carefull eye and good regard would be had not to entertaine tho efor nurses and governesses that come next to hand, but to make choise of the very best and most honest that they can come by, and namely, for faire conditions and good behaviour, to choose Greekish women before any other. For like as the members and limbs of little Infants, fo foon as ever they be borne, are of neceffity to be formed and fashioned, that afterwards they may grow straight and not crooked: evenio, at the very first their hearts and manners ought to be framed and set in order: For this first age of childhood is moist and soft, apt to receive any impression: whiles the heart is tender every lesson may be soon instilled into it, and quickly will take hold, whereas hard things are not to eate to be wrought and made foft. And as Signets or Seales will quickly fet a print upon foft wax; fo the tender hearts of young children take readily the impression of whatsoever is taught them. In which regard, Plato, that heavenly and divine Philosopher, seemeth unto me to have given a wife admonition for nuries, when he warned them not to tell foolish tales, nortouse vain speeches inconsiderately in the hearing of young infants, for feare lest at the first their minds might apprehend folly and conceive corrupt opinions. Semblably the Poet Phocylides feemeth to deliver tage counsell in this behalfe, when he faith:

A childof young andtender age Ought to be taught things good and sage.

Neither is this precept in any wife to be forgotten or paffed by, That other children also who are either to attend upon them whiles they be nutsed and brought up, or to beare them company and be fed together with them, be choicn such as above all things are well mannered, and of good conditions: Then, that they speake the Greeker congue naturally, and pronounce the same most plainly and distinctly, for sease, lest if they fort with such sease inher in language are barbarous, or in behaviour lewed and ungratious, they catch insection from them, and bestationed with their vices. For such old sawes and Proverbs as these are not so rise without good reason, If these converse and cohabite with a same cripple, thou will soon lease to limpe and halt thy Fife.

Now when children be grown to that age, wherein they are to be committed unto the charge.

Now when children be grown to that age, wherein they are to be committed unto the charge are fireful. of Tutors, Schoolemasters and governours: then parents ought to have an especial care of their state, namely, under whom they let them to be trained up : lest for want of good providence and fore-fight they betray them into the hands of some vileslaves, base barbarians, vain and lightheaded perions. For molt absurd and ridiculous is the practice of many men in this point: who if they have any fervants more vertuous or better disposed than others, some of them they appoint to husbandry and tillege of their ground; others they make Masters of their ships. They employ them (I fay) either in Merchandile to betheir Factors, or as Stewards of their house to receive and payall; or elfe to be banquers, and so they trust them with the exchanging and turning of their monies. But if they meet with one flave among the rest that useth to be cupshotten given to gluttony and belly cheare, or otherwise is untoward for any good serviceshim they let over their children to bring them up: Whereas indeed a governour over youth should be well given, and of a right good nature himfelfer fuch a one as Phanix was, who had the breeding and education of Achilles. The principall point therefore and most important of all that hithereo hath been alledged is this, That choice men be fought out for to be teachers and masters of our children; who live in good name and without Challenge, whole carriage and behaviour is blameleffe; and who for their knowledge and experience of the world are the best that may be found. For furely the fource and root of all goodness and honesty is the good education and training up of our children in their tenderage. And like as good husbandmen and gardeners are wont to pitch props and stakes close unto their young plants, to stay them up and keep them straight: even to discreet and wife teachers plant good precepts and whollome instructions round about their young Schollars, to the end that thereby their manners may bud forth commendably, and be framed to the rule of vertue. But contrariwile you shall have some fathers now adaies, that deserve no better than to be spit at in their very faces; who either upon ignorance, or sor want of experience, before any trial made of those Masters, who are to have the conduct and charge of their children, commit them hand over head to the tuition of lewdpersons, and such as beare shew and make profession of that which they are not. Neither were this absording alloge-ther so grosse and ridiculous, if so be they faulted herein of meere simplicity and default of fore-knowledge. But here is the height of their folly and errour that themselves knowing otherwhiles the insufficiency, yea, and the naughtinesse of some such Masters, better than they doe who advertifethem thereof; yet for all that they commit their children unto them, partly being overcome by the flattery of claw-backs, and partly willing to gratifie some friends upon their kind and earnest entreasy. Wherein they do much like for all the world to him, who lying very fick in body, for to content and satisfie a friend, leaveth an expert and learned Physician who was able to cure him, and entertaineth another blind leech, who for want of skill and experience quickly killethhim: or else unto one who being at sea, forgoeth an excellent Pilot whom he knoweth to be very skillull, and for the love of a friend maketh choice of another that is most insufficient. O Jupiter, and all the gods in heaven! Is it possible that aman, bearing the name of a father, should make more account of a friends request, than of the good education of his ownchildren? Which confidered, had not that ancient Philosopher Crates (thinke you) just occasion to say often times, that if possibly he might, he would willingly mount to the highest place of the City, and there cry out aloud in this manner: What meane you my Matters, and whether run you headling, carking and caring all that ever you can to gather goods and rake riches together as you do: whiles in the meane time you make little or no reckoning at all of your children, unto whom you are to leave all your wealth? To which exclamation of his I may adde thus much moreover and fay. That such fathers are like unto him that hath great regard of his shooe, but taketh no heed unto his foot. And verily, a man shall see many of these fathers, who upon a covetous mind, and a cold affection toward their own children, are grown to this paffe, that for to spare their purse, and ease themselves of charge, choose mensof no worth to teach them: which is as much as to feeke a good market where they may buy ignorance cheapeft. Certes Ariftippur faid very well to this purpole, when upon a time he prettily mocked luch a father who had neither wit nor understanding, and gybed pleasantly with him in this manner: For when he demanded of him how much he would take for the training up and teaching of his son? He answered, An hundred Crowns: A hundred Crowns! quoth the father: by Hercules I fweate, you aske too much out of the way; For with a hundred crowns I could buy a good flave. True quoth Aristippus againe, Lay out this hundred crowns so, you may have twaine, your son for one, and him whom you buy for the other. And is not this a folly of all follies, that nurses should use their yong infants to take meat and feed themselves with the right hand, yea, and rebuke them is happily they put forth their left: and not to forecast and give order that they may learne civility, and heare lage and wholfome inftructions? But what befalleth afterwards to these good fathers, when they have first nursed their children badly, and then taught them as lewdly? Mary I will tell you. When these children of theirs are grown to mans estate, and will not abide to heare of living orderly, and as it becommeth honeltmen: but contrariwise fall headlong into outragious courses, and give themselves wholly to sensuality and servile pleasures: Then such fathers all repent for their negligence past, in taking no better order for their education: but all too late, confidering no good ensueth thereupon: but contrariwise, the lewd pranks which they commit daily augment their griefe of heart and cause them to languish in sorrow. For some of them they see to keep company with flatterers, parasites, and smell-feasts, the lewdest, basest, and most cursed wretches of all other, who serve for nothing but to corrupt, spoile, and marre youth: Others, to captivate and ipend themselves upon harlots, queanes, and common strumpets, proud and sumptnous in expence; the entertainment of whom is infinitely costly. Many of them consume all in delicate fare, and reeding a dainty and fine tooth: Many of them fall to dice, and with mumming and masking hazard all they have. And divers of them againe entangle themselves in other vices more hardy and adventurous, courting faire dames, and making love to other mens wives: for which purpofethey walked lignified in the night, like the frantick Priests of Bacchus, to commit adulteries, buying sometimes one only nights pleasure with the price of their life; Whereas if fuch as these had converied before with any Philosopher, they would never have taken such waies as this, and given themselves to like vanities: but rather they would have turned over a new leafe, and learned a leffon of Diogenes, who in words not very civil and feemly, how-beit to the point not untruly, gave this counfell, and faid, Go thy waies to the Stews (I advise thee) and enter into some Brothel house, where thou maist know how the pleasure that costeth little or nothing differeth not from that which is bought full dearely.

To knit up therefore all in one fum I will conclude, and this my conclusion ought of right to be of the the therefore all in one tim I will conclude, and this my conclusion ought of right to be effected for an oracle, rather than a simple countell and admonition: That the beginning, midth, and end of all these matters lieth only in a vertuous nutrure and holy education, which I avouch are the very meanes that be operative and powerfull for the attaining both of vertue and true happinesse. As for all other things which we count good in this world are in comparison hereof, mortally transferory, small, and not worth the seeking after with such care and study. Nobility I consessed to be a goodly thing, but it is the gift of our Ancestors, Riches, who doubteth that they be gay and prectous matters? Howbeit, Jying in the power of fortune only, who taketh the fame many times from the fethat possesse them, and give the hem away to such as never look for them. Moreover, much wealth is the verymarke wherat they shoot who are common cutpuries, privy and dometicall theeres, Sycophants, and promoters, and that which is most, the wickedelf perions in the world oftentimes meet therewith. Glory and honour are things venerable howbeit uncertaine and mutable. Beauty is lovely, and very much defired, but it continuesh a small while. Health is worth much, and yet you fee how foon it changeth. Strongth of body who wishesh noe? But quickly it is decayed and gone, either by fichnesse or yeares : informach, as wholoever vannieth and beareth himlelfe in his able body, is greatly deceived, and comment far thort of his reckoning. For what is mans force, compared with that of other beads, I meane, Blephants, Buls, and Lions? It is learning and knowledge only which inus is divine, heavenlyy and inimortall. For in mans nature two parts there are to be confidered of all other most principall, to wit, understanding, and speech. And of these, understanding is as it were the Master that commandeth a Speech, the servant that obeyeth, Now the foresaid understanding is not expoled to the injury of fortune : no flanders railed by Sycophants can take it away: Suckneffe hath no power to corrupt and deliroy it; neither doth it decay or perifh by old age: For it is the only thing that being in yeares waxeth young and fresh. Length of time, which doth diminish and impaire all things elie, addeth ftill more knowledge to our ur derstanding, theelder that we are; The violence of war, which in manner of a streame casteth down and carrieth allaway with it, s ne violence of war, which in mainter or a retraincement powprand carrieth anaway with it is not able to make haveck and those of knowledge and learning; that only is not indianger thereof. And in my conceit, 3 the hegarian Philotopher gave a most worthy and memora-ble aniwer unto Ring Demetrical who having forced, facked, and rated the City of Megaracto the very foundation, demanded of him what losses he inflained in that general facking? None at all (quoth he) For war can make no spoile of vertue. To which answer of his, accordeth and foundeth well the Apophthegme of Socrates, who (as I take it) being asked of Gorgian, what opinion he had of the great King and Monarch of the Persians in those daies, whether he deemed han happy or no? I wor not (quoth he) how he is furnished with vertue and learning: as if he judged that true selicity confided in these two things, and not in the transftory gifts of for-

But as my comfell and advice unto parents is, to hold nothing in the world more decreand previous; than to traine up their children in good letters, and vertuous manners: fo I fay againe, that they ought to have an eye unto that literature and infitution which is found, pure and uncorrupt: furthermore, to lequester and withdraw their children, as far as possibly they can from the vantiyand foolish defire to be feen and heard in the frequenciand publike aftemblies of the people. For commonly we find, that to please a multitude, is to displease the writer fort. And that

No filed tongue I have, no elequence,

To fleake in place of frequent audience: Among my feerer and those in number few, Hove to give advice, and make no show: Tor, those whole special dath please a multi inde, With searned men are foolish thought and ruse.

For mine own part, I observe those men who endeavour to speake to the appetite and pleasure of the base and vulgar fort; that ordinarily they become loose and dissource performs, abandone to all feminality. And verily not without great apparance of reason: For if to gratifie and content of the men regard of honesty: more likelihood there is a great deale, that for to do appearance to themselves, and seed their own humour and appetite, they will forget all honour and depositive to themselves, and seed their own humour and appetite, they will forget all honour and depositive to the seed to the results of the seed to the seed the seed to the seed to of temperante and lobriery. But now, what good thing is there moreover that we are to teach our children ? and whereto frould weath ite them for to give their minds? A goodly matter no doubt it is to do nothing taffily, norto speake a word unadvited y: But (as the old Pronerbe faith) what loever is faire and goodly, the same also is hard and difficult. As for these oragions which be made extempore, and without premeditation, they go away with great facility, and are very rash and full of vanity: And firch commonly as to speake know not well either where to begin or when to make an end. Asso, over and above other absurdities and faults which they commit, who are accustomed in this wife to parle at a venture, and to let their tongue runat randome, know not how to keep any meane or measure of speech but fall into a marvellous superfluity and excesse of words: Whereas on the contrary fide, when a manthinketh beforehand what he shou'd lay, he will never overshoot him to far as to passe beyond the bounds of temperate and proportionable language. Pétides, as we have been given to understand being oftentimes called upon and importuned by the people, and that exprelly by name, for to deliver his opinion as touching a matter in question, would not to much as rife from his place, but excuted him!efe, and faid, I am not provided to speake. Semblably Demost henes, one who greatly affected the said Péricles, and followed his steps in policy and managing of State-affaires, being called by the Athenians to fit in counsell with them and requested to give his advice in certaine points, refused and made the same answer, saying, I have not yet thought upon it, neither am I prepared. But peradventure some man will say, this is an headlesse tale and a devited report received by tradition from hand so hand, and not grounded upon any certaine rettimony. Litten then what the faith himselfe in that oration which he madeagainst Midias, wherein he fetteth evidently before ouneyes, the profit that commeth. by premeditation: For in one place thereof, thele be his worder My Matters of Arbon, Low-"fesse plainly, and cannot deny or dissemble, that I have taken as much paines in composing of this. coration as possibly I could: For an idle wretch I had been, is having suffered, and suffering still "fuch indignities as thefe, I would not confider and fludy before-hand what I had to say in rea-"ion concerning the lematters. Neither alledged this, as one who condemned altogether the promptinde and readingle of the tongue, and the gift of atternance ax reinparts but the ordinary custome and exercise thereof in every small matter, and of no great importance. For other whiles it is tolerable; provided alwaies that we use it it is as we would take a purging medicine; And to speake more plainly, my meaning is, that I would not have young men before they be grown to mans age, for to speake ought without good advise and not side tation. But after they be well grounded, and have gathered sufficient root which may yould pithy speech, then if occasion be offered, and that they be called unto it, I thinkoir convenient they thould be allowed to speake freely. For even as they who have been fettered a long sime,; and worne irons on their teer, when they are looked from their gyves, cannot go well at the first, because they have continued such a while with clogs at their heeles, but even and anon are ready to trip and slumbles so it tures the with those that of longtime have been tongue-fied (ias it were) and reftrained of their liberry of spech. For is happily there he presented some matter, whereto they are to speake on a find den they will praise full the same manner and some of thin, and speake no other wise, than they did before with premeditation. Mary, to infer young hopes to make inhitany, and inconfide-tant orations, is the next way to bring them to vaine habling, and canferhatem to urrermany words altogether impercinent to the matter. It is reported, that upon a time a vaincand too. lish painter came to Apeles, and shewed him a pictures, saying withall. This is mage I drew thus and thus soon. I wor well (quoth Apeles) authe first lights, although thou saidin morer a word that it was quickly painted and in halfe is and I marvell rashes that thou half not painted dramy more such in the same sime. But to recurre again to my former discourse which it began with-all, as touching speech, like as I would give counsell to beware of iglorious and brave words, and to avoid that manner of haughty voice which beseement tragedied, and is ruderer for Theates: So I advice and admonify agains to flye as much that kind of language which is too small and over-lowly : For that the one which is followd and a loft, exceeded civility: and the other that is as much beneath, bewrayeth overmuch fearefulnesse. Moreover, as the body ought not only to befound and in health, but also in good plight and well-likings to our speech should be notionly clearefrom licknesse, as it were, and malady, but also strong and able : Forthan a thing shan is found and fafe only we do but bately praife; whereas that which is hardy and adventurous we admire and wonder at. That which I have faid, as touching the tongue and speech, the same opinion I have of the heart and the disposition thereof. For I would not have a youth to be overbold and audacious :neither do I like or him if he be too timorous and fearefull : For as the one turneth in the end to presumption and impudency, so the other into service cowardise. But herelis eth all the maftery and cumping, as well in this as in all things elfe, namely, to enteven in the midft, and to hold the golden meane. And fince I am entred thus fan into the discounter as touching the literature and crudition of youth, before I proceed any further I will deliver mine opinion thereof generally in thefotermes i Namely. That to be able to fpeake of one thing and no more, is first and formost in my conceit no small bene of ignorance. Then, I suppose that the exercise and practice thereof foon bringeth factory. And againe, I hold it impossible to continue over; more in the same For so to be ever in one long breedeth tediousnesse, and soon aman is weaty of it: whereas variety is alwaies delectable both in this, and also in all other objects as well of the eye as the care. And therefore it behoveth that a child well descended and free borne be not suffered to want either the fight or the hearing of all thole Arts and liberall Sciences which are line ked, as it were, and comprehended within one circle, and thoroupon called Engelianie Circular, These would I have him so runthrough every one superficially for a rate only of them all a forasmuch as to attaine unto the perfection thereof were impossible: "Mer so, as his chiefe and principall study be employed in Philosophy: which opinion of mine I may very well confirme by a proper similitude. For all one it is as if a man would say, a sommendable thing in were refaile along the coasts, and see many a City: but expedient and profitable to make abode and dwell in the best; and much like to that pleasant and pretty conceited speech of Biox the Philosopher, who faid, That even as the lovers and wooers of Lady Penalope, when they could not chjoy the Mistrisher selfe, went in hand with her waiting maidens, and companied with them : logar many as are not able to attaine unto Philosophy, spend and consume themselves in the study of other Arts which in comparison of it are nothing worth. And therfore we ought to make this account, that Philosophy is the principall head (as it were) of all other learning and knowledge whatsoever. True it is, that for the maintenance and preservation of the body men have devised two Arts, to wit, Physicke, and bodily exercise: of which twaine, the one procureth health; the other addeth thereto a good habitude and strong constitution: but for the infirmities and malaties of the foule, there is no other physick but only Philosophy: For by the meanes of it, and together within, we may know what is good what is bad what is honeft and diffioneft, what is just, and generally what to choose, and what to refuse, how we ought to beare our selves towards the gods, and towards our parents, what our demeanour should be with our elders, what regard we are to have of laws, what our carriage mult be to strangers, to superiours: how we are to converse with our friends in what for two ought to demeane our selves towards our shipdren and wives, and finally, what behaviour it befeemeth us to shew unto our servants and familie: Forasmuch as our duty is to worship and adore the gods, to honour our parents, to reverence our ancients to obey the laws, to give place unto our superiours and betters, to love our friends, to use our wives chastledy and with moderation: to be kind and affectionate to our children, and not to be outragious with our servants norto tyrannize over them. But the principall and chiefe of all is this not to show our selves over joyous and metry in prosperity, nor yet exceeding heavy and iid in adverf.ty: not in pleafures and delight dissolute, nor in anger surfaces, and transpor-ted, or rather transformed, into brutish beatts by choler. And these I esteem to be the soveraigne fruits that are to be gathered and gotten by Philolophy. For to carry a generous and noble heart in prosperity is the part of a brave minded man: to live without envy and malice is the figne of a good and tractable nature: to overcome pleasures by the guidance of reason is the act of wile and lage men: and to bridle and refiraine choler is a maffery that every one cannot skill of: But the height of perfection in my judgement those only attaine unto, who are able to joyne and intermingle the politick government of weale publike with the profession and study or Philosophy: For by this meanes (1 suppose) they may enjoy two of the best things in the world, to wit the prosit of the Common weale by managing State-assaires: and their owngood, living to as they do in tranquillity and repose of mind, by the means of Philosophy. For whereas there be among men three forts of life namely, Active Contemplative, and Voluptuous: this lati named, being diffolute, loofe, and thrall to pleafures, is brutifis beatly, baie, and vile: The contemplative wanting the active is unprofitable; and the active, not participating with the speculation of Philotophy, committeth many abjurd enormities, and wanteth ornaments to grace and beautifie it. In which regardmen must endeav our and assay as much as lieth in them both to deale in government of the State, and also to give their minds to the study of Philosophy, so far forth as they have time, and publike affaires will permit. Thus governed in times past noble Pericles: Thus ruled Archylas the Tarentine: Thus Dion the Syracufian, and Epaminondas of Thebes fwayed the State; where they lived; and both of them, as well the one as the other, converfed familiarly with Plato. As touching the inflitution of children ingood literature, needleffe (I suppose) it is to write any more. This only will I adde unto the rest that hath been said, which I suppose to be expedient or rather necessary: namely, that they make no small account of the workes and books of the ancient Sages and Philosophers, but diligently collect and gather them together: so as they do it after the manner of good husbandmen: For as they do make provision of fuch tooles as pertaine to Agriculture and husbandry, not only to keep them in their pole-fion but also to the them accordingly: so this reckoning ought to be made, that the instruments and furniture of knowledge and learning be good books if they be read and perused: For from thence as from a fountaine they may be fure to maintaine the fame,

And here we are not to forget the diligence that is to be imployed in the bodily exercise of children: but to remember that they be sent into the Schooles of those Masters who make profision of such seats, there to be trained and exercised sufficiently, as well for the streight and decent growth, as sor the ability and strength of their bodies: For the fast knitting and strong complexion of the body in children is a good soundation to make them another day deem and personable old men. And like as in time of a calme and faire season, they that areast sea ought to make provision of necessary meanes to withstand soule weather and a tempest: even so, very meet rites, that tender age be surnished with temperance, sobriety, and continency, and even bettimes referve and lay up such a voyage-provision for the better sufficient of old age. Howheit such that deed ought this labour and travell of children to be dispensed, that their bodies be not exhaust and died up, and so by that meanes they themselves be over-wearied, and made either unmeet, or unwishing, to follow their book afresh, and take their learning: Foras Platas (aster) well; sleep and lassitude be enemies to learning. But why do I stand hereupon so much, being incomparison so small a matter?

Proceed I will therefore and make haste to that which is of greatest importance, and passets all the rest that hast been said before: For this I say, that youth ought to be trained to military seats, namely, in launcing darts and javelins, in drawing a bow and shooting arrows, in chasting also and hunting wild bealts. For simuch as all the goods of those who are vanquished in sight beexposed as a prey and booty to the conquerous: neither are they fit for war are, and to beare arms, whose bodies having been daintily brought up in the shade, and within house, are corpulent, and of a fost and delicate constitution.

The leane and dry, the raw bone fouldier fierce,
Who train a bath been in armes and warlike toyle,
In field whole rankes of enemies will pierce,
And in the lifts all his concurrent spyle,

But what may somemen say unto me? Sir, you have made promise to give us examples and precepts, precepts, concerning the education of all children free borne, and of honest parentage; and now, me thinkes, you neglect the education of commoners and poore mens children, and deliver no infimedions but fuch as are for gentlemens, and be futable to the rich and wealthy only. To which objection it is no hard matter to make answer. For mine owing part, my desire especially is, that this intruction of mine might ferve all but in case there be some, who for, want of meanes cannot make that use and profits which I could wish let them lay the weight upon fortune, and not blane him who harb given them his advice and counsell in these points. And yet not poore ment thus much will lay, Let them endeavour and straine themselves to the utmost of their power to bring up their children in the best manner: and if they cannot reach unto that, yet must they aime thereat, and come as neare as their ability will give them leave. I have been willing to injert these points by the way into this present argument, and to charge my discourse over and above therewith, that I might prosecute other precepts remaining behind, which concerne the education of young men. Thus much therefore I lay moreover, that children must be trained and brought to their duty in all lenity, by faire words, gentle exhortations, and mild remonstrance, and in no wife (paralle) by stripes and blows: For this course of swinging and beating seemeth meet for bondslaves, rather than persons of free condition, And to lay a truth, by this meanes they become dull and tenteleffe, may, they have all fludy and labour afterwards in hatred and horrour : partly for the smart and paine which they abide by such correction and inpart by the contumely and reproach that they fulfaine thereby. Praile and dispraise be far better and more profitable to childrenfree borne, than all the whips, rods, and boxes in the world: the one for to drive them forwards to well-doing, the other to draw them back from doing ill: but both the one and the other are to be used in alternative course. One while they would ing it! but both the one and the butter at the date of an analyst, if at any time they be ago jocund and infolent they ought to be finibled a little and taken down. yea, and put to lome light frame: but foom after tailed up again to by giving them their due parises. And therein we mut imitate good nurses, who when they have fet their infants acrying give them the beautiful to the date of the control of the date still them againe. Howbeit, a measure would be kept, and great heed taken that they be not too highly commended, for feare left they grow proud and profume overmuch of themselves: For when they be praised exceedingly they waxe carelesse, dissolute and enervate; neither will they be willing afterwards to take more paines. Moreover, I have known certaine fathers, who be willing activation that the heat of their children have hated them afterwards. But what is my meaning by this speech? Surely I will declare my mind, and make my words plaine anon by an evident example and demonstration. Some fathers (I say) there be, who upon a hot and hastle defire to have their children come foon forward, and to be the formost in every thing, put them to immoderate travell and excessive paines: in such fort, that they either sinke under the weight of the burden, and so fall into grievous maladies, or elie finding themselves thus sur harged and overladen, they are not willing to learne that which is taught them. And it fareth with them as it doth with young herbs and plants in a garden, which fo long as they be watered moderately, are novemed and thrive very well: but if they be over-much dren hed with water, they take harme thereby and are drowned: Even so we multallow unto children a breathing time between their continu-all labours: considering and making this account. That all the life of man is divided into labour and reft: and for this cause Nature hath so ordained, that as there is a time to be awake, so we find a time also to sleep. One while there is war, and another while peace: It is not alwaies winter and foule weather, but summer likewise and a faire season. There be appointed not only worked aies to toyle in, but also settival holidaies to so accound diport our selves. In summe, rest and repose is (as it were) the sauce unto our travell. And this we may observe as well in fenselesse and livelesse things, as in living and tensible creatures. For we unbend our boyvs, and let flack the strings of Lutes, Harpes, and such musicall instruments to the end that we may bend and stretch the same againe. And in one word, as the body is preserved and maintained by reple-tion and evacuation successively: so the mind likewise by repose and travell in their turnes.

Furthermore, there be other fathers worthy of rebuke and blame, who after they have once, betaken their children to Mafters, Turors, and Governours, never deigne afterwards themfelves, either to fee or heare them, whereby they might know how they learne; wherein they do faile very much in their duty. For they one hi in proper perion to make triall how they profit, they fhould ever and anon (after fome few v daies palled between) free into their progrefie and proceeding, and not to repo e their hope and reft altegether upon the direction and disposition of a mercenary Mafter. And verily this carefull regard of the fathers, yet il worke also greater diligence in the Mafters them'elves, seeing that by this means they are called efcloones, as it were, to account and examined how much they pile their thollars, and how they profit under their hands. To this purpose may be well applyed a pretty word spoken sometimes by a wise effugry of a stable Nothing (quoth he) seeded the steed to fat as doth the Masters eye.

But above all things the memory of children ought daily to be exercised: for that it is, as a man would say, the Treasury and Storehouse of all learning. Which was the cause that the ancient Poets have seigned, That Lady Mnemossine, that is to say, Memory, was the mother of the Muses: Whereby they would seeme under an enigmaticall and darke speech to give us to understand, that nothing availeth to much either to breed, or to seed and nourish learning, as Memory.

And

And therefore great diligence would be used in the exercise thereof every way: whether the children be by nature good of remembrance and recentive : or otherwise of a fickle memory and given to oblivion. For the gift of nature in the one by exercise we find confirming and one ment; and the imperfection or default in the others, by diligence supply and correct; in such fort that as they shall become better than others; for these shall prove better than themselves. For very wisely to this purpose faid the Poet Hesiedus: If little fill to little thon do adde,

A heape at length and mickey will be had.

A heape at length and mickle will be had.

Over and besides, I would not have fathers to be ignorant of another point also, as touching this memorative part and faculty of the mind: namely, that it serveth much not only to get learning and literature, but also is a meanes that carrieth not the least stroke in worldly affaires from ning and literature, but also is a meanes that carrieth not the least stroke in worldly affaires. For the remembrance of matters past furnisheth men with examples sufficient to guide and direct

Furthermore, this care would be had of young thildren, that they be kept from filthy and un-feemly freeches: For words (as Democritus faith) are the shadows of deeds. Trained also they must be to be courteous, assable, and fair spoken, as well in entertainment of talk with every one, as in labuting and greeting whomsoever they meet: for there is nothing in the world so odious as to be coy and surly of speech; to make it strange and to distance for to speech with men.

Againe young students shall make themselves more lovely and aniable to those with whom they Againe, young fludents shall make themselves more lovely and anniable for those with whom they converse, in case they be not so opinative and shifts, that they will not relent nor give place one join disputations, if they have once taken a pitch against others. For a commendable and goodly matter it is for a man to know, not only how to overcome, but also to suffer thinselfs other whiles to be overcome: especially in such things wherein the visitory bringeth burt and damage For verily such a conquest may well and truly be called, according to the common Proyethes. A Cadmian visitory, this is to say, which turneth to the detriment and losse of the winner. In confirmation whereof i may well alledge the testimony of the wise Port Empiredat, who in one of his Tragedies hath these verses:

When one of tivaine, that argue and dispute, Grows into heat of words and will not rest.

Growt into beat of words and will not reft:

I hold him much the wifer who is must

And flate the interpret has be do not contest.

Now come I to other points wherein youth is to be instructed, and those of so lettle importance, ray, rather I may be bold to say, of greater consequence than all those whereof I have discourted hisherto: And what be they? Namely, that young men be not rictous, and give no specific the reconstruction.

That they she that hands must and cleane. But let us consider their presents particulated where penning of experie. That they now dientrongue. That they make their anger: Anothrapy that they keep their hands pure and cleane. But let us confider these precepts particularly, what each of them in several stock in more and more easily may they be understood, if we illustrate the same by lively examples. To begin then first with the last: There have been known great perfonages, who being once permitted to pur forth their hands for to take bribes and money understood. juffly loft all the honour which they had won the rest of their life time: As for example, * Gy= lippus the Lacedemonian, who having once opened those bags of coffers of money by turning their bottomes upwards, and taken forth what pleased him, was chamefully banished out of Sparsand lived obscurely in exile. As touching the gift of bridling choler, and not to be angry at all, it is a fingular vertue, and perfect wife menthey are indeed who can fo do: Such as Socrates was, who being greatly abused by an insolent, audacious, and gracelesse youth, that spared him not, who being greatly abused by an injoicins, auditations, and grace-iter yours, that parted must not but had fourned and kicked him with his heeles, feeing those about him to be very anoty and out of patience, stamping and faring as though they would run after the party, to be averaged of such an indignity: How hove my Masters, (quoth he) what if an asse had shing out, and given me a rap with his heeles, yould you have had me to have yerked out and kicked him again? How hove the such as the such beit, this ungracious impervent not cleare avvay with impunity: for being rated for his infolence and evil demeanour and reproached by every man with the termes of Winting affe, Kick-ing colt. and such like nick-names, he fell into such a fit of melancholle, that he strangled himselfe in a halter. Allowhen Aristophanes the Poetexhibited the Comedie called Cloudes, wherein he let flie and discharged upon Socrates all manner of flanders and contumelies that he could devise, infomuch as one of them who were prefent at the very time when he railed thus licentiouslie, demanded of him and faid, Art thou not netled, O Sacrates, to heare and fee thy felfe thus blafoned and noted in publike place? Not a whit (quoth he againe) for vvell I vvot, that I amina Theatre, where I make iport and am laughed at no other vvile than at some great feast and glad I am that I can make the audience so merrie. The like for all the world is reported of Archytas, the Taxentine, and Plate : the one being returned home from the war, wherein he was L, Generall, found his land forlet, neglected and untided; whereupon he fent for his Bailife of husbandrie, who had the charge thereof: and when he was come before him, Were I nor exceeding angrie (quoth he) I voould make thee feele my fingers, and give theethy defert. And Plane being upon a time dipleated with a ferrant of his, who had a licorous tooth, and had done fome ungtacious pranke, called unto him Spen Coppes his fifters son, and said. Go your vvaies, toke me this knave afide, and svvinge him vvell: for Imy selfe am verie angrie. But some men perhaps will say unto me, These be hard matters to do and imitate. True it is, I wot well; howbeit, endeayour we must and strive with our selves what we can, according to the example of these worthy men, to cut off tomewhat of our impatience, and to curb our excellive anger : for we may not look to be equall and comparable in any respect to them, either in experience and skill or in vegtue. Howbeit, let us neverthelesse, like the Priests and Torch-bearers (if I may so say) of the gods, ordained to give light, and shew unto men the reliques of their wildome and learning, no less than if they were very gods, as fay to follow them, and tread in their steps, endeavouring as much as lieth in us, to be furnished with their examples for our better instruction. As for the rule and government of the tongue (for of it, according to my promice, I am to discourse) if there be any man, who thinketh it to be no great mastery, but a small and frivolous matter, he is very wide and far out of the right way. For a point it is of great wildome, to know in time and place to keep silence, and far better by many degrees than any speech what soerer. And for this cause (I suppose) it vvas, that our Ancestors in times palt instituted those precise ceremonies of facred my-Heries, to the end that being wedto hold our peace by that meanes, we might transfer that feare which we learned in the service of the gods, to the sidelity and secrecy which we are to observe in mens affaires; and verily never was there man that repented for holding his tongue, but many a one hath often befinewed himielie for speaking. Againe, that word which a man hath held in at one time he may easily utter at another well enough; but a word once passed out of themouth, he cannot possibly recall it againe. I remember that I have heard of an infinite number of men, who by occasion of an intemperate tongue of their own have fallen headlong into per of men, who by occasion or an intemperate congue of their own have larger needing into exceeding great calamities, among whom I will felect one or two by way of example, to illustrate the theament at I have in hand, and overpasse the rett. Protonous King of Agppt, him I meane who was summed Philadelphus, espouled his own sister Arsinoe, and married her: at what time one Sonder came unto him and said, You put your aglet, Sir, thorough the cylet that is not made for it: For this one word he was cast into priton, where he remained a long time in not made for it: For this one word he was tart into prion, where he remained a long time in milery, and rotted in the end, suffering condigne punishment due for his lavish tongue and foolish words: and for that he thought to make other men laugh, bimielle wept for it a long time after, Thelike, and in a manner the tame, both did and suffer another; named Theorisms the Sophister, fave that the punishment which he abid was much more grievous. For when King Alexander the Great had by his letters missing given commandement that the Greeks should provide Robes of purple against his returne, because upon his comming home he minded to relebrate a solemne farnince unto the gods, in token of thank giving, for that he had atchieved a victory over the Barbarians: by reason of which commandement the States and Cities of Greece were enjoyned to contribute money by the poll. Then this Theorems, I have ever to this day (quoth he) doubted what Homer meant by this word Purple death: but now I knowfull well that this is the purple death which hespeaketh of. By which words he incurred the high displeasure of King Alexander, and made him his heavy friend ever after. The same Theoritus another time procured to himselie the deadly hatted of Antigonus King of the Macedonians, by reproaching him in way of mockerie with his desormity and defect, for that he had but one eye. For the King having advanced Entropion his Master Cook to a place of high calling and command, thought him ameet man to be fent unto Theoritu, as well to give account unto him, as allo to take account of him reciprocally. Eutropion gave him to understand so much from the King, and about this businesse repaired often unto him. In the end, I know well (quoth Theoritu) thou witt never have done until thou have made a dish of meat of me, and ferve meup raw to the table before the Cyclops to be eaten: twitting the King with his one eye. and Europion with his cookery. But Eutropion came upon him againe presently, and said, Thou shalt be then without a head first, For I will make thee payfor thy prating and foolish tongue, and with that he went immediately to the King, and reported what he had said, who made no more adoe but sent his writ and caused his head to be

Over and besides all these precepts before rehearsed, children ought to be inured from their very intancy in one thing which is most holy and beseeming religious education, and that is, to speake the truth . For surely lying is a base and servile vice, detestable and hatefull among all men, and not pardonable so much as to meane slaves, such as have little or no good in them. Now as touching all that which I have delivered and advised hitherto, which concerneth the honest bea haviour modelly and temperance of young children I have delivered the same frankely resolutely and making no doubt thereof. Mary, for one point which now I am to touch and handle, I am not to well resolved, but much distracted in my mind hanging to and fro, as it were, in aquall ballance, and know not which way to encline, whether to the one fide or to another: Insomuch as I am in great perplexity and feare: neither wote I whether I were better to go forward and utter it, or to turne back and hold my peace. And yet I will take heart, and boldly declare what it is. The question to be debated is this, Whether we onght to permit those that love young boyes, to converte with them and haunt their company, or contrativitie, keep them away and debar them that they neither come neare nor have any speech with them; For when I behold and confider the auftere nature and severity of some fathers, who for fear that their sons should be abused, will in no wife abide that those who love them should in any fort keep company, or take with them, but thinke it intollerable, I am affraid either to bring up fuch an order, or to approve and maintaine the same. But when on the other fide I propound before mine eyes the examples of Socrates, Plato, Xenophon Aschines, Cebes, and all the tute and fort of those worthy men in times paft, who allowed the manner of loving young boyes, and by that meanes brought such youths to learne good sciences, to skill of government and State-matters, and to frame their manners to the rule and square of vertue, I am turned quite and altogether of another mind, yea, and incined wholly to imitate and follow those great personages, who have the testimony of the Poet Euripides on their fide, faying in one place after this manner,

All loves do not the flesh grosly respect: One love there is which doth the foule affect, With justice beautified and equity, With innocence likewise and chastity.

Neither ought we to surpasse one saying of Plate, which he delivereth between mirth and good earned in this wife, Good reason it is, quoth he, that they who have done worthy service and at this ed great prowesse and victory in a battell, be priviledged to kill whom it pleaseth them among their captives. And for those who desire nothing but the beauty and fresh stoure of the body, mine opinion is they should be put back and kept away: but such in one word as love the beauty of the mind are to be chosen and admitted unto them. Also I hold, that such kind love is to be avoided and forbidden, which they practice in Thebes and Elia, as also that which in Candy they call Ravishment: but that which is used in Athens and Lacedamon, we ought toreceive and allow, even in young and faireboyes. Howbeit concerning this matter every man may for me opine what he thinketh good, and do as he feeth cause and can find in his heart,

Moreover, having tufficiently treated of the good nurture and modelt behaviour of children, I purpole to proceed unto the age of young men: but first I will ipeakemy mind briefly once for all as touching one point. For many a time I have complained of those who have brought up divers ill customes, and this above the rest, namely, to provide for their children whiles they be very young and little, mafters, teachers, and governours: but after they are grown once to some yeares, they give them head, and suffer them to be carried away with the violent heat of wouth: whereas contrariwile it were meet and needfull, to have a more carefull eye unto them, and to hold a streighter hand over them at that time, than during their infancy and childhood. For who knoweth not, that the faults of young children are but small, light and easie to be amended, as sor example, some shrewdnesse and little disobedience to their tutors and governours, or happily fome negligence and default in not giving eare to their teachers, and not doing as their Masters apppoint them: But contrariwise the offences that yonkers commit are many times outragious and hainous, as gormandile and furfetting, robbing of their fathers, dice play in maskes and mummeries, excesse in feasing, banqueting, quasting and carousing, wanton love of young maidens, adulteries committed upon married wives, and therebythe overthrow of houses, and consuson of families. In regard of which enormities it behoveth parents to represse and bride their wild and unramed affections with great care and vigilance: For this flower of age having no forcast of thrift, but let a together upon ipending, and given to delights and pleasures winferh and fling-eth out. like a skittish and frampold horse, in such for that it had need of a sharpe bit and short curb: And therefore they that endeavour not by all good meanes forcibly to hold in and reftraine this age, but give young men liberty and infer them to do after their own mind, plunge themere they be aware into a licentious course of life and all manner of wickednesse. Where ore good and wife fathers ought in this age especially to be vigilant and watchfull over their ions, they ought, I fay, to keep them down and inure them to wildome and vertue, by teaching by threatning, by intreaty and prayers, by advice and remonstrances, by persivation and countell, by taire promiles, by ferting before their eyes the examples of some who being abandoned to their pleafures and all fenfuality have fallen headlong into great calamities, and wofull miferies: and contrariwife of others who by maftering their lufts, and conquering their delights, have won honour and glorious renowne. For furely these be the two Elements and soundations of vertue, Hope of reward and feare of punishment: For, as hope inciteth and setteth them forward to enterprife the best and most commendable acts, so seare plucketh them back, that they dare not enter upon lewd and wicked pranks. In fumme, Fathers ought with great care to divert their children from frequenting ill company, for otherwise they shall be sure to catch insection and carry away the contagion of their lewdnesse. This is that Pythagoras expressy forbiddeth in his Enigmaticall precepts under covert and darke words, which because they are of no small efficacy to the attaining of vertue, I will briefly fet down by the way, and open their meaning. Talle not (quoth he) of the blacke tailed fishes, Melanuri, which is as much to say, as, Keepnot company with infamous perions, and fuch as for their naughty life are noted (as it were) with a blacke coale. Paffe not over a ballance. That is, we ought to make the greatest account of equity and justice and in no case to transgresse the same. Sit not upon the * measure Cha ux, That is to say, we are to fly floath and idlenesse, that we may forecast to make provision of things necessary to and half, which this life, Give not every manthy right hand, which is all one with this, Make no contracts and bargaines indifferently with all persons. Weare not a ring streight upon thy singer i.e. Live in freedome and at liberty; neither intangle and clog thy life with troubles as with gyves. Dig not nor rake into the fire with a fword: whereby he giveth us a caveat, not to provoke farther a man that is angry, for that is not meet and expedient: but rather to give place unto those that are in heat of choiler. Eate not thy heart, that is to lay, offend not thine own foule, nor hurt and confume it with pensive cares. Abstaine from beanes, i.e. Intermeddle not with the affaires of State and government: for that in old time men were wont to passe their voyces by beanes, and so proceeded to the election of Magistrates. Put not viands in a chamber-pot: whereby he fignifieth, that we should not commit good and civill words to a wicked mind; be: aule speech is the nutriment of the understanding, which becommeth polluted by the lewdnesse of men. Returne not back from the limits and confines when thou comme't unto them, that is to lay, If we perceivedeath approaching, and that we are come to the uttermost bounds of our life, we ought to beare our death patiently, and not bediscouraged thereat.

But now it is time to return again to my matter which I proposed before in the beginning, namely, as I have already faid, we are to withdraw our children from the fociety and companie of lewd persons, and flatterers especiallie: for that which many a time and often I havelaid to divers and fundry fathers, I will now repeat once againe namely, That there is not a more mif-hievous and petitient kind of men, or who do greater hurt to youth, and iooner overthrow them, then their flatterers, who are the undoing both of fathers and ions, cauting the old age of the one, and the youth of the other, wretched and milerable, presenting with their lewd and wicked countels an inevitable bait, to wit, Pleasure, wherewith they are sure to be caught. Fathers exhort their fons that be wealthy to fobriety; and thele incite them to drunkennels. Fathers give them counsell to live chaste and continent; these provoke them to lust and loosenesse of life. Fathers bid them to fave, spare, and be thrifty; these will them to spend, scatter, and be wasters. Fathers advise their children to labour and travell; these flatterers give them counsell to play or fit fill and do nothing. What? all our life, say they, is no more but a moment and minute of time, to speake of : we must live therefore, and enjoy our own, whiles we have it : we must not live befideour selves, and languish. What need you regard and care for the menaces of a father, an old doting foole carrying death in his face, and having one foot in the grave, we shall see him one of these daies turne up his heels, and then will we soon have him forth, and carry him aloft bravely to his grave. You shall have one of thele come, and bring unto a youth some common harlot out of the stinking stewes, having borne him in hand before, that she is some bravedame and citizens wife, for to furnish whom, he must robhis father, there is no remedy. Thus fathers, good men, in one houre are bereaved and spoyled of that which they had saved many a yeare for the maintenance of their oldage. To be short, a wretched and cur ed generation they be hypocrites, pretending friendship, but they cannot skill of plaine dealing and tranke peech. Rich men they claw, footh up and flatter: the poore they contemne and despite. It seemeth they have learned the Art of finging to the Harpe, for to feduce young men: for when their young matters, who maintaine and feed them, begin to laugh, then they fet up by and by a loud laughter, then they yawn and shew all their teeth; counterfeit crankes, fained and supposed men; bastard members of mankind and this life; who compo'e them'elves, and live to the will and pleasure of richmen: and notwithstanding their fortune is to be free borne and of franke condition, yet they choose voluntarily to be slaves: who thinke they have great injury done unto them if they may not live in all fulnesse and superfluitie, to be kept delicately, and do nothing that good is. And therefore all fathers that have any care of their childrens good education and well-doing ought of necessity to chase and drive away from them these grace esse imps, and shamelesse beasts: they shall do we'l also to keep from them such schoole-fellows as be unhappy and given to do shrewd turnes: for fuch as they are enough to corrupt and marre the best natures in the world.

All these rules and lessons which hitherto I have delivered, do concerne honesty, vertue and profit : but those that now remaine behind, pertaine rather to humanity, and are more agreeable to mans nature. For in no case would I have fathers to be very hard. sharp, and rigorous to their children: but I could rather wish and desire that they winke at some faults of a young man, yea, and pardon the same when they cipy them, remembring that they themselves were sometimes young. For like as Phylitians mingling and tempering otherwhiles some sweet juyce or liquor with bitter drugs and medicines, have devited that pleature and delight should be the meanes and way to do their patients good: Even to, fathers ought to delay their eager reprehensions and cutting rebukes with kindnesse and elementy: one while letting the bridle oose and giving head a little to the youthfull defires of their children: another while againe reining them fhort, and holding them in as hard: but above all, with patience gently to beare with their faults. But if fo be fathers cannot otherwisedo, but be soone angry; then they must as soone have done and be quickly pacified. For I had rather that a father should be hasly with his children, so he be appeafed anon, than flow to anger, and as hard to be pleafed again. For when a father is so hardhearted, that he will not be reconciled but carrieth fill in mind the offence that is done, it is a great figne that he hater's his children. And I hold it good that fathers fometime take not knowledge of their childrens faults, and in this case make some use of hard hearing and dimme sight, which old age bringeth ordinarily along with it, as if by reason of the e infirmities they neither faw fomewhat when they fee well enough, nor heard that which they heare plainely. We beare with the faults of friends; what strange matter is it then to tolerate the imperfections of our own children? Many a time when our fervants have over-drunke themselves, and surfeited therewith, we learth not too narrowly into them, nor rebuke them sharpely: therefore keep thy son one while short, be franke another while, and give him money to spend freely. Thou hast been highly offended, and angry with him once, pardon him another time for it. Hath he practifed secretly with any one of thy houshold servants, and beguiled thee? Dissemble the matter and bridle thine ire. Hath he been at one of thy farmes, met with a good yoke of oxen and made money thereof? Commeth he in the morning to do his duty and bid thee good morrow, belching foure, and smelling strongly of wine, which the day before he drunke at the taverne with companions like himself? Seem to know nothing. Senteth he of sweet persumes, & costly pomanders? Hold thy peace and say nothing. These are the means to tame and break a wild and coltish youth. Trueit is that such as naturally be subject to wantonnesse or carnall lust, and will not be reclaimed from it, nor give eare to those that rebuke them, ought to have wives of their own, and to be yoked in marriage: for furely this is the belt and furelt meanes to bridle those affections, and to keep them in order. And when fathers are resolved upon this point, what wives are they to feeke for them? Surely those, that are neither in bloud much more noble, nor in state far wealthier than they: For an old faying it is and a wife, Take a wife according to thy felfe, As for those that wed women far higher in degree, or much wealthier than themselves, I cannot say they be husbands unto their wives, but rather flaves, unto their wives goods.

I have yet a few short lessons to annexe unto those above rehearled, which when I have set down, I will conclude, and knit up these precepts of mine. Above all things fathers are to take heed, that they neither commit any groffe fault, nor remit any one part of their own duty: to the end they may be as lively examples to their own children; who looking into their life as into a cleare mirrour, may by the precedents by them given, forbeare to do or speake any thing that is unseemly and dishonest: For such fathers who reprove their childrensor those parts which they play themselves, see not how under the name of their children they condemne their own selves. But surely, all those generally who are ill livers, have not the heart to rebuke so much as their own servants; much lesse dare they find fault with their children. And that which is worst of all, inliving ill themselves, they teach and counsell their servants and children to do the fame: For looke where old folke be shamelesse, there must young people of necessity be most gracelesse and impudent. Endeavour therefore we ought for the reformation of our children, to do our selves all that our duty requireth: and herein to imitate that noble Lady Entraire, who being a Sclavonian born, and most barbarous, yet for the instruction of her own children she took paines to learne good letters when she was well stept in yeares. And how kind a mother she was to her children, this Epigram which the her felfe made and dedicated to the Muses, doth sufficiently testifie and declare:

This Cupid here of honest love a true Memoriall is, Which whilom Dame Eurydice of Hierapolis To Muses nine did dedicate : whereby in soule and mind Conceiv'd she was in latter daies, and brought forth fruit inkind. For when her children were well grown; good ancient Lady she, And carefull mother took, the paines to learne the A.B.C. And in good letters did so far proceed; hat in the end She taught them those lage less ons all, which they might comprehend.

But now to conclude this Treatife, To be able to observe and keep all these precepts and rules together which I have before fet down, is a thing happily that I may wish for, rather than give advise and exhort unto. Howbeit, to affect and follow the greater part of them, although it require a rare felicity and fingular diligence; yet it is a thing that man by nature is capable of, and may attaine unto.

How a Young Man ought to heare Poets, and how be may take profit by reading Poems.

The Summary.

Porasmuch asyoning Students are ordinarily allured as with a bais by reading of Poets, in such fort, as willingly they employ their time therein, considering that Poesse hath I wot not what Sympathy with the surface of this age: therefore by good right this present discourse is placed next unto the former. And abois, to speak properly, is pertained unto those only who read ancient Poets, as well Greeke as Latine, to take heed and beware how they take an impression of dangerous opinions, inregard either of religion or manners: yet a man may comprehend likewise under it all other profane authors, out of which a mind that is not corrupt may gather profit, so they be handled wisely, and used with discretion. To which essets Plutarch delivereth in this treatise good precepts: And after he hath showed generally, that in Poessethere is delight and danger withall: he refliteth briefly those who statty condemneit: Then, as he proceedesh to advertise that this ground and foundation is to be laid, namely, that Poets are liers; he describeth what their fittions be, how they ought to be considered, and what the fcope and marke is whereat Poesse doth aime and spoot: Afterwards he adviset to weigh and ponder well the intention of Poets, unto which they addresse and accommodate their verses to beware of their repugnances and contradictions: and to the end that we be not so some damnified by any dangerous points which they deliver one after another to oppose against them the opinions and counsels of other persons of better mark. Which done, he addeth moreover and faith, That the sentences intermingled here and there in Poets, do reply sufficiently against the evill doctrine that they may seeme to teach elsewhere: alfo, in taking heed to the diverse figuifications of words to be vid and freed from great encumbrances and difficulties: discoursing moreover how a man may make use of their descriptions of vices and vertues: also, of the words and deeds of those personages whom they bring in: searching unto the reasons and causes of such speeches and discoursas: thereout to draw in the enda deeper sense and higher meaning reaching evento Morall Philosophy, and the gentle framing of the mind unto the love of vertue. Andfor that there be some hard and difficult places, which like unto forked raies, may leave the minds of the Readers doubtfull and in suspense: he sheweth that it is an easie matter to apply the same well, and that withall, aman may reforme those sentences ill placed, and accommodate them to many things. And in conclusion framing this discourse to his principall intention he treateth how the praises and dispraises which Poets attribute untopersons are to be considered: and that we ought to consirme all that which we find good in such authors by testimony taken out of Philosophy, the only scope whereunts young menmust tend in reading of Poets,

Reading and hearing of Poems and Poets.

Hat which the Poet Philoxeniu faid of flesh, that the sweetest is that which is least flesh: of fish likewife that the most favorie is that which is least fish, let us, O Marcus Sedatus, leave to be decided and judged by those, vvho; as Cato said, had their pallats more quick and sensible than their hearts. But, that young mentake more pleasure in those Philosophicall discourses, vvhich savour least of Philosophy, and seeme rather spoken in mirth than in earnest, and are more willing to give eare thereto, and suffer themselves more easily to be led and directed thereby, is a thing to us notorious and evident. For we see that in reading not only Afops fables, and the fictions of Poets, but also the book of Heraclides, entituled Abaris, and that of Ariston, named Lycas; wherein the opinions of Philosophers, as touching the soule, aremingled withtales and feigned narrations devised for pleasure, they be ravished, as one would fay, with great contentment and delight. And therefore fuch youths ought not only to keep their bodies fober and temperate in the pleasures of meat and drinke, but also much more to accustometheir minds to a modetatedelight in those things which they heare and read, using the fame temperately as a pleasant and delectable sauce, to give a better and more savoury taste to that which is healthful, who liome and profitable therein. For neither those gates that be shut in a City do guard the same and secure it for being forced and won, if there be but one standing open to receive and let in the enemies: nor the temperance and continency in the pleasures of other senses preserve a young man for being corrupted and perverted, if for want of forecast and heed-taking he give himselfe to the pleasure only of the eare. But for that the hearing approacheth nearer to the proper feat of reason and understanding (which is the braine) so much the more hurt it doth unto him that receiveth delectation thereby, it it be neglected, and not better heed taken thereto. Novy torasmuch happily, as it is neither possible nor profitable to restraine from the reading and hearing of Poems, such young men as are of the age either of my fon Sociarus, or of your Cleander, let us, I pray you, have a carefull eye unto them, as standing more in need of a guidenovy to direct them in their readings, than they did in times past to stay and dade them when they learned to go. This is the reason, that methought in duty I was bound to fend unto you in writing, that which not long fince I discoursed of by mouth, as touching the writings of Poets: to the end that you may read it your selfe, and if you find that the reasons therein delivered beof no leffe vertue and efficacy than the stones called Amethylts, which some take before and hang about their necks, to keep them from drunkennesse as they sit at banquets, drinking wine merrily you may impart and communicate the fame to your fon Cleander, to preoccupate and prevent his nature which being not dull and heavy in any thing, but every way quick, lively and pregnant, is more apt and easie to be lead by such allurements.

In Polypes head there is to be had, One thing that good is and another as bad, for that the flesh thereot is pleasant and savoury enough in taste to him that seedeth thereupon : but (as they fay) it causeth troublesome dreames in the sleep, and imprinteth in the fantasie strangand monfirous visions. Semblably, there is in Poesie much delectation and pleasure, enough to entertaine and feed the understanding and spirit of a young man : yet neverthelesse, he shall meet with that there which will crouble and carry away his mind into errours, if his hearing benot well guided and conducted by fage direction. For very well and fitly it may be faid not only of theland of Egypt, but also of Poetry;

Mixed drugs plenty, as well good as bad, Med'cines and poysons are there to be had, which it bringeth forth and yeeldeth to as many as converie therein. Likewise: Therein fweet love and wantonnesse, with dalliance you shall find; And sugered words, which do beguile the best and wisest mind.

For that which is so deceitfull and dangerous therein, toucheth not at all those that be witlessesors, fooles, and grosse of conceit. Like as Simonides answered upon a time to one, who demanded of him, Why he did not beguile and circumvent the Thessalians as well as all other Greeks; Becaule, quoth he, they are too fottish for me to deale withall, and so rude, that I cannot skill of deceiving them. Gorgias also the Leontine was wont to say of a Tragedy, That it was a kind of deceit, whereby he that deceived became more just than he who deceived not; and he that was deceived wifer than another who was not deceived. What is then to be done? Shall we constraine our youth to go aboord into the Brigantine or Barke of Epicurus, to saile away and flie from Poetry, by platting and topping their eares with hard and thong waze, as Miffer come-times ferved thole of Ithaca? Or rather by environing and defending their judgement with some discourse of true reason, as with a defensative band about it, to keep and guard them, that they be not carried away with the allurements of pleasure unto that which might hurt them: Shall we reforme and preferve them?

For sure, Lycurgus, though he was

The valiant for of flout Dryas, shewed himselfe not wise nor well in his wites, when he went throughout his whole Realme, and caused all the vines to be cut down and destroyed, because he saw many of his subjects troubled in their braines, and drunken with wine: whereas he should rather have brought the nymphs (which are the spring waters) nearer, and keep in order that soolish, furious, and ouragious god Bacchus, as Platolaith, with another goddeffe that was wile and lober. For the mingling of water with wine delayeth and taketh away the hurtfull force thereof: but killeth not withall the wholfome vertue that it hath: Even fo we ought not to cut off, nor abolish Poetry, which is a Part and member of the Mules and good literature: But when as the strange fables and Theatricall fictions therein, by reason of the exceeding pleasure and singular delight that they yeeld in reading them, do foread and swell unmeasurably, ready to enterforcibly into our conceit to far as to imprint therein some corrupt opinions: then let us beware, put forth our hands before us, keep them back and fray their course. But where there is a Grace and Mule met together, that is to fay, delight conjoyned with fome knowledge and learning: where, I say, the attractive pleasure and iweetnesse of speech is not without some fruit, nor void of utility, there let us bring in withall the reason of Philosophy, and make a good medly of pleasure and profit together. For as the herb Mandragoras growing neereunto a Vine doth by infusion transmit her medicinable vertue into the wine that commeth of it, and procureth in them that drinke afterwards thereof, a more mild defire and inclination to fleep foundly: Even fo, a Poem receiving reasons and arguments out of Philosophy, and intermingling the same with sables and sictions, maketh the learning and knowledge therein contained to be right amiable unto young men, and foon to be con-ceived. Which being fo, they that would be learned and Philosophers indeed, ought not to reject and condemne the works of Poetry, but rather fearch for Philosophy in the writings of Poets: or rather therein to practice Philosophy, by using to seeke profit in pleasure, and to love the same: otherwise if they can find no goodnesse therein, to be displeased and discontented, and to fall out therewith. And truly, this is the very beginning of knowledge and learning : for according to the Poet Sophocles,

Lay wellthy ground whatever thou intend: For a good beginning makes an happy end.

First and formost therefore, the young man whom we would induct and traine to the reading of Poesie, ought to have nothing in his heart so well imprinted, nor so ready at hand, as this commonfaying,

Poets all to fay a footh

Are Liars flout, and speake untruth.

And verily as Poets sometimes lye willully, so otherwhiles they do it against their wils: wilfully and of purpole, for that being defirous to tickle and please the eares, a thing which most Readers defire and feek after, they thinke that simple and plaine verity is more austere for that purpose then leasing: For truth recounting a thing as it was done, keepeth to it still, and albeit the is the and thereof happily be unplea ant, yet neverthelesse specth not aside but reporteth it outright: whereas a tale or lye devised for delight, quickly diverteth out of the way, and foon turneth from a thing which grieveth, unto that which is more delightfome. For there is no fong in rime and metre, no trope or figurative speech, no losty stile, no metaphor so fitly borrowed, no harmony, no composition of words, how smoothly soever they run, that carrieth the like grace and is either so attractive or retentive as a fabulous narration well couched, artificially enterlaced and aptly delivered. But as in a picture drawn to the life, the colour is more effectinall to move and affect our lenfe, then the simple purtraying and first draught, by reason of a certaineresemblance it hath to the personage of man or woman, which deceiveth our sudgement Even to in Poems, a lie intermingled with some probability and likelihood of a truth dothercite and ftir more, yea, and please better by far, than all the art and fludy that a man is able to employ either in composing excellent veries, or enditing any polished profe, without enterlarding fables and fictions Poeticall. Whereuponit came to passe, that Socrates, who all his lifetime made great profession to be a defender and maintainer of the truth, being minded upon a time to take in hand Poetry, by occasion of certaine dreames and visions appearing unto him in his sleep: in the enterprife whereof finding himfelie to have no aptneffenor grace at all in devifing lies, did into verse certaine fables of £500, supposing verily there could be no Poesie where there were no lies. Many facrifices we know to have been celebrated without piping and dancing, But never was thereknown any Poetry but it was grounded upon some vaine tables and loud leasing. The verses of Empedocles and Parmenides, the book of Nicander, entituled Theriaca, where he treateth of the biting and stinging of venemous terpents, and of their remedies, The morall fentences of Theognis are writings which borrow of Poetry their loftinesse of stile and measure of fyllables, to beare them up mounted on high to avoid the base foot-pace (as it were) of prose. When as we read therefore in Poeticall compositions, any strange & about thing as touching the gods, demy-gods, or vertue, ipoken by fome worthy perionage of great reriowne, he that beleeveth inch a ipeech, and receiveth it as an undoubted truth, wandereth in errour, and is corrupted in opinion: but he that ever and anon remembreth and letteth before his eyes the charmes and illusions that Poetry ordinarily useth in the invention of lying fables, and can esssoones blesse himfelfe, and fay thus thereto,

O quaint device,O flie and crafty gir, More changeable than spotted Onnces skin:

Why ie fielt thow and yet the brows doft knit?

Deceiving me, jet fem: ft to teach me wit.

He, I say, shall never take harme, nor admit into his understanding any evill impression, but reprehend and reprove himselfe when he feareth Nepume, and standeth in dread, left he shake, cleave, and open the earth, and so discover hell: he will rebuke also himselfe when he is offended and angry with Apollo, for the principall * man of all the Greekes, of whom Thesis complaineth thus * debilled in the Poet Afchylus, as touching Achilles her fon.

Himfelfe did fing and fay all good of me: Himfelfe also at wedding present was: Yet for all this himfelfe and none but he, Hath slaine and done to death my son, also.

He willlikewise represse the teares of Achilles now departed, and of Agamemnon being in hell, who in their defire to revive, and for the love of this life, firetch forth their impotent and feeble hands. And if it chance at any time that he be troubled with passions, and surprised with their enchantments and forcery, he will not flick nor feare to fay thus unto himfelfe,

Make haste and speed, without delay, Recover soone the light of day; Beare well in mind what thou seest here;

And all report to the bed-fare.

Homer spake this in mirth and pleasandy, fitting indeed the discourse, wherein he describeth hell as being in regard of the fiction a tale fit for the eares of women and none elfe: Thefe be the fables that Poets do feigne voluntarily. But more in number there are which they neither device nor counterfeit, but as they are perswaded and dobeleeve themselves, so they would beare us in hand, and infect us with the same untruths, as namely, when Homer writeth thus of Jupiter,

Two lots then of long fleeping death, he did in ballance put, One for Achilles hardy knight, and one for Hector flour: But when he pois dit just in mids, behold, fir Hectors death

Weigh'd downward unto hell beneath: Then Phoebus flope his breath. To this fiction Afchylus the Poet hath aptly fitted one entire Tragedy, which he intituled Psychoftasia, that is to fay, the weighing of Soule, or Ghosts in ballance. Wherein he deviseth to fand at these scales of supiter, Theris of the one side, and Aurora of the other, praying each of them for their sons as they fight. But there is not a man who seeth not clearly, that this is but a made tale and meere fable devised by Homer, either to content and delight the Reader, or to bring himinto some great admiration and assonishment. Likewise in this place:

'Tis Jupiter that moveth war: He is the cause that men do jar.

As also this of another Poet:

When Ged above some house will overthrow, He makes debate 'twixt mortall men below.

These and such like speeches are delivered by Poets, according to the very conceit and believe which they have, whereby the errour and ignorance which themselves are in as touching the nature of the gods they derive and communicate unto us. Semblably, theftrange wonders and marvels of Hell; The descriptions by them made which they depaint unto us by searefull and terrible termes, representing unto us the fantaticall apprehensions and imaginations of burning and flaming rivers, of hideous places and horrible torments: thereare nor many membru were well enough that therein be tales and lies good flore: no otherwise than in means and viands, you shall find mixed otherwhiles huntfull poylon, or medicinable drugs, For neither Homer nor Pindaru, nor Sophocles, have written thus of Hell, beleeving certainly that there were any such things there

From whence she dormain rivers dead of black and findy nights, Caft up huge mights and douds full darke, that other-whelme the light:
Likewile,
The Ocean coaft they failed fill along,
Faff by the clifts of Lencat rock among,
As allo,
Here boyling waves of guife fodeep do fuell,
Where lies the way and downfull into hell.

And as many of them as bewailed and lamented for death as a most pictious and wofffill thing, or feared want of tepulture as a milerable and wretched case, uttered their plaints and griefes in these and such like words:

For sake me not unbivised so,
Nor unbowaited when you go,
Semblably.
And then the soule from body slew,
and as to held so went,
She did her death, her soff of strength and youthfull yeares lament.
Likewise.
Do not me kill be five my time,
for why to see this light
Is sweet: force me not under earth, where nothing is but night.

These are the voices, I say, of passionate persons, captivate before to errour and salle opinions. And therefore they touch us more nearely, and trouble us so much the rather, when they find us likewise possible to be prepared betimes, and provided alwaies before hand to encounter and withstand such illusions, having this sentence readily everinoreresounding in our cares, as it were, from a trunke or pipe, That Poetry is fabulous, and maketh small reckoning of truth. As for the truth indeed of these things, it is exceeding hard to be conceived and comprehended even by those who travell in no other businesses, the search out the knowledge and understanding of the things, as they themselves do consesse. And for this purpose these vertes of Empedacles would be alwairs ready at band, who saith that the depth of such things as these

No eye of man is able to perceive:
No eave to heave, may liprit to conceive.
Like as the eall oof Xenophanes.
Never was man, nor ever will be,
Able to found the verity
Of those things which of God I write,
Or of the world I do endite.

And I assure you, The very words of Socrates in Plato imply no lesse, who protesteth and bindeth it with an oath, that he cannot attaine to the knowledge of these matters. And this will be a good motive to induce young men to give lesse credit unto Poets, as touching their certaine knowledge in these points, wherein they perceive the Philosophers themselves so doubtfull and perplexed, yea, and therewith so muth troubled.

Also the better shall we stay the mind of a young man and cause him to be more wary, if at his fuff entrance into the reading of Poets, we describe Poetry unto him: giving him to understand that it is an art of Imitation, and a science correspondent every way to the seat of painting: and not only must he be acquainted with the hearing of that rulgar speech so common in every mans mouth, that Poesse is a speaking picture, and picture a numbe Poesse but also we ought to teach him, that when we behold a Lizard or an Ape well painted, or the face of The rhear sively drawn, we take pleasure therein, and praise the same wonderfully; not for any beauty in the one or in the other, but because they are so naturally counterfeited. For that which is soule of it selle and ill-favoured in its own nature, cannot be made faire and seemly: but the skill of resembling a thing well, be the same faire, or be it foule, is alwaites commended: whereas contrariwise, bethat takes in hand to purtay an ill-stoured body, and makes thereof a faire and beautiful image, shall exhibite a fight neither seemly nordecent. Some painters you shall have to delight in painting of strange, foolish, and absurd actions: as for example, Timomachus represented in a table the picture of Medea, killing her own children: Theon painted Orestes murthering his own mother: Parrhasius described with his pensil the counterfeit rage and madnesse of Ulisses, and Charephanes purtrayed the wanton dalliance and dealing of men and women together unicemely. With which arguments, and fuch like, a young man is to be made acquainted, that he may learn thereby how the thing it felfe is not praise-worthy, whereof he feeth the expresse resemblance, but the art and cunning of the workman who could so attificially draw the same to the life. Semblably, foralmuch as Poelie representeth many times, by way of imitation, filthy actions, lewd affections, and victous manners : it is the part of a young manto know thus much, That the thing which is admired therein and found to be singular, he ought not either to receive astrue, orprove as good, but to praise it so far forth only as it is befitting the person, or appropriate to the subject matter. For like as when we heare the grunting of a swine, the creaking of a cart wheele, or pulley, the whiftling noise of the wind, or the roaring of the sea, we take no pleasure therein, but are troubled and discontented : but contrariwile, if a merry fellow or jeaster can pretily counterfeit the same, as one Parmeno could grunt like a swine, and Theodorus creake like the faid wheeles, we are delighted therewith. Also, as we shun a diseased person, and a Lazar full of filthy ulcers, as an unpleafant and hideous spectacle to behold: but when we look upon Philatteintry pintrayed by Arifophon; and Queen Jocaffa by Silanian; namely, how they be definited to pine away, and ready to yeeld up the Ghoit, we receive no imalicontentment thereby: even fo a young man when he shall read what the ridiculous jester Thersites, or the amorous and wanton fpoyler of maiden, Sifyphus, or the beatly band Petrochus, is brought in by Poets to fay or do; let him be advertised and infirused to praise the art and sufficiency of the Poet, who knew how to paint the same so lively and naturally; but withall to blame; reject, and detest the acts and con-ditions which are thus represented. For there is a great difference between resembling a thing well, and a thing that is simply good: for when I say well, I meane aprly, decently, and properly: and so acts filthy and dishonest, are fit and beseeming for lewed and unhonest persons. For the shooes of that lame creeple Demonides, which he prayed to God might serve his feet that had stollen them from him, were in themselves misshapen and ill-favoured; howbeit, proper and fit forhim: As forthis speech,

If laws of right and equity In any case may broken be, What man alive would not begin To do all wrong, a Crown to win? And this: Put on thy face, I thee advise, Of him that is just and right wife: But fee no deeds thou do forelet, Whereby thou maist some profit get. · Álio: Unlesse I may my talent gaine As cleare as gift, I am in paine. Likewise: How shall I-live or take repose, In case this talent I do lose ? Nay, fleep I will and feare no hell, Nortorments there, but thinke all well, What wrong I do, what plots I fet, Wicked words they be all, and most sale: how beit, befeeming such as Executes and Ixion were, and becomming well an old Usurer. If therefore we would advertile young men, that Poets write thus, nor as it they praised and allowed such speeches, bur as they know full well that they be leved and naughty, so they do attribute them unto as wicked and godlesse persons, they should meyer take harme by any evill impressions from Poets: but contrariwise, the prejudicate opinion infinuated first, of such and such a man, will presently breed a suspition both of word and deed to be bad, as spoken and done by a bad and vicious person. Such an example is that of Paris in Homer, who sliving out of the battell, went presently to bed to faire Helena. For seeing that the Poetreportech of no man else, but only of this unchastle adulterous Paris, that he lay with his wife in the day-time: it is an evident proofe that he reputed and judged such incontinency to be reproachfull, and therefore made report thereoft to his blame and shame both. In these cases also it would be well considered, whether the Poet himselfe do not give some plaine demonstrations in mplying thus much, that he missiketh such speeches, and is oftended therewith, 48 Menander did in the Prologue of that Comedy, which he intilled Thait.

did in the Prologue of that the uninteen men specifies, and is one old in the Prologue of that Comedy, which he initialed Thais, O lady Mile now help me to endite Of this lobold and unlhame faced gueane, Tet beautiful: who also hath a sprie Per swasses, and with words can carry cleane

The wrongs that she unto her lovers all Doth offer; whom she shutteth out of dores, And yet for gifts she still of them doth call, And picks their purse, which is the cast of whores; She none doth love, and yet the femblance makes

That we see will, poor beart, for all their sales.

And verily in this kind Homer, among all other Poets, doth excell, and useth such advertisements with best discretion: for it is ordinary with him both to premise some reprehension and blame of evill foeeches, and also to recommend the good. And for an instance hereof, in this wife he giverh commendation of a good speech,

And then anon, this fpeech right commendable He fpake, which was both sweet and profitable. Againe, Approaching then, he stood unto him neare, And stated him soone with words that gentle were.

Semblably on the other fide reproving bad and lewd speeches, he in a manner doth protest that he him elfe milliketh of them, and therewith denounceth likewise, and doth intimate unto the readers thus much in effect, That they should make no use thereof, nor take regard, otherwise than of wicked things and dangerous examples: as namely, when he purposed to describe the rude and groffe termes that Agamemnon gave unto the Priest of Apollo, when he abused him unreverently he premited this before;

This nothing pleafed Atreus fon, K. Agamemnon hight; But him he badly did intreat, and use with all despisht.

By this word Badly, he meaneth rudely, proudly, difdainfully, without regard of duty or decency. As for Achilles, he attributeth unto him these rash and outragious speeches, Thou drunken fot and dogs-face that thou art, Thou courage hast, no more then fearefull Hart.

But he inferred withall his own judgement as touching those words in this manner, Achilles then fir Peleus fon, still boyling in his bloud, Gave Agamemnon words again unfeemly and not good.

For it is not like that any thing could be well and decently spoken proceeding from such anger and bitter choler. He observeth the same not in words only, but also in deeds. For thus he saith,

No sooner had he spoke the word, but presently he meant To worthy Hector much disprace, whose body up he hent,

He strips and spoiled it full soon, and then hard by the bed
Of fir Patroclus be at laid, and growling there is spread.
He useth also sitly to the purpose pretty reprehensions after things be done, delivering his own sentence, as it were, by way of a voice given, touching that which was either done or said a little before: As forexample, after the narration of the adultery between Mars and Venus, he reporteth that the gods spake in this fort:

Lewd Acts do never better speed; Lo how the slow and lame

Can overtake him who for strength and swiftnesse hath the name ! And in another place, upon the audacious presumption and proud vaunting of Heller, thus he faith,

These words he spake in bravery and swelling pride of heart, But Lady Juno was diffleas'd, and tooke them in ill part. Likewise as touching the arrow that Pandarus shot,

No some Pallas said the word, but food so man,

He was perfusaded, and therewith streight wases to shoot began.

And these be the sententions speeches, and opinions of Poets, by them expressy uttered, which any man may soon find and easily discerne, if he will but take heed and give regard unto them. But yet over and befides thefetestimonies, they furnish us also with other instructions by their own deeds. For thus it is reported of Euripides, that when upon a time some reviled Ixion, and re-proached him by the termes of Godlesse, Wicked, and Accursed: he answered, True indeed, quoth he, and therefore I would not luffer him to be brought from the Stage, before I had fet him fast upon the wheele, and broken both his armes and legs. True it is, that this kind of Doctrine in Homer is after a fortmute and not delivered in plaine and expresse termes: but if a man will confider more nearly, even those fables and fictions in him, which are most blamed and found fault withall, there may be four d therein a profitable instruction, and covert speculation: And yet some there be who wrest and writh forcibly the said sables another way by their Allegories, (for to they call in these daies those speeches wherein one thing is spoken and another meant, whereas in times past they were termed Hyppor ac. for the hidden meaning couched under them) wherby they would make us believe that the fiction as tou hing the adultery of Mars & Venus fignifieth thus much that when the Planet of Mars is in conjunction with that of Venus in some Heroscopes and Nativities. such persons then borne shall be enclined to adulteries: but if the Sun do then arife, paffe, and overtake them, then such adulteries are in darger to be discovered discovered and the parties to be taken in the very act. Now as touching Jung, how the embellisherh and adorneth her selfe before Jupiter, as also the fiction and sorvery about the needle-workegirdle and Tissue which she borrowed of Venus, they would have it to significa certaine purging and clearing of the aire, as it approacheth neare to the fire: as if the Poet himlelfe gave not the interpretation and exposition of such doubts: For in the tale of the adultery of Venus, he meaneth nothing elfe, but to teach them that gave eare thereto, how wanton muficke, lalcivious fongs, and speeches grounded upon evill arguments, and containing naughty matters, corrupt our manners, induce us to a luxurious, loofe, and effeminate life, and cause men to be subject unto pleasures, delights, sensuality, and lust, and given over to the love of women: as also,

To change efisoons their beds of costly price, Their rich array hot baines, and each device.

And therefore the same Homer bringeth in Wyffes, commanding the Musician, who sung to the Harpe, in this wife,

Digreffe, good fir, from such lend fongs, and ballads vaine as the fe,

Sing rather of the Trajan horfe: You hall us therein please:
Giving us thereby a good in trush on that Minhrels, Musicians, and Poets should receive the matter and argument of their compositions from wisemen, lober, sage, and vertuous. And as touching that fable of Juno, he shewed how the love, favour, and acquaintance which women win of men by charmes, forceries, and enchantments with fraud and deceit, is a thing not only tranfitory and of small continuance, unlivre, and whereof a man hath soon enough, and is quickly weary but allo that which many times turneth to hatted, anger, and enmity, io foon as the prefent pleature is once palt: For thus threatneth Jupiter, and faith,

Thou shalt then know that wanton love and dalliance in bed,

Whereby hou er ft hast me deceived, shall ferve thee in small sted.

For the shew and representation of wicked degals, if there be propounded with all the shame and softe which befalleth unto them that have committed the same, doth no hurtar all, but rather much good unto the hearers. As for Philosophers verily, they use examples taken out of histories, to admonish and instruct the readers, even by such things as be at hand, and either are or have been really so: but Poets do indeed the same, and in effect, how beit they devise and invent matter of their own heads, they seignfeathles, I say, fitting their purpose. Certes, like as Melambius said, between bord and good earnest, that the City of Athems tood upright on foot, and was preferved by meanes of the division, discord, and trouble which was among Oratours and Politicians; for that all the Citizens learned not altogether to a fide, nor bare levelly upon one and the same wall, and so by reason of the variance which reigned among the States men, there was evermore some one counterpoise or other, weighing even against that which endamaged the common-weale : even so the contradictions that are found in the writings of Poets, which draw the affent and beliefe of the readers reciprocally to and fro, and leave matters ambiguous and doubtfull, are a causerhar they be not of sogreat moment and weight, as to endamage or endangermuch. When as therefore we meet with such repugnant places among them, which being laid neare together do imply evident contrarieties, we ought to encline to the fafer fide and favour the better part. As namely in these verses,

The Gods in many things, my fon, Have men deceived and them undone. But contrariwife, what faith the son againe? Sir, that's foon faid: mens fault t'excufe. Nothing more ready, than Gods t' accuse, Likewise in one place : In flore of gold thou fouldst have joy:

And count allknowledge but a toy. But elsewhere:

Absurdit is in goods to flow, And no good thing besides to know. Moreover when we read: How then? should I for Gods cause die?

We must be ready with this,

Wintelly 2 for love of God I judge
Wonght no fervice for to gradge.
These and such like divertities of doubtfull sentences, are soon assoyled and dissolved, in case, as I have before faid, we direct the judgement of young men to adhere unto the better part. But fay, we light upon tome wicked and ungodly speech, without any answer adjoyed thereto for to refell the same presently: what then is to be done? Surely we must consure it, by opposing contrary sentences of the same author in other places: neither are we to be angry or offended with the Poet in this case; but rather thinke they be words either merrily spoken, or only to represent the nature of some person, and with him only to be displeased. Moreover, against these sictions in Homer, when he reported how the gods fall together by the eares, and throw one another down: or that they be wounded in some battell by the hands of mortall men: also that they be at variance and debate: you may if you will by and by oppose that which he himselfe speakets in another place, and so beat him with his own rod faying thus unto him,

You know fir if you lift, iwis To tell us better tales than this.

And verily you both utter better words, and thinke of better matters otherwise in these places:

The Gods in heaven do live at eafe: They know no trouble nor difeafe. Allo: Whereas the Gods in bliffe and joy Do ever live without annoy. Likewife:

The Gods them selves are void of care:

Sadneffe and forrow mens lets they are. For these are the true and safe conceptions which we ought to have as touching the Gods: And for all other fabulous fictions and attributes given unto them, they have been devised only to give contentment to the readers, or to move their affections. In like case whereas Euripides

> Gods over men, having power and mastery, Abuse and deceive them with wiles and sophistry.

It were not amisse to alledge and inser that which he writeth better and more truly in another place:

If Gods do harmesor what doth not beseeme, No Gods in truth we are them for to deeme.

Also when Pindarus speaketh very bitterly and eagerly in one place, tending altogether to re-

All meanes and plots we may addresse, To worke and compasse our foes distresse.

We may come upon him againe and answer thus: But you good Sir elsewhere affirme, That

The joy we gaine by fraud and treachery, Turnes in the end to woe and mifery.

Moreover, when we heare Sophocles in this fong:

Lucre alwayes full pleasant is and sweet,

Although it come by falle meanes and unmeet, Reply we ought and fay thus: We have heardyou fing inanother tune:

Deceitfull lies and false language,

Bring forth no fruit that will beare age Furthermore, to encounter these speeches which are delivered as touching riches:

Pow'rfull is riches to win forts steepe and high,

As well as places most plaine and accessible, Whereas those pleasures which ready be and nigh To hold and enjoy, far more is impossible.

And why? a tongue that smooth and filed is, Will cause a man foule and unpersonables Of no regard, whose parts be all amisse

Faire for to seeme, full wise and commendable.

The Readermay alledge many oppositesentences of Sophocles, and these among the rest: I fee no cause, but men in poverty,

May be advanc'd to place of dignity.

A man is not the worse for his poverty, In case he hath both wisdome and honesty.

What joy, what grace can come of worldly pelfe, If first by shifts a man to it attaine:

And then with restless e cares torment himselfe, And take bad courses the same to maintaine?

And Menander verily in one place hath highly praised and extolled sensual lust and concupi-scence, whereby he set them forward who are of an hot nature, and of themselves prone to voluptuouineffe, namely, in these and such like amatorious words:

What creatures sorver do live and see The fun light joy, that common treasure, Are all, have been, and ever shall be Subject and throll to flesh pleasure.

Howbeit, in another the same Poet hath turned us about and for libly drawn us unto honesty, repressing and briding the infolent fury of a loose and luxurious life, saying in this wise:

A filthy life, thou pleasant for the while, Withshame at last, doth all delights defile.

These savings are in some fort contrary to the former, but far better and more profitable every way. And therefore the fetting together and confideration of such contradictory sentences will bring forth one of these two effects: for either it will draw young mento the better way, or at least wife derogate the credit of the worfe.

But if peradventure it come to passe that the Poets themselves do not solve and salve those strange and absurd sayings, which they seem to set abroad: it were not amisse to oppose against them the contrary fentences of other famous authors: and when we have weighed and compared them in ballance, to make proofe thereby which are the better. As for example, if happily Alexis the Poet hath prevailed with some by these verses of his:

If men be wife, above all they will chuse By all means their pleasures to compasse and use. Whereof there be three most powerfull and rife, Which wholly possesse and accomplish our life, To eate, to drinke, to follow venery:

As for the rest, I hold access ary.

We must call to mind and remember, that the sage Socrates was of another opinion and spake. the contrary: for he was wont to fay, that the wicked lived for to eate and drinke; but the vermous did both eate and drinke to live. Semblably, to meet with this verse of the Poet who ever it was that wrote thus:

To make thy part good with a person lend, Fight with like lewdneffe, and be thou as fhrewd.

Bidding us in some foreto accommodate and frame our selves like to the lewd and wicked: we may be ready with that notable Apophthegme of Diogenes, who being asked how a man might be revenged best of his enemy, answered thus, if (quoth he) thou shew thy selfe a good and honest man. The wildome also of the said Diogenes we must set against the Poet Sophoeles, who troubled the minds and consciences of many thousands with distrust and despaire, by writing these verses as touching the religion and confraternity in the Mysteries of Geres:

How happy men, and thrice happy are they Whose fortune it is, the secrets to see Of Mysteries so sacred: and straight-way Down into hell, for to descend with glee:

For they alone in bille spall live for ay:

The rest in bale small suffer paine alway.

How now, quoth Diogenes, when he heard such veries read: Saiest thou so indeed? And shall Paracian the notorious thiefe be in better state after this life when he is once departed, only because he was entred and professed in the orders of this confraternity, than good Epiminondas? As for Timotheus, when upon a time in the audience of a full Theatre, he chanted a Poem which he had compiled in the honour of Diana, wherein hestiled her with the Attributes and Epithets of Menas, Thyas, Phaebas, and Lyffas, which fignifie Furious, Enraged, Possessed, and starke Mad: Cinnessas presently cried aloud unto him, I would thou hadst a daughter of thine own with such qualities. The like elegant answer Bion is reported to have made unto I heognis. For when Theognis came out with these veries,

A man held down with poverty Can nothing do or fay: For why? his tenque wants liberty, And fomewhat dothit stay.

Bion hearing them, How commeth it then to passe, quoth he, that thou thy selfe being but a beggar keepest such a practing as thou dost, and with thy vaine babling and garrulity troublest our

Moreover, we must not in any wife omit and let passe the occasions which are ministred out of the words and sentences either adjoyning or intermingled with those speeches, for to reforme and correct the same: But like as Physitians are of opinion, that not with standing the greene Flies Cantharides be of themselves venemous and a deadly poylon; yet their wings and feet are helpfull and wholiome: yea, and of vertue to frustrate and kill the malice of the said slies: even so in the Poems and writings of Poets, if there be one Noune or Verbe hanging to a sentence that we feare will do harme, which Noune or Verbe may in some sort weaken the said hurtfull force, we are to take hold thereof, and to Rand upon the fignification of such words more at large, as some do in these verses,

This honour due to wretched men we keep, Our haire to cut, and over them to weep. As also in these, We men, alas most miserable, live

In paine and griefe, this lot the gods do give.

For the Poet doth not simply affirme that the gods have predessinate allmen simply to live in wee and forrow, but this he speaketh of foolish and with file folke, who being ordinarily lewd and naught, and therefore milerable and wretched for their wickednesse, he is wont to call senses and di Cueus.

Another way there is befides, to turn the doubtfull and suspected sentences in poetical writings to the better fenie, which otherwise might be construed in the worse part: namely, by interpreting words to the fignification wherein they are usually taken: wherein it were better to exercile a young man, than in the interpretations of oblique termes, which we call Glosses. And verily a point this is favouring of great learning, and full befides of delectation: as for example, To know how the word protogram in Poets signifieth, is as much to say, as ill death, or a badend; for that the Macedonians me to call death dayds. Likewise the Lolians do terme victory which is archieved by long stiffering, continuall perseverance and abiding, xaqqavib. Also, among the Dryopium, those be named 10 vai, who with other are called Damones, i.e., Saints or Heavenly wights. Furthermore it is not only expedient, but necessary also, if we would receive good, and not harme, by the reading of Poets; to know (e. tainly, how and in what fignification they take the proper names of gods, as also the appellative words of good and evill things. Likewise what they meane by the vocables 4020, i.e. the foule; or wife, i.e. fatall definie, Namely, whether these termes be taken by them in one sense, or have many significations? The same is to be said of many other words besides: for example sake, this Noune Tixos sometimes signifieth an adifice or dwelling honle, as when Homer faith, Sixov's i Licogov. To the house built with an high roofe. Otherwhiles it betokeneth goods and substance: as in this peece of a verse.

i Sierci por Sixos. My house is eaten i.e. My goods are wasted and consumed.

Also this word gioros is taken in one place for life; as namely in these verses;

. άμενήνωσεν 👫 🧞 αίχμιν nuavoχαιτα ποσειβιων βιότοιο μεγήρας. God Neptune with his haire fo blacke, envying him long life, Despightfully his daies cut short, and ended all the strife. But in another for goods and riches: to wit, Biotor Se of anno Educe. Mean while do others frend my goods.

Semblably the Verbe and en, you shall find put for to fret, be discontented and ill apayed : as the Poet writeth thus;

'Ω૩' દવ્યને' મંઈ' તેર્રાઇક જે તેમદβή σα το, τώς ετο d' divos.

Which said she seemed male-content, And wounded so, away she went.

And yet it is used sometime for to joy and vaunt : as namely in the same Poet;

n davers ori Teor evinnous tov adeithu. And do youbrag and boast so much indeed, Poore Irus that you beate in beggers weed.

In like fort the verbe bod (147, fignifieth either to move or fir with great violence: as in Euripides.Kn res องฝรั่งห เร็ สามาหารเทียสมอร.

A whale out o'th' Atlanticke sea, we might desery from land Most forcibly to swim, and then to shut himselfe on land.

Or to fit down and take repole: as for example, when Sophocleslaith thus,

Tiras 763' si Seas Tas Se por Soalers, . intrecors xxddorory eferequious.

My friends, what meane you in this wife fo strangely for to sit,
With branches daght about your heads, which suppliants do besit?
Moreover it is very pretty and commendable, when a man meeteth with words of divers acceptions, to make the thereof accordingly, and to accommodate them to the prefent occasions and tubject matters: like as the Grammarians teach us to do in vocables that admit fundry senfes; as for example,

Here the Verbe diren fignifieth sauven. i.e. to praise: and yet now in this place (to praise) is as much to say, as to refute and reject: Like as in our common and daily speech we use to say, καλώς "Zu.i.e. Tis well: or when we bid zugur, i.e. Farewell it meaning by theletermes that we like not of a thing or will none of it nor accept thereof. And hereupon it is that some say, Proferpina is called exam, which is as much to fay as a goddeffe blamed and to be found fault with. This difference then, & diffinction in the Ignifications of words is principally to be observed in matters that be more ferious and of greater confequence, to wit, in the names of gods. To begin therefore with them let us advertile and teach young men, that Poets in using the names of gods, fometimes meane thereby their very nature and effence: otherwhiles they attribute the homonymy of the same names, to the powers and vertues which the gods do give, and whereof they be the authors. And here there presenteth himselfe unto me the Poet Architectus, when in his prayer he faith thus;

KAUDI dvaž nodise, &C. O Vulcanking be gracious anto me, And heare my prayers, thus kneeling on my knee Devoutly: Grant, I fay, this my request As thou art wont to whom thou lovest best.

It is very cleare and evident that he doth invocate the god Vulcan himselfe, and calleth him by his proper name. But when he bewaileth his fifters husband, who perished and was drowned in thesea, by which accident he want his due sepulture, he saith; that he could have borne this calamity and misfortune the better.

If that his head and lovely limbs In pure white cloaths iclad, As doth befeeme a faire dead corps, Vulcan consumed had.

By which word Vulcan, he meaneth fire, and not the god himselfe. Againe, when Euripides in his oath with these words,

By Jove I sweare, and blondy Mars him by, Who beare great fway among the stars insky.

Certaine it is that he speaketh of the very gods Jupiter and Mars: But when Sophocles faith:

Certaine it is that net peaketh of the very gous Juhier and Mary: Bit when Sophol Full blind is Mars.faire Dame! (I [ay] and not bing he doth fee,
But the wild bore he havock, makets and works; all misery.
You must understand that he speaketh of war: Like as in these verses of Homer:

Whose bloud along Scamanders streame . So deeply died in red, That black againe it is therewith, now Trenchant Mars hath fied.

It is meant the edge of the fword and other weapons made of braffe and fleele: which being fo, and confidering that there be many other words of double and divers fignifications, we ought so learne and beare in mind, that the very names of dies and zlues, which fignifie Tupiter, in one place they attribute to the god himselfe, in another to Fortune, and oftentimes to Destiny and Farall necessity. For when they say,

Zeŭ máres idnony pediay. O Jupiter who from Ida hill Dost reigne as King and worke thy will. Ω Ζευτίς ώναι φησί συ σοφώτες . O Jupiter who dare avow

That he can wifer be than thou. Plaine it is that they meanenothing else but the god Jupiter himselfe. But when they give the Denomination, Aid, to the causes whereupon all things depend, and do say in this wise:

And many a flout and valiant knight who fought in pitched field,

DIDG S' ETERMETO BURN.

Surely we must understand by Jove fatall destiny: For we must not imagine that the Poet thinketh Godto devise and practice any evil against men: but he given to so understand by Jove fatall destiny: way as touching the Fatall necessity of all humane affaires, that Cities, Armies, and Generall Captaines are predestined to fortunate successe and victory over their enemies, it hep'be wise and governe their affections well. But contrariwise, if they be passionate and fall into errours and mildemeanours, growing to quarrels and debates one against another, as these did of whom the Poet spake it cannot be avoided but they shall commit many outrages, breed troubles and confusion, and at the last come to an unhappy end:

For by Fatall necessity, And Destiny inevitable :

Bad counsels of iniquity
Bring forth fruits therto answerable.

Now whereas the Poet Hesiodus bringeth in Prometheus, perswading his brother Epimetheus

To take no gifts in any wife Which Jupitet from heaven hath fent: But them alwaies for to despife And send them back as discontent.

Heuseth the name of Japiter for the pullance of Fortune: for by the gifts of that god, he meaneth the goods of Fortune, to wit, Riches, Martiages, States, and Dignities, and generally all outward bleflings: the poffersion whereof is unprofitable unto those that know norhow to use them well. Effeeming therefore no better of Epimethew than of a lewd and foolish fellow, he supposeth that he ought to take heed, and beware of prosperity, whereby he was like to receive hurt and loss yea, and to come unto a mitchiefe in the end, Semblably, when the same Poet saith:

Reproach no man while that you live With poverty which gods do give.

He understandeth hereby the gitt of the gods, a thing meer casuall and comming by Fortune: implying thus much, that those men are not to be blamed and accused, who by some missortune are become poore: but rather that poverty proceeding by o canon of floath idlenesse, ease, delicate wantonnesse, wastefull and foolish expences, is shame-worthy and reproachable. For Poets and others being not acquainted with the word Fortune, which as yet was not in ule, and knowing full well, that the power of this variable and inconstant cause, ranging disorderly as it did without any certaine purpole and determinate end, was mighty, and could not possibly be avoided by any humane wit, reason and policy, they expressed the same by the names of the gods: much like as wein our dayly speech and ordinary language, are wont commonly to give unto divers actions and affaires, to the conditions, natures, and manners of fundry perions, to speeches and orations; yea, and (beleeve me) to men themselves, the termes of Heavenly and Divine. Well, a very good and expedient meanethis is whereby we areto reforme and correct many fentences and veries, which leeme at the first fight to carry with them any absurdity and incongnity, as touching Jupiter : as namely thele,

Two tuns within the entry stand Of Jove his house with lots both full: One hash successe and winning hand, The other losses sorrowfull.

As judge aloft sat Jupiter without regard of oath Or covenant: and showed signes of mischiefe to them both.

And then began the mischiefes all of Greeks and Trojans both, For Jupiter his pleasure wrought, and with each side was wroth.

All this we must interpret either of Farall deftiny or of Fortune, porent causes both, which neither are comprehensible within our understanding, nor yet evitable within the compasse of our power. But where we read of any thing attributed unto Jupiter, which is conformable to reason, hath semblance of truth, and is beseeming his person, there we are to thinke that the said name fignifieth the god himselfe: as for example,

Sir Hector then advane'd himfelfe, and all the ranks beside Of Greeks did brave, expecting who his challenge would abide. Only the fon of Telamon, Ajax that worthy knight, He did avoid: for Jupiter anto him had a flight.

Such great affaires of mortall men Are manag'd aye by Jupiter: But smaller matters now and then To petty-gods he doth refer.

Furthermore, we ought to have a diligent eye to other words, which may be turned and transferred to many things, and are taken in divers lenses by Poets. Of which fort is the name of Agent. t.e. Vertue. For by reason that vertue not only causeth men to be wise, prudent, just, and honest both in word and deed: but also purchaseth ordinarily unto them honour, glory, authority, and reputation in the world: therefore they give the name of Vertue unto renowne, power, and might: like as the Olive fruit, they call by the name india, i.e. Olive tree, and the Beech-mast they terme also ony às as well as the Beech tree Our young man then, as he readeth in a Poet,

The gods before vertue have fet Labourstravell, and painfull swet. Orthus, The Greeks by vertue then down bare Their Squadron thick and battell square. Likewife, If die we must most glerious is death;

For vertue when we spend our vitall breath, presently ought to conceive thus much, That all is spoken of the best, most excellent, and divinest habitude in us, which we understand to be the very rectifude and rule of reason and judgement, the height and perfection of our reasonable humane nature, yea, and the disposition of the soule, accordant with it selfe. But when he readeth againe these other veries there, Vertue im men Jove causeth for to grow Andfade: by him it doth both ebbe and slow. As alfo, Where worldly wealth and riches are, Vertue and fame follow not fur.

let him not by and by fer him down, and by occasion of these words have the rich in wonderfull great admiration, asif they could anon buy vertue for money, and with their wealth have it at command: let him not thinke, I say, that it lieth in the power of Fortune, either to augment, or to diminish vertue: but rather deeme thus, and make this construction, that the Poet under the name vertue, fignifieth Worthip, Authority, Power, Prosperity, or some such matter. For so, the word xuxture is fometimes taken by them in the native and proper fignification, for a naughty and wicked disposition of the mind, as when He foodus writeth thus,

Of wickedne Ic aman may evermore Have foy on great and plenteous store.

But otherwhiles it is used for some other evill calamity or insortunity, as by Homer,

Men quickly age and waxen old, is assignity by hynger and cold, or c.

And much were he deceived, who should perswade himselfe that Poets take beatstude and bleffednesse, which in Greeke is called sufaquoria, so precisely as Philosophers do s who understand thereby, an absolute habitude, and entire possession of all good things, or rather an accomplished periodion of this life, holding on a prosperous course according to nature: for many times Poets abuse this word, calling a man bleffed and happy, who is rich in worldly goods; and giving the terme of felicity and happinesse unto great power fame, and renowne. As for Homer, he ufeth verily these termes aright and properly in this verile,

Although much mealth I do hold and enjoy,

Tet in my heart I take no bleffedjoy.

So doth Menander, when he writerh thus,

Of goods I have, and money great store, And all men call me righ therefore: But yet how rich foever I feeme,

Happy and bleft nove doth me deeme. Ewigides maketh great dilorder and continion when he writeth in this fort s

I would not have that bleffed life Wherein I find much pains and griefe.
Allo in another place: Why dost thou honour tyrauny, Happy injustice and villing?

Unleffe a man, as I faid before, take these termes as spoken metaphorically, or by the figure xate gengis, i.e. the abusion of them, otherwise than in their proper sense. And thus much may serve as touching this point.

Now for this that remaineth behind, young men would be put in remembrance and admonished not once, but oftentimes, that Poesic, having for het proper subject an argument to be ex-pressed by imitation; howsoever she useth the ornaments and beautifull surniture of significantive ipeeches, inletting out and describing those matters and actions which are presented unto her, yet neverthelesse she doth not forgothe resemblance and likelihood of truth. Forthat imitation indeed delighteth the Reader to long only as it carrieth some shew of probability. And there-fore that imitation which seemeth not altogether to square and depart from the rule of verity, doth expresse the signes of versues and vices both at once, entermingled one with another in actions, Such is the Poem and composition written by Homer, which reflect not in the frame opinions and paradoxes of the Stoicks, who hold, That neither any evill at all can fort with vertue ne yet one jot of goodnesse with vice: but he hath bidden farewell to such precise positions. ons; namely, That a toolish and levyd person, in all his actions, when and wheresoever, doth offand and fin: and femblably, the wife and vertuous man, at all times, and in all places, cannot chile birdo every thing well. There are the principles which the xoicks fchools refound with-all. Howheir, in the affaires of this world, and in our dayly life and convertation, as Emipidei

> It cannot be in every point, That good and bad fould be disjoynt: But in all actions we dayly fee, One with another medled will be.

But the art of Poetry, setting apart the truth indeed, useth most of all variety and sundry formes of phrases. For the divers imitations are they that give to sables that vertue to move affections. and passions in the readers: these are they that worke strange events in them, even contrary to their opinion and expectation: upon which ensueth the greatest wonder and altonishment, wherein lieth the chiefe grace, and from whence proceedeth the most delight and pleasure, whereas, contrariwife, that which is simple and uniforme, is not patheticall, nor hath in it any fiction. Hereupon it is that Poets bring not in the same persons alwaies winners, alwaies happy and doing well: and that which more is, when they feigne that the gods themselves meddle in mens affaires, they describe them not without their pations, nor yet exempt from errours and faults, for feare left that part of their Poefie which firreth up the affection, and holdeth in fulpense and a lmiration the minds of men, should become idle and dull, for wart of some danger and adverfary as it were to excite and quicken it: which being (0, let us bring a young man to the reading of Poets workes, not forefalled and possessed before with such an opinion as touching those great and magnificall names of ancient worthies, as if they had been wite and just men, or vertuous Princes in the highest degree of perfection. & as a man would say, the very Canon nule, and patterne of all vertue, uprightnesse, and integrity: Otherwise he should recivily great damage thereby, in case, I say, he were of this mind to approve and have in admirational that they did or said as singular; and to be offended at nothing that he heareth from them: neither would he allow of him, who blameth and sindeth fault with them when they either do or say such things as these.

Of ther Jove, OPhabus bright, OPallas maiden pure:
That you would albring this about, and make us twaine secure,
That not one Trojan mighe slope, nor Greeke remaine alive
But we two Knights: That we (I say) and none but we blive
May win the honoar of this war, and only reap the joy
Of victory, to raze the walls and stately tow'rs of Troy.
Also,

I heard the voice most pittions of Priams daughter bright, Castandra faire, a wire in chaste: whom me for to despish; My wife dame Clytemnettra slew by cruels rechery, Because of as shorted one was for sin of lechery.

Likewife,
With concebine of Father mine she counsel ame to lie,
The old mans curse that I might have: perswaded, so did I.
And inanother place,
O supiter, whom mends father call,

Thou art a God most mischievous of all. Let not a young man in any wife be accustomed to praise such speeches: neither let him seeke any colourable pretences to cloake and excuse wicked and infamous acts: he must not be studious and curning in such inventions, to shew therein his subtilty and promptnesse of wit. But rather he is to thinke thus, that Poesie is the very imitation of manners, conditions, and lives, yea, and of men, such as are not altogether perfect, pure, and irreprehensible, but in whom passions, falle opinions, and ignorance beare some sway, yet so, as many times by the dexterity and good-nesse of nature they be reformed and disposed to better waies. When a young man then is thus prepared, and his understanding so framed, that when things are well done and said, his heart is moved and affected therewith as by some heavenly instinct: and contrariwise, not well pleased with lewd words or deeds, but highly offended thereat, certes, such instruction of his judgement will be a meanes that he shall both heare and read any Poems without hurt and danger. But he that admireth all, and applieth himselfe so, that he embraceth every thing, he, I say, that commeth with a judgement devoted and enthralled to those magnificent and heroick names, like unto thole disciples who counterseited to be crump-shouldred, & bunch-backtlike their Master Plato, or would needs flut, stammer, and maffle as Aristorie did: furely such a one will take no great heed, but soone apprehend and entertaine many evill things. Moreover, this young beginner of ours ought not to be affected after a timorous and superstitious manner, as they are who being in a temple, feare and dread every thing, and are ready to worship and adore whatsoever they see or heare: but boldly and confidently to pronounce and say, as occasion serveth. This is ill done. or not decently spoken: no lesse than to give his acclamation and consent to that which is well and feemely either faid or done. As for example, Achilles feeing the fouldiers how they fell fick daily in the Campe, and not well appaid that the war was thus drawn out in length, especially to the hinderance of his own honour, being a martiall man, of great prowesse and renowne in the field, assembled a Councell of war, and called the Greekes together. But, (as he was a man otherwise well seen in the skill of Physick) perceiving by the ninth day past, (which commonly is criticall, and doth determine of maladies one way or other by course of nature) that it was no ordinary difease, nor proceeding from usuall causes, stood up to make a speech, not framing himselfe to please and gratifie the common people, but to give counsell unto the King himselfe in this manner:

I thinke we must when all is done, O Agamemnon Liege, Returne againe without effelt to Greece, and leave our Siege.

This was well and wisely faid: these were modeli and temperate words becomming his person:
But when the Prophet or soothsiaer faid, that he sared much the wrath and indignation of the mightiest man and soveraign Commander of all the Greeks, he answered then never a wise or so ber word; for having sworne a great oath, that no man should be so hardy asto lay hand on the said prophet so long as he remained alive, he added moreover and said full uniernely,

No, If they shouldst both meane and name King Agamemnon, I wow the same.

Shewing plainly by these words what little account he made of his Prince, and how he contemned soveraigneauthority: nay, he over-passed himselse more yet, and proceeded farther in heat of choler, to lay hand upon his fword, yea, and to draw it forth, with a full purpose to kill the King: which was done of him neither well for his own honour, nor wisely for the good of the State. But repenting himselse immediately,

Into the scabbard then anon he puts his doughty sword:

Minerva gave him that advice, and he obey d ber word.

Herein againe he did well and honefly: for having not the power to extinguish and quenth his choler quite, yet he delayed it well and repressed it, yea, and brought it under the obeysance of reason, before it brake out into an excessive ourrage, which hath been remediselse. Semblably Agamemnon himselse, for that which he did and said in the assembly of Councell, he was worthy to be scomed and laughed at. But in the matter concerning the Damosell Chryseis, he showed more gravity and princely Majesty, than in like case Achilles did: for he, when the saire Briseis was taken from him and led away:

Sat weeping in great agony, Retir'd apart from company.

But Agamemnon himselse in perion conducting her as far as to the ship, delivering up and sending away to her own sather, the woman whom a little before he said that he loved more dearely than his own espoused wise, did nothing unfitting himselse of like a passionate lover. Againe, Phanix being curied by his sather, and betaken to all the hellish siends for lying with his concubine, breaketh out into these words.

I minded once with fivored of mine my fathers blend to fised: But that fombeged my rage reprefs, and put this in my head: How men would cry much finame on me, and namely Grecians all With one voice me a particide or Father-biller will.

Which verses in Homer, Aristarchus was alraid to let stand, and therefore dashed them out, But versly, they serve in that place fitly for the purpose, namely, when Pha is instructed Achistes, what a violent passion anger is, and how there is no outrage but men will dare and do in the heat of choler, when they will not be guided with reason, of directed by the counsell of those that would appeale them. For he bringeth in Meleiger also, who was a pay with his Crizzens, howbeit afterwards pacified: In which example, a she wisely blameth and reproveth such passions: so he praiseth and commendeth as a good and expedient thing, not to beled and carried away therewich, but to resist and conquer them, and to take up betime and report. True it is, that hitherto in these places already cited, there is a manissed difference to be observed: but where there is some obscurity as touching the true sense and meaning of a sentence, we must teach a young man to stay himselfs there and pause upon the point, that he may be able to distinguish in this manner: If Nansseas upon the inst fight of Wyles, a meet changer, falling into the same passion of love with him, as Catops did, and seeking nothing but want on pleasure, as one living daintily, and being now ripe and ready for marriage, utter soolishly these and such like words, and that before her waiting maids:

Othat it were my hap fo brave A Knight to wedwho hath my hear! Othat he would with me wouch fafe For to remaine and not depart!

Her boldnesse and incontinency is to be reproved: but if by his speech and talke she perceithat he was a man of wit and wise behaviour exthereupon wissed in her heart to be his wedded wise and to dwell with him rather than with one of her own country, who could skill of nothing else but to dance, or be a marriner, I cannot blame her, but thinke her praise-worthy. In like case, if when Pendope devileth and talketh curreously with her wooers, who sucd unto her for marriage, and thereupon they court here againe and befow upon her gay cloaths, sich jewels, and other goodly ornaments sit for a Lady, Wiffer her husband rejoyces

That she was well content to take Their gifts, and did to them love makes
As though she would be kind againes
And yet her shews were all but vaine.

If, I say, he joyed in that his wife received their courtes and tokens, and so made a gaine of them, surely he surpassent Polisager the notorious Bavvd, playing his part in the Comedies, of whom there goeth this by-word:

Band Poliager happy man he, That keeps at home in house a she: A heavenly goate whose instuence, Brings in riches with affluence.

But if he did it to have them by that mennes under his hand, whiles they upon hopes of obtaining their fixes, little thought of him how he watched them a fixew duture: then his joy and conident affurance ywas grounded well and upon good reason. Semblaby in the counting that he made of those goods which the Phasesians had landed when they hadlet him on floors; and having so done, spred iatle and departed back agains: if being thus left solitary alone, and finding himselfs storione, he doubted of his estate, and what should become of him, and yet his mind was so set upon his goods that he terred,

Lest part thereof they tooke away,

Whiles that on bore affeep be lay. His avarice were lamentable, nay, it were abominable, I assure you: But if as some do thinke and iay, being not fure whether he were in the Isle Ishaca or no, he supposed that the faiety of his gods and money was a certaine proofcand demonstration of the Phancians loyalty and fidelity. (for never would they have transported him into a strange land but for lucre, nor when they left him and departed would have forborne his goods) he used herein no foolish argument, and his providence in so doing is commendable. Some there be who find fault with this very landing of him upon the shore, in case the Pheacians did it whiles he was asleep indeed: and they fay, that it appeareth by a certaine Chronicle or History among the Tuscanes which they keep by them, that Minites was given by nature to be very drouse; which was the cause that to many he was not affable, and men oftentimes might hardly speake with him. Now if this was no sleep in very truth, but that being both ashamed to fend away the Pheacians who had conducted him over sea, without seasting them and giving them presents and rewards for their kindnesse: and also in feare left if they were icen there still upon the coast, whiles he entertained them so kindly, himfel'emight be difforered by his enemies, he used this pretence of seigned sleep to cover and hide the perplexity wherein he was, or to shift off this difficulty wherein he stood in this case, they allow and commend himfor it. In giving therefore to young mensuch advertisements as these, we shall never suffer them to run on still to the corruption of their manners, but rather imprint in them presently a servent zeale and hearty defire to chuse better things, namely, if we proceed directly to praise this, and to dispraise that. And this would be done especially in Tragedies, those I meane, wherein fine words and affected speeches be oftentimes framed to cloake dishonest and villanous deeds. For that which Sophocles faith in one place is not alwaies true:

If that it be a naughty deed, Of it good words cannot proceed.

For even himselfe is wont many times to palliat wicked conditions, yea, and naughty acts with pleatant speeches, and familiar apparant reasons, which carry a probability of sufficient excuse. And even so playeth Euripides his companion, who shewed himselfe upon the same stage: for see you not how he bringeth in Phadra to begin with her husband Thefens? First, laying all the blame on him; as if for looth the vyrongs and abuses that he offered unto her, were the cause that she was enamoured upon Hyppolitus? The like audacious and bold speech he putteth in Helenas mouth against queen Hechba, in that Tragedy which is entituled Troades, objecting unto her, and taying, That the was rather to be punished for bearing such a son as Alexander Paris, who committed the adultery with her. A young man then ought not to accustome himselfe to think any such inventions as these to be pretty gallant, and witty, ne yet laugh at such subtile and fine devices; but to abhorre and detest as much, or rather more, wanton and filthy words, than loofe and dishonest deeds.

Moreover, it would be expedient in all speeches to search the cause whereupon they do proceed; after the example of Cato when he was a little boy: For, do he would whatfoever his Master or Tutour bad; but ever and anon he would be inquisitive and questioning with him the reason of his commandements. And yet vve are not to believe and obey Poets, as we ought either Schoole-masters or Lavy-givers, unlesse the matter by them proposed have reason for the ground : and grounded then it shall be thought upon reason, if it be good and honest : for if it be vvicked, it ought to feeme foolish and vaine. But many of these men there be, vvho are very sharp and curious in fearching and demanding what Hefiodus should meane in this verse,

Whiles men are drinking do not fet

The flagon over the wine goblet. As also what sense may be made of these verses in Homer: Another chariot who mounted is,

When from his own he is alight, Must not his speare and javelin misse But trust thereto, and therewith fight.

But other sentences, ivvis, of greater importance and danger, they admit soone, and give credit thereto, vvithout further enquiry and examination: as for example, at these verses they flick not,

The privity to fathers vice, Or mothers fault reproachable, Will him debale who otherwise Is hardy fout and commendable.

No more than they do at this,

Upon a man, if fortune frowne, His heart therewith must be cast down.

And yet such sayings as these come neare unto us, and touch the quick, troubling our manner and behaviour in this life, imprinting in us perverie judgements, base and unmanly opinions, unleffe we acquaint our selves to contradict each of them in every point, after this manner. And wherefore ought he to beare an abject mind, who is croffed with adverse fortune? Why rather should not he make head againe, and wrestle with her, bearing himselfe so much the more alost, and never endure to be trodden down and depressed by her? What reason is there; that my heart should be down, for that my father was vicious and foolish, in case I be a write and honest man my selfe? Is there greater cause that the ignorance and imperfection of my father should keep me down and discourage me, that I dare not looke up, than mine own knowledge and valour make metake heart and put my felfe forth? He that vvill thus encounter, with stand, and not give way to every speech, turning side, as it were, to every puffe of wind, but rather esteeme that sentence of Heraclitus to be vvell and truly spoken, Poems and Poets.

A foolish and witlesse man is he, With every word who stricken will be.

Such a one, I fay, shall be able to put by and repell many fayings of Poets, that are neither true nor profitable. And thus much as touching those observations which may ferre a young mans turne, that he may read and heare Poets safe vvithout any danger.

But forasmuch as it falleth out, that as in vines many times the grapes lie hidden among the leaves and branches, and cannot be seen by reason that they are covered and shadovved therewith: fo also in poeticall yerses, underfables and fictions there be covertly couched many profitable and vyholsome lessons, which a young man cannot cipy by himselfe, and therefore he milfeth that commodity and fruit which is to be reaped our thereof. Howbeit, we must not suffer this, nor let him turne avvay, and give over: he ought not (I lay) to wander afide, but flick close andfast to those matters especially, which lead unto vertue, and make any thing for the framing or reforming of manners. Invehich regard, I shall not do amisse, if I treat also of this matter briefly; making, as it were, a first draught only, and touching summarily the principall points; leaving long discourses, by way of narration, confirmation, and a multitude of examples, to those that verite of purpole for more sheve and oftentation. First and formost therefore, when a young manknovveth throughly the persons of men and vvomen, their natures also and manners both good and bad, let him then regard and consider well the sayings and doings which the Poet doth attribute aptly unto either of them. As for example, Achilles saith unto Agamemnon these words, although he speaketh them in choler,

For never shall I honor have, Nor equall recompence to you, When populous Troy, that city brave, The Greeks shall force, as they do vow.

But Thersites reviling the selfesame Agamemnon, useth these termes; Much brazen veffell then hast now in many a goodly tent,

Of captive momen eke like choise in beauty excellent, In thy pavilion: whom we Greeks as to our Soveraione

Do give, fo foon as any town by martiall force we gaine. Againe Achilles in another place hath this humble speech,

If Jupiter will be fo good, as to fulfill our joy,

And grant that we one day may win the stately City Troy. But Thersites commeth out with this proud word,

Whom either I or in my fread,

Some Greekeshall bound as captive lead:

Semblably in another place, when inthe review of the armie, Agamemnon, passing along the bands, rebuked and raunted Diomedes, heansvered not againe, nor gave him one crosse vvord: For why he feared in madesty .

The checkes of his dread Majesty.

But Sthenelus, of vvhom no manmade any reckoning, vvas so bold as to reply, and say,

Sir Agamemnon, Atreus Son, forbeare this for to lye, You can, if that you lift with me report a truth : for why? Pronounce I dare, and it avow, we better warriours be

In these daies than our fathers were, by many a degree. The difference which is in these personages, if it be well marked, will teach a young man thus much: That to be modest, temperate, void of pride, and humble, is a most civill and excellent vertue: and contrarivvise it will advertise him to take heed of pride and overvveening; to bevvare also of boatting and vaunting much of himselfe, as a detestable vice. And here in this place, expedient it is and unprofitable to observe the action of Agamemnon: He passed by Sthenelus, and vvould not stay to speake unto him: As for Wyffes, who found himselfe grieved, him he neglected not, but shaped him an answer: For as Homer veriteth,

No sooner he perceived him offended for to be But prefently he spake again, and thus replied he.

For as it is a base and servile thing, and not besceming the Majesty of a Prince to answer every one, and by way of Apology to justifie a thing done or faid; to to delptie and distaine all men, is meere pride and extreme folly. As for Diamedes, he did passing well to hold his peace during the time of the battell, when he was rebuked and reviled by the King but after the fight was ended, he spake his mind freely and boldly in this wise;

You are the first of all the Greeks, who in reproachfull wise Have charged me for my fulle heart, and fearfull cowardif.

Good also it is, to see the difference between a wise man indeed and a naine sooth-sares. who loved to be feen, and to heare himfelfe speak among the multipade, [For Case his without all respect of thuring his time and a fit opportunity, baffed not in publike place, and be foreall the reople to challenge King Agamemonsimpacing directly unto thint, and to no tocher; the cause to the petitience which reigned in the campe. But Nesses, commercially, intending to takken motion as touching the reconciliation and pacifying of Achilles, and to speake directly amounts. point, because he would not seem to blame and accose the King in the audience of the people; namely, that he had passed himtelse in choler, and done amisse, adviseth him in this manner,

To support bid the ancient preves: phis dashyour person fit; And when they are together met; trorder as they fit, Let them upine, Heare their advice, untilockembo foother theft, His counfell take I reed and them therein fee shat you reft.

And after supper he sent forth the Embussadours accordingly. This was the only was to correct a fault and amend that was amisse: whereas the other had been a very injurious accusation, and a contumelious reproofe to his no small diigrace. Furthermore, there would be noted and confidered the divertity that is in fundry nations, and that after this marrier. The Trojans give the charge in battell to their enemies with great thours, out-cries, and exceeding violence : whereas the Greeks

The onfet give with all filence, To Leaders having reverence.

For Souldiers to dread and fearetheir captaines and commanders, at what time at they be ready to joyne battell with the enemy, is a figue both of valour and allo of obedience and military Difcipline. Which is the reason that Plato would inure us to be afraid of rebukes, reproofes, and filthy cers, more than of any travels and dangers. Cano likewile was wontro lay, That he loved those better who blushed and looked red, than the pale-faced. As for promises, there is a proper worke also in them, whereby a man may discerne whether they be wife or foothh, Por Dates promileth inthis manner:

The campe of Greeks I enter will and puffe on fill outright, Mutillio Agamemores ship I come there for so fight.

Contrarivile, Diomedes promiseth nothing of himselfe, only this her laith: That he should feare the leffe, if he were fent with some other to beare him company, Whereby yourney see that Palidence Diffretion, and Forecast be civill vertues beseeming the Greeks; but audacious rashnesse is naught, and fit for Barbarians. The one therefore we must embrace and imitate, the other rejest and cast behind us. Moreover it were a speculation nor unprofitable to marke the affections that befell unto the Trojans, and to Heller at what time as he was ready to enter into combate and fingle fight with Aj_{JR} . Æfchylm being upon a time in place to behold the combares at the Ishmian games, it fell out to that one of the champions was hure and wounded in the very face, whereupon the people that looked on fet up a great cry and shouted aloud; See, quoth he, what which point is been described by the Beholders cry out, but the manhimfelfe that is hurt faith never a word. In like manner, when Homer the Poet faith, that Ajax was no fooner feet in his bright compleat harnels, and armed at all pieces, but the Greeks rejoyced: whereas

The Trojans all for feare did quake, and tremble every joynes

Hector himselfe did feele his heart to beat even at this point. Who would not wonder to feethis difference? The party himselfe who was in danger, felthis heart only to leape, as if he had been (I affure you) to wreftle for the best game, or to run a race for the prize: but they that faw him trembled and shaked all their body over, for feate of the perill wherein their Prince was; and for kind affection that they bare unto him. It is worth the noting also what odds and difference there is between the most resolute or valiant Captaine, and the greatest coward: For it is faid of Therfires, that Achilles of allthat were in the Hoft And alfo Ulysies he hated most.

Whereas Ajax as he alwaies loved Achilles, so he giveth an honourable testimony thereof, when he spake unto H. Hor in this wise,

In fingle fight with me alone what worth; knight we have In Gracian host, thou maist not see besides Achilles brave : Achilles he, the Paragon of Promeffe whom we count, Whose Lions heart undannted yet all others doth formount.

This is a lingular commendation of Achilles particularly: but that which followeth afterwards, is a ptly spoken to the praise of all in generall:

We or well that many of us there be In Campe that dare and can Make head and maintaine fight with thee In combate man to man.

Marke, how he praiseth not himselfe to be the man alone, or the most valourous of all other, but is content to be ranged with many more as sufficient men to make their part good against him. Thus much may serve as touching the diversity of persons, unlesse we will adde this moreover, That of Trojans we read there were many taken prisonersalive by their enemies, but of the Greeks not one: as also that divers of them became humble suppliants to their enemies, and sell down at their feet; namely, Adrastus, the sons of Antimachus and Lycaon: yea, and Heltor himselse besonght Achilles to vouchsafe him buriall: whereas, there was not one of them that did the like: As if thus much were implied thereby, that it is the manner of Barbarians in fight, to make fupplication, to fubmit, to kneeleand lie profifate before the enemy: but of Grecians, either to win the victory by maine fight, orto dye for it.

Moreover, like as inpatturage and freeding, the Bee feeleth upon flowers: the goate feartheth after green leaves and broufeth young buds: the Swine feeketh for roots, and other beafts for the feed and fruit; Even so in reading Poems, one gathereth the flower of the History: another cleaveth to the elegancy of phrase and turniture of words, as Aristophanes was wont to say of

Euripides,

His tongue so round doth please my mind, In stile (o smooth, content I find,

Others there be who affect morall fentences aprly fitted to the reformation of manners. Those therfore with whom now we have to deale, and to whom we direct our speech, we are to admotherence with whom now we have to deate, and to whom we direct on peculiars as to datho-nish that it were a shame and unworthy thing, if either he who setreth his mind upon fables should mark well the witty narrations, and singular fine inventions therein or he that delighteth in eloquence should note deligently the pure and elegant phrase, the artificial thetorick allo, as he readeth: whiles he, that would seeme to affect honour, to study honesty, and to take Poets in hand not for delightspleasure, and pattime, but for the insight of learning, and for thetreasure of knowledge, readeth and heareth carelessely and without fruits, those sentences which are penned and delivered by them to the recommendation of fortifude, temperance and juffice: For as concerning valour and vertue you shall find these verses;

What is befalne fir Diomede, That we forget to fight ? How is it that our hearts be done? Where is our Martiall might? Come neere, fland close unto my side, Great shame it were for us, If Hector now (hould board our ships, Andforce our navy thus.

For to see a most wise and prudent Captaine who was in danger to perish, and to be overthrown together with the whole army, not to be affraid of death, but to feare reproach and shamefull disgrace, the same no doubt will cause a young man to be wonderfully affectionate to vertue and proweffe.

For wisdome and justice these verses serve:

Minerva then took great delight To see the man wise and upright.

Such a sentence as this will give occasion to a young schollarthus to reason and discourse: The Poet here hath devi'ed, that the goddesse joyed not in a rich man, in one that was faile, well-favoured and personable, or mighty in bodily strength: but in him that was prudent and just with all. And in another place where the same goddesse saith, that she will not neglect nor forfake Myffes and leave him deftitute :

For tongue he hath and wit at will: He is both wife and full of skill.

The Poet sheweth plainly; That there is nothing in us but vertue only that is divine and beloved of the gods: if this be true that like will to like, and Naturally every thing delighteth in the Semblable. Now foralmuch as it seemeth to be a great matter and rare perfection, as in truth it is no lesse, to be able to master and bridle anger: certes a greater vertue it is, and a gift more singular to prevent and wifely to forecast, that we fall not into choler, nor fuffer our selves to be surprised therewith: And therefore the readers of Poets ought to be advertised in these points, not coldly, but in good earnest: as namely, how Arbilles, a man by nature nothing meeke, mild and patient, giveth warning unto Priamus to be quiet, and not to provoke him, in these words: Take heed old father I thee reed,

How thou my choler move : I minded am thy son to yeeld: For why? from Jove above A messenger hath warn'd me fo: Beware gray-beard, I fay, Lest that my tent will not thee (ave. But forthwith I thee flay: Although in humble wife thou come. With Suppliants habit dight, And so I do transgresse Joves will, ... And breake the laws of right,

Who also after he had washed the corps of Hellor, and wound it within Funerall cloaths, be-flowed the same with his Own hands in the chariot, before that Friamm his sather should see it, fo mituled as it was,

For feare lest when he saw His son so mangled and beraid In griefe of hearing old father he, Should not himselfe be staid; But with hot words Achilles move In him to heath his frord, Without regard of Jupiter, his hefts, His will and word,

For when a man is apt and prone to anger, as being of nature hor, rough and cholericke, to know himselfe so given, and therewith to prevent, decline, and avoid all occasions of ire, and by the guidance of reason to hold off, in such sort, that even, as it were, against his will, he shall not fall into any passionate fits, is a point of great wildome and fingular providence. After the same manner ought he that is given to wine to be armed against drunkennesse: he also that is by nature amorous, should thus withfland wanton love: Like as Agefilam, who would not abide to be hissed of a beautifull young boy comming toward him and Cyrus, who durt not so much as set his eye upon faire Panthea. Whereas contrariwise, those that be ill nurrured and badly brought up, seeke all meanes and occasions to kindle and enflame their foolish affections, miniftring matter thereto, as fewell unto fine: calting themselves headlong, and that wilfully, into those vices, whereunto they are most prone and ready to fall by nature. But Minfe: not only bride-led and reperfield his own choler when he was chared, but also perceiving by some words of Telemachue his son, that he was angry and harefully bent against lewel persons, he laboured to appeale and mitigate his mood: he dealt with him before-hand, willing and commanding him to be quiet, to forbeare and have patience.

My fon if that by word or deed In mine own house they me abuse, Bite in thine anger, Itheereed, See thou indure, and patience wie : Nay if they draw me by the fact, And out of doores me drag anen, Or their sharpe arrows at me shoot,

See all, Jay mought, what ever is done.

For like as men use not to bridle their horses when they be running in a race, but before they despin their course; even so they that hardly can digest indignities, and upon occasion offered are quickly angry, ought first to be præoccupate with reason: and being thus prepared before-hand, to bring them to the combate.

Over and besides, a young man must not negligently passe over the bare words as he readeth. And yet I speake northis, as though I would have him play upon them, as Cleantherdid, who making semblance to interpret and expound words, would otherwhiles cavill and make sport. For whereas we read in Homor,

Est warte "Idider pediar. & Zet dea Audarais. be called a rad wo water. Chryfippus likewise many times comes in with his bald reasons, without all grace: and this he doth not in jest and meriment, but he would seeme to devise reasons subtilly: and lo forcerh divers words impertinently: as namely, when he wresteth these words, Eutoma Karibusto this sense, as if topora should signific one that was eager and quick in disputa-tion or argument, surpassing others in sorce of eloquence. It were better for us to leave these nice subtilities of words and syllables unto Grammarians for to be scanned, and to consider more nearly other obtervations, which, as they yeeld greater profit, fo they carry with them more pro-bability and likelihood of truth: and namely, to pick fome good out of these verses;

Most crosse unto my mind it is, For taught I am prowesse iwis. Alio Fullwell he knew, to every wight To shew himselfe a curteous knight.

For hereby he declareth evidently, that valour and fortitude is gotten by teaching: as also, he is of opinion, That to be mild, affable and kind to everyman, is a gracious vertue, proceeding from science and reason: wherupon he exhorteth us, not to be carelesse of our selves, but to learne good and honest things, by giving eare unto our teachers: for that cowardise, folly, and perverseincivility, be the defects of learning, and are meere ignorance indeed. Hereto accordeth very well that which the same Poet Homer saith of Jupiter and Neptune : Behold, one father both they had,

And countrey one them bred:

But Jupiter was former borne,

And had the wifer head.

He declareth hereby that wildome is a most divine and princely quality; wherein he placeth • the foveraigne and highest excellency of Inpiter, as esteeming all other good parts to accompany that foveraigne and heavenly vertue. We are likewife to acquaint a young man to heare, and that with no heavy and dull eare, but attentively and with a vigilant mind, there other veries;

Right wife he is, and wot you well, A lie for no good will he tell. Alfo, Antilochus, reputed aye for wife, you are to blame My steeds to hurt, mine honour eke thus for to staine with shame.

You, a worthy knight, to speake so foolishly! I would have said you had, in wit, past all men verily.

These sentences import thus much; That wise men will never speake untruths: neither will they in battell behave themselves as cowards, and use deceit in fight, ne yet charge unjust imputations upon others without reason. Also when the Poet saith, that he through his folly suffered himselfe to be induced and perswaded to break the truce and league, he sheweth plainly, That he thinketh a wife man will in no wife commit unrighteousnesse. The like may of a young man be taught, as touching continency and chastity, especially, if he consider well these verses. K. Proctus wife, Dame Antea, him lov'd and woord foon

For to embrace her (ecretly, and lie with her anon: But never would be yeeld thereto. Belleryphon was wife, And in his heart he never let (uch thoughts for to arife. As also these, Dame Clytemneltra first was chaste, and wanton tricks rejected

All while fire was by reason led, and wisdomes lore directed. In these places we see, that the Poet attributeth the cause of continency and pudicity unto wisedome. Furtherward in those exhortations whereby Captaines use to encourage their souldiers to fight, when the Poet eftloones inferreth these, and such like speeches, Fye, fie for shame O Lycians, You are now light of foot, To run away thus as you do. Iwis it will not boot. A conflict sharpe is toward, Sirs, Wherefore let every one Set shame and just revenge in sight; Else all, I doubt, is gone.

By which words the Poet seemeth to ascribe fortitude unto shamefast nesse and modesty: For that those who are bashfull and ashamed to commit filthinesse, are able likewise not only to overcome volupruous pleasures; but also to undergo all dangerous adventures. By occasion whereof Timothensalfo in his Poem entituled Perfe was moved not unaptly to encourage the Greeks to fight, faying thus:

Have honest shame in reverence, And honour her, I you advise, She helpeth Prowesse, and from hence The victory doth oft arife.

Æschylus alio reputeth it a point of wildome, not to be vaine-glorious, nor desirous to be feen of the multitude, ne yet to be lifted up with the puffes of popular praise, when he describeth Amphiaraus in this wife :

He feeketh not to feeme the very best; But for to be the best in word and deed: He fowed hath within his worthy brest; Infurrow deep, all good and vertuous feed, Which yeeld both leafe and fruit in season due; I meane fage counfell joyn'd with honour true.

For the part it is of a wife manand of good conceit, to stand upon his own bettome, that is to fay, to relt in himselfe, and to thinke highly of his own resolutions and courses as the very best. Thus you see how all good things being reduced unto prudence, there is no kind of vertue but it commeth to a man afterwards, aid is acquired by learning and discipline.

Moreover, like as Bees have this property by nature, to find and luck the mildest and best honey, out of the sharpest and most eager flowers; yea, and from among the roughest and most prickly thornes: even so children and young men, if they be well nurtured and orderly inured in the reading of Poems, will learne after a lore to draw alwaies fome wholfome and profitable doctrine or other, even out of those places which move suspition of lewed and absurd sense; At the first light Agamemnon may seem suspected of avarice and bribery, in that he exempted from warrare that rich * man in regard of the faire mare Ltha, which he gave unto him as a gift and

That unto Troy that stately towne, He might not with him go To serve in armes: but flay at home, And rest there far from woe: Where he might live in solace much, Enjoying all his own: For Jupiter in measure great Had wealth on him bestowen.

Howbeit, as Ariffotle faith, hedid very well in preferring a good mare before a man no better than he was: For laffure you a coward and hartleffe man, flowing in abundance of riches, wallowing in pleasures and desight, and thereby made effeminate, is not in price comparable either to a dog or an affe. Semblably, it may feeme that Thetis did exceeding badly to incite her fon to pleasures, and to put him in mind of the fleshly delights of Yenns: But even there the continency of Achilles is worthy to be considered: who notwithstanding that he had been enamoured of Brifeis, and faw that the was returned againeunto him, yea, and knew then he had not long to live, but that his end was neare; yet neithermade he hade to enjoy his pleasures while he might not as many men use to do, bewalled the death of his friend, fitting idlely the while, doing nothing stall, and neglecting the duties of his calling: but as in forrow and griefe of heart he forbare his delights and pleatures; so in action and conduct of his regiment he shewed himselfe a martiall and valourous man. In like manner Architechus is not commended for this, that being to mourne and lament for the losse of his brother in law who married his fifter, and was perished in the sea, he would seem to conquer his forrow with drinking wine and making good cheere: yet neverthelesse he alledgeth a cause of his doing so, which carrieth some apparence of reason in these words:

For neither can my plaints and teares restore his life and heale: Ne yet my mirth and pleasant sports will harme him ever a deale.

And if he were of this mind, and had reason to thinke, that in following his delights, merriments pastimes and bankets, he could not empaire the state of his brother departed; how should our present condition be the worse, and our affaires go backward, by the study and practice of Philosophy, by managing the government of publike weales, by frequenting the common hall and Courts of pleas, by going down to the Academy and schooles of learning, or by following Agriculture and husbandry?

And therefore the corrections of some poeticall verses by changing certaine words, which practice Cleanthes and Antisthenes were wont to use, are not amisse. For one of them upon a time when the Athenians in full-Theatre took offence and made a great stirre at this verie:

when the Athenians in tull-Theatre took oftence and made a great first at this verse:

The distribution of the view of the three death shame?

Until first prints is for that the cane?

Until first prints is for that the fame?

Quietted all the trouble presently by changing it and pronouncing another in this wise, also yet to y distribute for the fame?

A first prints is not that dath not skill.

As for Cleanthes when he read these verses as couching riches:

क्रिश इ. यह श्रिक्त वर्त्वाचिन, सुर श्वेद्र संस्कृष्ट

Among goodfriends for to bestow, and spend upon your selfe Your fickly body to preferve; thus use your worldly pelfe.

He altered them in this manner, and wrote thus:

woevals te devas ganat' es voges megby Sanávais Streitai,

That you may it to harlots give, and pampring much your felfe: A crasse body overthrow, abusing worldly pelfe.

Semblably Zeno reading these verses of Sophocles, osis de meds ruempor el arcesus rate new sol Sun xa'v encides uning.

Who once in court of Tyrant ferve, become

His flaves anon, though free they thither come.

Turned the same, and wrote this againe,

พ่ม ธัรเป็ชิงอร, สิท ธังธบ์ 500 @ แองที. His flave inis he cannot be, If he at first came thither free.

But you must not understand that he meaneth here by a free man, one that is timorous, but searclesse, magnanimous, and whose heart is not easie to be daunted. What should hinder us then, but that we also by such suggestions and corrections as these may reclaime and withdraw young men from the worfe to the better. Whereas therefore we shall meet with these verses, το δ' ές ι το ζηλωτον άνθεωποις, ότω τόξον μεςίμνης είς ο βέλεται πέση.

The thing that men are for to wish and most desire is this,

That when they shout at their delights, the arrow may not misse.

Notio, but rather thus, τόξον μέριμνης είς ο συμφέρον πέση. That when they aime at their profit,

The arrow may be first to his.

For to reach into thosethings which a man ought not to defire, yea, and to obtaine, and have the fame is pitifull and lamentable, and in no wifeto be wished for. Likewise, when we read in Ho-

Thy part of weale and wee thou must, O Agamemnon, have, For Atreus did not thee beget alwaies to win or fave.

We verily arethus to fay rather,

Thou art to joy, and never for to grieve, But in a meane estate delight to live. For Athens did not Agamemnon get The world at will to have, and find no ler.

Againe when we meet with this verse,

Alas what mischiefe fent to men, Is this from gods above, That they should see what thing is good,

Andit not use nor love?

Sent from gods above? Nay rather, it is a brutish, unreasonable, yea, a wofull and lamentable thing, that a man seeing that which is better, should for all that be carried away and transported to the worle,by reason of intemperance, floath, and effeminate softnesse of the mind. Alio, if we light upon this fentence, Behaviour'tis, and good carriage, That do perswade, and not language.

Not so iwis but manners and words together are perswaite: or rather the manners by meanes of speech, like as the horse is ruled by the bit and bridle, and as the Pilot guideth the ship by the rudder or helme. For furely vertue is furnished with no instrument or meanes so gracious with men and to tamiliar, as speech is.

Moreover, when you encounter these verses;

For wanton love, how flands his mind, To male more or to female kind? Answer.

Both hands are right, with him, where beauty is Neither of twaine to him can come amis.

Nay, rather thus he should have answered:

Where vertue is feated, and continence, Both hands are like, there is no difference.

And to speake truly, and more plainly, in equal ballance poyted he is indeed, inclining neither the one way nor the other: Whereas contrariwise, he that with pleasure and beauty swayeth to and fro, is altogether left-handed, inconstant, and incontinent, Read you at any time this verse?

Φόβος τα δοία τοίσι σώρςοσι βςοτάν. Religion true, and right godline se Makewise men fearfull alwaies more or leste

Inno wife admit thereof, but fay thus:

Θάςσος τὰ δεἰα τοῖ σι σώφροσι βροτών, Religion true, and right godlinesse, Make wise men bold, and hardy, more or lesse.

For intruth, feare and despaire, by the meanes of religion, ariseth in the hearts of none but of fooies, unthankiuil and senselesse persons, who have in suspition and do dread that divine power which is the first cause of all good things, as hurtfull unto them, Thus much concerning correction of fentences.

There is besides an amplification of that which we read, whereby a sentence may be fretched farther than the bare words import. And thus Chrysppus hath rightly taught us how to transfer and ppsy that which was spoken of one only thing, to many of the like kind, and so to make a profitable use thereof : for after this manner when Hesiodus saith,

An oxe or cow a man shall never lose,

If neighbour his be not malicious.
He meaneth by oxe or cow his dog likewise and asse, yea, and all things else that may perish. Semblably, whereas Euripides faith thus,

A flave indeed, whose may we justly call?
Even him, of death who shinkest not at all.

We must understand that he meant and spake, as well of labour, afficition and sicknesse, as of death. And verily, as physitians finding the vertue and operations of a medicine applied and fitted to one malady, by the knowledge thereof can skill how to accommodate the same to all others of the like nature, and nie it accordingly; even so, when we meet with a sentence that is common, and whereof the profit may ferve to many purpoles, we ought not to overfee and negled the manifold use thereof, and leave it as appropriate to one only matter: but to handle the same so, that it may be applied to all of like fort: and herein we must inure and exercise young men, to see and know readily this communion, and with a quick conceit to transfer that which they find apt and know readily this communion, and while a quick concert to transfer that which they find apt and proper in many, and by examples to be practifed and made prompt cheering, fo as they be able to marke at the first bearing the semblable: To the end that when they come to read in Menander this verse,

A bappy man we may him call, Who hath much wealth, and wit withall.

They may very well thinke that in naming wealth, he meant and included Honour, Authority, and Eloquence. Alfo, that the imputation which Hiffercharged upon Achilles, fitting idlely in and Eloquence. Allo, that the imputation with refreshing the words, the Island Server, among the young maidens and damolels, in these words, Tou fir, whole father was a knight,

What sell you me of Pluto and his chievance. For such a god as he with all his puissance I worship not: since that the lewdest wretch In all the world to wealth may quickly reach.

A man may fay as much of glory, of outward beauty, of the rich mantles of a Captaine generall, of a Bishops Miter, and the sacred coronet of a Priest, which we see the wickedest wretches in the world may attaine unto. Againe, whereas the words of another verse import thus much only : That children gotten of cowardise,

Be foule, and those whom men despise. The same verily do imply also, that intemperance, Superstition, Envy, and all other vices and ma-ladies of the mind, bring forthno better off-spring. Now whereas Homer said excellent well in Paris a coward thou art for footh, For all thy face so faire and smooth. And in another, Sir Hector in the prime of age, With lovely looks and faire visage.

(For by these termes and epithites he sheweth covertly that a man deserveth blame and reproach, who is endued with no better grace and gift than beauty) we may well and fitly apply this reprehension to such like things: namely, to pluck down their peacocks plumes, who vaunt and glori-fie themselves for matters of no moment and value: teaching young men thereby, that such praifes as thefe be no better than contumelies and reproaches: As for example, when a man is faluted in this manner: Omost excellent for riches, for keeping a bountifull table, for many servirours : right excellent for fingular good teames of draught oxen, caples and mules, for Hables of fleeds and great horses; yea, or thus moreover to the rest: O surpassing Oratour and of wonderfull eloquence: for to speake a truth, a man is to aime, at excellency, and preference before others in good and honest things, that in the chiefe and principall he may be the highest and formost: as also ingreat matters the greatest: for the reputation that groweth from small and base things is dishonourable; illiberable, vile, and of no worth. And verily this example last alledged, putteth us straightwaies in mind, to consider better the reprehensions and praises which offer themselves especially in the Poems of Homer: For certes, they give us expressly to understand one notable instruction, to wit, not highly to esteeme the gifts either of body or of fortune. For first and formost (in those titles which they give one to another in reciprocall greetings) when they meet and shake hands, the manner is not to salute by the name of Beautifull, Rich, or Strong, but they use such commendations as these;

Ulyffes, O most noble knight, from Jupiter first desgended, Laettes fon for wisdome, and much wit yet most commended.

Allo,

Equalto Jove in wishome and cunning.

Patroclus O fon of Menatius,

Most lovely in my heart and gracious.

Semblably, when they are disposed to revile and taunt, they twit not one another with any defects and imperfections of the body, but touch them expresly with the vices of the mind, after this manner,

To conclude, Ussser evileth not Thersizes with these termes: Thou halting and lame squire, thou bald-pate, thou coptank, thou that art camell-backt, or crump-shouldered : but rather reproacheth him with his vaine babling and undiffreet language. But rather on the contrary fide; the mother of Vulcan, when the speakerh unto her son lovingly and in great, kindnesse of heart, beginneth first with his lamenesse in this manner,

Come hither my fon come to me come freet heart,

My poore limping creeple, come crooke-leg'd as those art,
By this it may appeare plainly that Homer derideth those who thinke it a shame to be halt, blind, or otherwise impotent. He is of opinion, that nothing is blame-worthy which is not dishonest: nor any thing dishonest and shamefull, which came not by our ownselves, but proceeded from fortune. And therefore thele two great and fingular commodities, they are fure to find, who be exercised in reading and hearing of Poets: the one tending to moderation and modelfy: in that they learne to reproach no man odiously, bitterly, and foolishly with his fortune: the other unto magnanimity; for that they be raught themselves to make nie of their own fortune: not to be cast down and troubled for any adverse calamity that may happen; but meekly and patiently to abide the frumps, coffs, and reproachfull termes that are given them, yea, and the laughters that arife thereupon. And verily evermore this sentence of Philemon ought to be ready at hand and refound in their cares:

Nothing there is more pleasant and musicall Then him to abide who doth thee mis-call.

Howbeir, if any of these mockers deserve to be rebuked and raunted againe, vantage would be taken of the vices and imperfections of their mind, and those are to be objected against them; for so Adrassim in a tragedy, when Aleman provoked him with these words,

Alc. A fifter thou hast (I tell the strue)
Who in husbands bloud her hands didembrue.
Adr. But thou thy selfe, (I must tell plaine)

Thy mother that have thee haft cruelly flaine.

For like as they who whip and scourge garments, touth not the body at all reven to they that upbraid a man with infortunity, or reproach him for some defaultor blemish in his parentage, do like vaine sooles beat those things that are withour, but never come neare the quitk, are touch the foule, ne yet any thing which truly deserveth correction, blame, or biting.

Over and beside, as we showed and taught before, how to impeach and derogate the credit of those lewel sentences and dangerous speeches, which otherwhiles we meet with its Poetical books, namely, by opposing against the same the good and grave saws of worthy persons, removed as well for their learning as politick government: even so, if we find any civil, bonest, and profitable matter in Poetry, we ought (as it were) to nourish, confirme, and strengthen the same by demonstrations and testimonies Philosophicall: and evermore to remember; that we assume the same by demonstrations and testimonies Philosophicall: and evermore to remember; that we assume the same should be in that manner fortified and qualitorized! I nating when the Poems which are pronounced upon the Stage in a theater; or sing to the harp, or taught unto children in schooles, do accord with the sententious counsels of Pythagorus, the instructions of Plate, and the precepts of Chilan: when, I say, the rules of Blas, shall tend to the land and effect as do those lessons that children are to read and lessons. And the secretary of the same counter that the same counter same that the same counter same same the same counter same counters. And therefore we are to teach and instruct them thus much, not slightly and by the way; but earnestly and of purpose, that these places of Poets.

Faire daughter mine; thou were not borne
To manage wers and armes fo dread:
Mind thou loves fports, and think no ftorne

Likewile;

For Jupiter displeased is with thee,
If that in fight thomovermatched bee.

Nothing at all differ from this notable sentence, Trass granter. i. e. Know thy selfe: but carry the very same sense and meaning.

Also these verses,

Like fooles, they do not know, issis,
That halfe than whole much better is.
Likewife,
Evill counfels hurt no man fo much,
As him that author is of fuch,

Are all one in effect with the opinions and discourses of Plate in his dialogue Gorgias, and in his books of Commonweale; to wit, that more dangerous it is to do wrong than to suffer injury; and more damage commeth by giving than by receiving an abuse.

Alio to this verse of Afchylus,

Be of good cheare: Excessive paine Cannot endure, nor long remaine: When wofull bale is at the highest, Then blessed boot (be sure) is nighest.

We must fay that they be the very same with that divulged sentence for often repeated by Epicurus, and so highly admired by his followers, namely, That as great paines are not dividely, so long griefes are tolerable. And as the former member of this sentence was evidently expressed by Effection, but of the other is a consequent thereof, and implied therein. For if a griefe that is sore and vehement endureth not; surely that which continuers cannot be violent or intolerable.

Semblably this sentence of Thespis the Poet in verse,

Thou feelt how Jowe all other gods.
For this dot fin excell,
Because that lies he doth abbor,
And pride of heart expell,
He is now wont to laugh and forme,
To frumpe he doth distance:
He only cannot kell of hust.
And pled funes which be vaine,

Is varied by Plate in profe, when he faith, that the divine power is seated far from pleasure and paine. As for these vertes of Barchylides,

We hold it true, and ever will maintaine, That glory found and vertue doth endure, Great wealth and store we take to be vaine, And may befall to vile men and impure.

As also these of Euripides to the like sense;

Sage temperance I hold, we ought
To honour most in heart;
For with good men it doth remaine,
And never will depart.

As also these,

When honour and worldly wealth you have, To furnifo your selves with vertue, take care, Without her, if riches you get and save, Though blessed you seeme, unhappy you are.

Contains they not an evident proofe and demonstration of that which the Philosophers teach as touching riches and externall goods; which without vertue profit not those at all who are possetted of them? And verily thus to reduce, and fitly to accommodate the sentences of Poets unto the precepts and principles delivered by Philosophers, will soon different Poetry from fables, and pluck from it the masque wherewith it is diguised; it will give, I say, unto them an effectuall power, that being profitably spoken, they may be thought serious and perswasive: yea, and besides, will make an overture and way unto the mind of a young lad, that it may encline the rather to Philosophicall reasons and discourses: namely, when he having gotten some smatch and taste already thereof, and being not void altogether of hearing good things, he shall not come altogether without judgement; replenished only with foolish conceits and opinions which he hath evermore heard from his mothers and nurses mouth, yea, and otherwhiles (beleeve me) from his father, tutour, and schoole-master: who will not slick in his hearing to repute for bleffed and happy, yea, and with great reverence to give the worship to those who are rich: but as for death, paine, and labour, to stand in searcand horrour thereof: and contrativise, to make no reckoning and account of vertue, but to despise the same, and thinke it as good as nothing, withour earthly riches and authority. Certes, when young men shall come thus rawly and untrained, to heare the decisions, reasons, and arguments of Philosophers, flat contrary to such opinions, they will at first bemuch astonied, troubled, and disquieted in their minds: and no more able to admit of the same, and to endure such doctrine, than they who having a long time been pent in, and kept in darke, can abide the glittering raies of the Sun-shine : unlesse they were acquainted before by little and little with some falle and bastard light, not altogether so lively and cleare as it? And even to, I say, young men mut be accustomed before hand, yea, and from the very first day, to the light of the truth, entermingled somewhat with fables among that they may the better endure the full light and fight of the cleare truth, without any paine and offence at all. For when they have either heard or read before in Poems, thele sentences:

Lament we ought for infants at their birth, Entring a world of cares that they shall have: Whereas the deadwe shouldwith joy and mirth Accompany, and bring them so to grave.

Of worldy things we need no more but twaine, For bread to eat, the earth doth yeeld su graine:
And for to quench our thirft, the viver cleere
Affords su drinke, the water faire and sheere, Likewise.

Otyranny folov'd, and inrequest With barbarous, but hatefull to the rest. Lassly,

The highest pitch of mans felicity,

To feele he least part of adversity.

Less troubled they are and grived in piritis, when they shall heare in the Philosophers schooles, That we are to make no account of death as a thing touching us: That the Riches of nature are definite and limited: That eflicity and soveraigne happinesse of man, lieth not in great sums of money, ne yet in the pride of managing. State-affaires, not in dignities and great authority, but in a quiter life free from paine and incrow: in moderating all passions, and in a disposition of the mind kept within the compasse of Nature. To conclude, in regard hereof, as also for other reasons before alledged. A young man had need to be well guided and directed in reading of Poets, to the end that he may be sent to the study of Philosophy not forestalled with smither surmities: but rather sufficiently instructed before and prepared, yea, and made stiendly and familiar theretoby the meanes of Poetry.

Of Hearing The Summary.

To T good right, this present discourse was next unto the former twaine. For seeing we are not borne Dinto this world learned; but before we can fpeake our felves fenfibly or any thing to reason, we ought to have heardmen who are able to deliver their minds with judgement to the end, that by their aide and help we may be better framed and fitted to the way of vertue: requifite it is, that after the imbibition of good nurture in childhood, and some liberty and license given to travell in the writings of Poets, according to the rules above declared; joung menthat are students should advance forward, and mount up into higher schooles. Now, for that in the time when this Author, Plutarch, lived, besides many good books there were a great number of professours in the liberall Sciences, and namely into those Cities, in the harbanisme crept afterwards he proposeth and setteth down those precepts now which they are to follow and observe that go to he are publike Lectures, Orations, and Disputations, thereby to know how to behave themselves there; which training haply may reach to all that which we shall heare spoken essewhere; and is materiall to make us more learned and better mannered, In the first place therefore he sheweth that at what time as we grow to yeares of discretion we should have a feeling of our ignorancesto the endthat we may be desirous to learne, and afterwards heare willingly. For to encrease out affection, he toucheth those dangers into which they fall, who will needs be teachers before they betaught themfelves: adjoyning heretothose vices and inconveniences which a young manistotake heed of in hearing; and above all others to beware of envy: as also on the other side what he ought to study. Now, for that impossible it is, that teachers should be perfect and fully accomplished in all things, he proceeded to declare with what mind and first we should sake knowledge, and consider of their imperfections; giving withall an advertisement how to avoid another extremity, to mit, an excessive admiration of him that fleaketh, namely, to leave the principall subhance of dollrine: the which will be so much more accepsed, in case it be commended and adorned with eloquence. He commeth afterwards to treate of those problemes and questions which may be propounded in companies and meetings: also of the pleasure that we ought totake when we are told the truth: in fuch fort, that as we are not to ency them for their ex-Elli not, who freake any thing to raife and fet us aloft: [9, on the contrary fide we ought to carry with us thirlier a first fewourable, gracious, well prepared, having flutery, loving reprehensions, satient, would of that reflicall bassifulnesse which we see in over-blank and dull natures, newher presumptuous wor yet alfconraged, but keeping a good measure and meane between vaine curtofity and that spine floath and idleneffe, which win the most part of those that be heavers. To conclude, be would have him that hath diligently beard a certaine time, and with diferetion, to exercife himfelf in devising and inventing something of his own, in fuch for t that he may put the same forth, so, as the outward part may discover well whit goodnesse there lies hinclosed within.

Of Hearing.

His little Treatife (my friend Nicander) which being gathered and compiled by starts, as my leifure would ferve, As touching the manner of hearing, I lately put in writing, and send here unto you, To the end that you being delivered now from the subjection of Masters, who were wont to command you, and having put on your virile robe and grown to mans estate, may know how to heare him that giveth you good counsell. For this licentious easement and delivery from all government, which some young mensor default of good nurture and education do untruly terme Liberty, setteth over them more rough Lords and harder Masters by far than were those teachers, tutors, and governours, under whom they were awed in their childhood to wit, their own irregular lusts, and unordinate appetites, which now be (as it were) dischained and let loose. For, like as a woman (to use the words of Herodotus) no sooner doth off her smock or inner vesture, but therewithall she casteth off all shamefastnesse and modeily; even so, some young men there be, who together with the garments of infancy and childhood lay by all graceshame, and seare: so that being once divested of that habit and apparel which became them so well, and gave them a modest and sober countenance, they are straightwaies full of stubbornnesse and disobedience. As for your felte, who have oftentimes heard, that To follow God, and to obey Reason is all one, you ought to thinke, that the wifer fort, and such as have wit indeed, repute not the passage and change from childhood to mans estate, an absolute deliverance and freedome from commandement and subjection, but an exchange only of the commander: for that their life inflead either of a mercenary hireling, or fome Maffer bought with a peece of money, who was wont to governe it in their nonage and minority, taketh then a divine and heavenly guide to conductit, even Reaton: unto which they that yeeld themfelves obeifant, are to be reputed only free and at liberty. For they alone live as they would, who have learned to will that which they should: whereas if our actions and affections both be dilordinate and not ruled by reason, the liberty of our free-will is small, slender and feeble, yea, and intermingled for the most part with much repentance. Like as therefore among new Burgoviles (who lately are enrolled Free Denizens to enjoy the Franchises and priviledges of fome City) they that were meere aliens before, and firangers new come from far and remote parts, find themselves grieved at the first with many things that are done, yea, and complaine thereof: but such as had been inhabitants theresometime before they were made citizens, who partly by education were inured, and partly by custome and conversing, samiliarly acquainted with the laws and customes of the place; never thinke much, but can brooke wellenough, and undergo with patience all charges and impositions laid upon them; So it behooved that a young man should a long time have been bred up and (as it were) halfe nursed in Philosophy, accustomed (Ifay) he ought to have been from the beginning with intermingling all that he learneth or heareth in his tender yeares, with Philosophicall reasons, that being thus made tractable, gentle, and familiar before hand, he might now betake himselfe wholly and in good earnest to Philosophy: which alone is able to array and adorne young men with those robes and ornaments of reason which are man-like indeed, and every way perfect. Moreover, I suppose you will be well plea-sed and content to give eare unto that which Theophrastus hath written of hearing; which of all the five fenses given us by nature, presenteth both the most and also the greatest passions unto the mind. For there is no object of the eye, nothing that we talte or touch that cauleth such extafies, fo violent troubles or judden frights, as those which enter and pierceinto the soule by the meanes of some noises, sounds and voices, incident to our hearing. And albeit this sense lie thus open and exposed to passions, yet is it more fit to admit reason than such affections: for many places therebe and parts of the body that make way and give entrance unto vices to passe unto the foule: but the only handle (as I may fo fay) wherewith vertue may take hold of young men are their eares: provided alwaies, that they were keept cleane and neat at the first from all flattery, and defended against corrupt and lewed speeches that they touch them not.

Good reason therefore had Xenocrates to give order that children should have certaine anrielets or bolfters devised to hang about their eares for their defence, rather than fencers and fword-players: for that thele are in danger only to have their eares spoyled with knocks or cues by weapons: but theother, to have their manners corrupted and marred with naughty speeches. Neither was it any part of Xinerrates his meaning, to deprive them altogether of hearing, and to commend dealenesse: but to admonish and exhort them so long to sorbeare the hearing of evill words, and to take heed, untill other good ayings, entertained and nourished there, in long continuance of time by Philosophy, had seiled the place, and were well setled in that part which is most easie to be moved and perswaded by speech: where being once lodged, they might as good sentinels and guards preserve and defend the same. Bias verily, that ancient Sage being commanded by King Amafis to fend unto him the best and worst piece of a beast killed for facrifice, plucked forth the tongue only, and fent it him; glving him thus much thereby to understand, That speech is the cause both of most good, and also of greatest harme. Many there be also, who ordinarily when they kiffe little children both touch their eares withall, and also bid them do the like: infinuating thus much covertly, by way of mirth and sport. That they are to love those who profit them and do them good by their eares. For this is certaine and evident that a young man deprived and debarred of hearing, being able to taste and conceive reason, will not only become barren altogether of fruit, and put not so much as any buds and flowers at all, which may give fome hope of vertue: but also contrariwise, will soon turne to vice, and send forth of his corrupt mind many wild and favage shoots, like as a ground neglected and untilled, beareth nothing but briers, brambles, and hurtfull weeds. For the motions and inclinations unto pleasures, and the sinister conceits and suspitions of paines and travels (which are no strangers to us iwis, entring in directly from without forth by themselvas, or else let in by evill suggestions, but inbred with us, and the natural sources of infinite vices and maladies) if a man suffer to run on end with the reines at large; whither by nature they would go, and not cut them off by fage remonstrances, or divert them another way, and thereby reforme the default of nature; furely there were not upon the face of the earth any wild beaft but would be more tame and gentle than man. Foralmuch as therefore the fense of hearing bringeth unto young men so great profit, and no leffe perils with it, I suppose it were well done if a man would efficient both devile with himselfe, and also discourie with others, as touching the order and manner of hearing. For almuch as wedo fee most men in this point to offend and erre, in that they exercise themselves in speaking before they were used to heare supposing that good speech requireth a kind of discipline, medication, and praclice ere it be learned as for hearing, though menule it without any art it makes no matter how, yet they may receive profit thereby as they thinke. And verily, albeit at Tennis play they that praclice the feat thereof, learne to take the ball as it commeth, and also to thike and fend it from them againe, both at once, yet in the use of speech it is otherwise: For to receive it well goeth before the utterance and delivery thereof: like as conception and retention of the feed, doth pracede birth of the infant. It is faid, That the egges laid by foules, called wind-egges, as they proceed of imperfect andfalle conceptions, to they are the rudiments and beginnings of fuch fruits as never will quicken and have life; even to, The speeches that young men let fall, such I

Words vaine, obscure, and foolish every one, Which under clouds soone vanish and be gone.

Certes if they would powreforth any liquor out of one vessell into another, they are wont to encline and turne down the mouth of the one, fo, as the faid liquor may passe into the receptorie without shedding any part thereof, lest instead of an insusion indeed there be an essusion only and spiling of the same: and yet these men cannot learneto be attentive and give good eare unto others, to as nothing do elcape them which is well and profitably delivered. But here is the greatest folly and most ridiculous, that if they meet with one who can relate the order of a feath or great dinner, discourse from point to point of a solemne shew or pompe, tella tale of some dreame, or make report of a quarrell and brablement between him and another, they harken with great filence, bid him say on, and will misse never a circumstance: Let another mandraw them apart, to teach them some good and profitable lesson, to exhort them to their duty, to admonish and tell them of a fault, to reprove them wherein they did amisse, or to appeale their mood when they be incholer, they cannot abide and indure him: for either they will fee in hand to argueand refute him by arguments, contending and contesting against that which hath been said, (if they be able foto do:) or if they find themselves too weake, they slink away, and run thither where they may heare some other vaine and foolish discourses, desirous to fill their eares (like naughty and rotten veffels) with any thing rather than that which is good and necessary. They that would keep and order horses well, teach them to have a good mouth, to reign light, and to obey the bit: even fo, they that bring up children as they ought, make them obsequent and oobeisant to reason, by teaching them to heare much and speake little. For Spintharus praising Epaminondas upon a time gave out thus much of him; That he could hardly meet with another man who knew more than he, and spake lesse. And it is commonly said, that nature her selse hath given to each of us but one tongue and two eares, because we ought to heare more than we ipeake. Now as filence and Tacitumity is every where and at all times a singular and sure ornament of a young man; so especially, if when he heareth another man to speake he interrupt and trouble him not, nor bay and barke (as it were) at every word: but although he do not very well like of his speech, yet hath patience and forbeareth, giving him leave to make an end; and when he hath finished his speech, setteth not upon him presently, nor beginneth out of hand to confure him, but suffereth him to pause awhile, and as Aschynes faith, giveth him some time to breath and bethink himself to see, if haply he think it good to adde any more to that which hath been delivered already, or change somewhat, or else retract and unlay something : Whereas they that by and by cut a man off with contradictions, and neither hear, nor are well heard themselves, but are ever replying upon other whiles they speake, observe no decorum nor grace at all, but thew a very undecent and unfeemely behaviour. But he that is accustomed to heare patiently, and with a modest and soben countenance, better conceiveth and reteineth the good things uttered, and withall hathmore leifure to marke, observe, and discerne that which is either unprofitable or false: He sheweth himselfe besides to be a lover of the truth, and is not taken for a litigious quareller, a rash wrangler, or a bitter brawler. And therefore, some there be who not unaptly say, That we ought no leffe, but rather more, to void out of the minds of young men that prelumption and foolish opinion which they have of their own selves, than to rid and exclude the wind and aire out of leather baggs orbladders wherewith they are pult and blown up, if we meane to in-fuse and put any good thing into them; for other wise, if they be still full of that swelling wind of arrogancy and overweening of themselves, they will never receive and admit any goodnesse,

Moreover, envyaccompanied with a maligne eye and ill will is good in no action what foever where it is preient: but as it is an impediment and hinderance to all honest causes; so it is the worst counseller and assistant that he can have who would be an auditor, making all those things that be profitable and for his benefit to feeme odious, unpleasant, harsh to the care, and hardly admitted; for that the nature of envious persons is, to take more pleasure in any thing else than in that which is well spoken. And verily, who soever repineth and is vexed at the heart to see others rich, beautifull or in authority, is only envious : for grieved he is at the welfare of others : but he that taketh discontentment in hearing a wise and sententions speech, is offended with the good of his ownselfe: for, like as the light is a benefit to them that see; even so is speech unto the hearers, if they will embrace and entertaine the same: As for those kinds of envy which arise in regard of other things, there be some naughty passions and vitious conditions of the mind besides that breed and inger der them: but that manner of envy, which is conceived against them that speake excellently well, springeth from a certaine importunate desire of vaine glory, and unjust ambition, which will not suffer him that is so indisposed to give eare and attend unto the words spoken but troubleth, disquieteth, and distracteth the mind and understanding: both to consider at one instant his own state and sufficiency, whether it be interiour to the conceit and eloquence of the speaker: and also to regard and looke upon the countenance of other hearers. whether they take contenument and are in admiration of him that maketh the speech: yea, and withall, if happily he be praifed, the fame mind is wonderfully galled and amazed, angry, and ready to fall out with all that be present, in case they approve his speech with applause. Herewith it letteth flip also and rejecteth the matter and good sayings that were delivered already; for that the remembrance thereof is uniavoury and unpleasant: and fill he is disquieted and wot-teth not what to do, hearing out the rell with leare and trembling less that pilly they should be bet-ter than the former, never so desirous that the speakers should hasted to an end and have done; as when they discourse and speake best. Now when the Sermon is ended, and the auditory disfolved: what doth this envious spirit then? Not ruminate, be you lure, not consider of the reafons and matter delivered; but he frirreth the affections and opinions firaightwaies, and gathereth voices (as it were in a ferutiny) of the audience. If he meet with any that give out good words to the praise of the Preacher, them he avoideth and fleeth from, as if he were in a furious fit of madneffe : hapneth heupon fuch as find fault, and be ready to misconstrue and pervert the words that were spoken to the worst sense: these are they whom he loveth a life, to them he, runneth, and with them he sorteth and keepeth company: But say that he sinder home of that disposition, so as he cannot wrest any words to a wrong construction, then he falleth to make comparisons, and to set against him others younger than he; who of the same the ame have discounted better, with more plausible utterance and greater force of eloquence: he never cealeth nor giveth overcorrupting, ministerpreting, and digracing the whole speech, until he have made the lame altogether unprofitable and without any edification at all to his own selfe. It behoveth therefore, that he who defireth to heare, taketruce (for the time) with ambition; to the end that he may give eare with patience and mildreffe unto him that maketh an oration or lermon, and carry himselse no otherwise than if he were admitted to some sacred and sellival banker, or an invited quest to the first fruits of a solemile sacrifice; praising his eloquence when he hath spoken well and sufficiently to the point in any marter, accepting favourably, and in belt part, his good will, to deliver and communicate to officer such that the kiew, and to pertivade his learns with those reasons and mories which that sufficient be privated thin sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient will be a sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient will be sufficient to the sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient will be sufficient to the sufficient with the sufficient with the sufficient will be sufficient to the sufficient to the sufficient will be sufficient to the sufficient will be sufficient to the sufficien well delivered by the speaker, ought to be ascribed to chance and fortune, as if he had let fall his words at a venture: but impute the fame to his diligence, labour, and art: yea, and he ought to imitate the same with a kind of zeale and admitation. But whereas he hath faulted and done amife, it is the part of an heares to bend his mind, and consider well and circumspectly, what might the cause and occasion be of such errous: Forlike as (according to Xenophon) good housholders know how to make profit and use, as well of their endmiss as their friends; even to they that be vigilant and attentive hearers take good, not only by their that freak well, but by those also that misse and falle of their purpose; not only by their that freak well, but by those also that misse and falle of their purpose; not barren, triviall, and that invention; improper, vaine, and unfignificant words; forced, and foolish figures; abrupt, fond, and unfeemly breakings forth with joy to some praise, and such like impertinences or defects, which often times befall unto them that ipeake in publike place, are fooner expired by us that are hearers, than observed by themselves who are the speakers. And therefore we are to transfer the inquisition and correction of any such fault, stom them to our selves, by examining whether we also may not fault likewise before we be aware? For there is nothing in the world more easie than for a man to blame and reprehend his neighbour: but fuch a reprehension verily is vaine and unprofitable, un-lesse it have a reference to correct and amend the like errours in himselfe. In which regard every ome ought to be ready in this case, according to the advertisement of Plate; to say unto himselfe, Amnot I also such a one? Or, do not I the semblable otherwhiles? For even as we see our own eyes thining within the ball or apple of our neighbours eye, to we ought by the forme and manner of othermens orations to take the patterne and representation of our own; to the end that we be not too forward and bold in delpiting others; but may more carefully take heed to our felves when we likewife come to speake. To this purpose also it would do very well to make a kind of conference and comparison in this manner; Namely, to retire our selves apart when we have heard one make an oration and to take in handform points which we thinke had not been well and sufficiently handled, and their to assay either to supply that which was desective in some or to correct what was amisse in others: or else to vary the same matter in other words, or a leastwifeto discourse altogether thereof with new reasons and arguments; like as Plato himselfedid upon the oration of Lyfias. For, I affure you, no hard matter it is, but very eafle to contradict the oration and reason by another pronounced; many to set a better by it, that is a peece of work right hard and difficult. Much like, as when a certaine Lacedemonian heard that Philip King of Macedon had demolished and razed the City Olynthus, Hath he so? quoth he, But he is not able to set up such another. Now when as we shall see that in treating of the same subject and argument, there is no great difference between our own doings and other mens before us, and that we have not far excelled them, we shall be reclaimed much from the contempt of others, and quickly represse and stay our own presumptuous pride and selfe-love seeing it thus checked by this triall and compariton. And verily, to admire other mens doings; as it is a thing adverte and op-polite to despiting, so it is a sign of a milder nature, and more enclined to indifferency and equity. But even herein also there would be no leffe heed taken (if not more) than in the contempt. beforefaid: for as they which are so presumptuous, bold, and given so much to dispraise and despile others, receive lesse good and smaller profit by hearing; so the simple and harmelesse sort, addicted overmuch to others, and having them in admiration, are more subject to take harme and hurt thereby: verifying this fentence of Heraclitus,

As for the praises therefore of him that speaketh, we ought favourably and of course without great affectation to passe them out of our mouths: in giving credit unto their reasons and arguments we are to be more wary and circumspect: and as touching the phrase, utterance, and action of those that exercise to make speeches, we must both see and heare the same with a single heart and a kind affection: As for the utility and truth of those matters which are delivered, we should examine and weigh the same exactly and with more severity of judgement. Thus we who be hearers shall avoid the suspicious of evill will and hatted, and they againe that are speakers shall do us no harme. For oftentimes it salleth out that upon a speciall famile and good liking unto those that preach unto us, we take lesse heed to our selves, and by our credulity admit and embrace from their lips many false and erronious opinions. The Lacedamonian rulers and Lords of the Councell of State, upon a time liking well of the good advice and opinion of a perion who was an ill liver, caused the same to be delivered openly by another of approved life and good reputation: wherein they did very wilely, and as prudent politicians, to accustome the people for to affect the behaviour and honest carriage of their counsellors, rather than to respect their words only. But in Philosophy it is otherwise: For we must lay aside the reputation of the man who hath in publike place spoken his mind: and examine the matter apart by it selfe: For that, like as in war (we fay) there be many falle alarmes: so also in an auditory there passe as many vanities: The goodly gray beard and hoary head of the speaker, his solemne gellure and composing of his countenance, his grave eye-brows, his glorious words in behalfe of himselse: but above all, the acclamations, the applaule and clapping of hands, the leaping and shouting of the standers by and those that are present in place, are enough other whiles to trouble and altonish the spirits of a young hearer, who is not well acquainted with such matters, and carry him away perforce as it were with a streame: Over and besides, there is in the very stile and speech it selfe a secret power able to beguile and deceive a young novice: namely, if it run round away, smooth, and pleasant, and if withall there be a certaine affected gravity, and artificiall port and loftineffe, to fet out and grace the matter. And even as they that play upon thepipe, be it cornet, recorder of fife, fault many times in musicke, and are not perceived by the hearers: so a brave and elegant tongue, a copious and gallant oration, dazeleth the wits of the hearer, so as he cannot judge soundly of the matter in hand. Melanthus being demanded upon a time, what he thought of a Tragedy of Diogenes: I could not fee it (quoth he) for so many words wherewith it was choaked up. But the Orations and declamations for the most part of these Sophisters, who make shew of their eloquence, not only have their fentences covered (as it were) with vailes and curtaines of words, but that which more is, they themselves do dulce their voice by the means of (I wot not what) devised notes, soft sounds, exquisite and musicall accents in their pronunciation, so as they ravish the wits of the hearers, and transport them beside themselves: leading and carrying them which way they lift: and thus for a certaine little vaine pleasure that they give, receive againe ap-plause and glory much more vaine: Insomuch, as that be allest properly unto them which by report Diony fires answered upon a time: who seemed to promise unto a samous minstrell for his excellent play in an open Theatre to reward him with great gitts, gave him in the end just nothing, but faid, he had recompended him sufficiently already? For look (quoth he)how much pleasing. I have received from thee by thy long and minstrelley, so much contentment and joy thou hast. had from me by hoping for some great reward. And verily such recompence as this have those Sophisters and great Oratours at their hearers hands: For admired they are so long as they sit in their chaire, and give delight unto their auditory: No sooner is their speech ended, but gone is the pleasure of the one, and the glory of the other. Thus the Auditors ipend their time, and the speakers employ their whole life in vaine. For this cause it behoveth a young hearer to sequester and setafide the ranke superfluity of words, and to seeke after the fruit it selfe: and herein not to imitate women that plait and make garlands of flowers, but to follow the Bees: For those women laying for and choosing faire flowers and odoriferous herbs, swift, plat, and compose them fo, as they make thereof a peece of worke (I must needs fay) pleasant to the senses; but fruitlesse altogether, and not lasting above one day: whereas the Bees slying oftentimes over and over the meadows full of violets, Roles, and Crowtoes, light at length upon Thyme, an hearbe of a most ftrong fent, and quick tafte, and there fettle,

Intending then great paines to take The yellow honer for to make.

And when they have gathered from them some profitable juyce or liquor to serve their turne, they flye away unto their proper worke and businesse: Semblably ought an auditor who is studious of skill and knowledge, and hath his mind and understanding free from passions, to let passe affected, flourishing, and superfluous words, yea, and such matters also as be fit for the Stage and Theatre, reputing them to be food meet for drone Bees (I meane Sophisters) and nothing good for honey: and rather with diligence and attentive heed to found the very depth and profound intention of the speaker, for to draw that which is good and profitable: remembring eftsoones, that he is not come thither as to a Theatre, either to see sports and pastimes, or to heare musick and Poeticall fables, but into a schoole and auditory, for to learne how to amend and reforme his life by the rule of reason. And therefore he must enter into his own heart and examine himselfe when he is alone, how he was moved and affected with the Lecture or fermon that he heard; confider (I fay) and reason he ought with himselfe whether he find any turbulent passions of his mind thereby dulced and appealed; whether any griefe or heavineffe that trouble him be mitigated and affwaged; whether his courage and confidence of heart be more resolute and better confirmed; and in one word, whether he feele any inflinct unto vertue and honefty, to be more kindled and enflamed. When we tife out of the Barbars chaire, we thinke it meet presently to consult with a mirrour or looking-glaffe; westroke our head to see whether he hath polled and notted it wells we confider and peruse our beard and every haire whether we have the right cut, and be trimmed as we ought: a shame it were then to depart from a Schoole, or a Lecture, and not immediatly to retire apart and view our mind well, whether it have laid away any foolish thought that troubled it: whether it be eased of superfluous and wandring thoughts that clogged it: and be thereby more lightsome and pleasant. For neither a Baine and Stuphe, as Ariston aith, nor a Sermon doth any good if the one do not scoure the skin, and the other clense the heart.

A young man therefore is to take joy and delight if he have made profit by a Lecture, or be better edified by hearing a fermon And yet I write not this as if this pleasure should be the final end that he proposeth to himselfe when he goeth to such a Lecture or Sermon, neither would I have him thinke that he should depart out of the Philosophers schoole with a merry notesingging jocundly, or with a fresh and cheerefull countenance: ne yet to use meanes to be persumed with sweet odours and oyntments, whereas he hath more need of Embrochations, Fomentations, and Cataplassines: but to take it well and be thankfull, if haply by some sharpe words and cut-ting speches, any man hath cleansed and purified his heart full of cloudy miss and palpable darkneffe, like as mendrive Bee-hives and rid away Bees with smoake. For albeit, he that preacheth unto others ought not to be altogether carelesse and negligent in his stile, but that it may carry with it some pleasure, delectation and grace, as well as probability and reason : yet a young man when he commeth to heare should not stand so much thereupon, but have least regard thereto, especially at the first : marry afterwards (I will not say) but he may well enough have an eye unto it also. For like as those that drinke, after they have once quenched their thirst, haveleisure to peruse the cups and turne them about every way, to view and consider the worke engraven or imprinted upon them : evenlo, when a young fludent or auditor is well replenished and furnished with doctrine, after he hath breathed and pauled a while, may be permitted to confider farther of the speech, namely, what elegant and copious phrases it hath. As for him, who at the very beginning attendeth not, nor cleaveth unto the matter and substance, but hunteth after the language only, defiring that it should be pure Atticke, fine, and smooth: I can liken sich a one to him, who being empoysoned will not drinke any Antidote or counterposion, unlessethe pot or cup wherein it is be made of Colian earth in Astica: or who in the cold of winter will not weare a garment, except it were made of the wooll that came from the Attick sheeps back; but had rather fit still idle doing nothing and stirring not, with some thin mantleand overwornegaberdine cast over him, such as be the orations of Lysias his penning. The errours committed in this kind have been the cause why there is found so little wit and understanding, and contrariwife so much tongue and bibble-babble, such vaine chattering about words in young men throughout the Schooles: who never observe the life, the deeds, the carriage and demeanour in State-government of a Philosopher, but give all praise and commendation to his fine termes and elegant words, only fetting out his eloquence, action and ready delivery of his oration, but will not in any wife learne or enquire whether the matter so uttered be profitable or unprofitable, neceffary or vain and superfluous.

Next to these precepts, how we should heare a Philosopher to discourse at large and with a continued speech, there followerh in good consequence a rule and advertisement as touching short questions and problemes. A man that commeth as a bidden guest unto a great supper, ought to be content with that which is set before him upon the table, and neither to call for any viands else, norto find fault with those that are present: He also that is invited to a Philosophicall feaft or banket (as I may fay) of discourses, in case they be matters and questions certaine and choien long before for to be handled, ought to do nothing else but heare with patience and filence him that speaketh: for they that distract and hale him away to other theames, interpofing interrogations and demands, or otherwise move doubts or make oppositions as he speaketh, are troublesome and unportunate hearers, such as be unsociable and accord not with an auditory; who besides that they receive no profit themselves, disturbe both the speaker and the speechalfo. But incase the party that standeth ad oppositum, do of himselfe will and pray his auditors to aske him questions, and to propose what they will; then they ought to propound such demands as be either necessary or profitable. Ulysses verily in Homer was mocked by the woods of his wife, because

He call dfor shieves of breadto eat, And not for swords or caudrons neat.

For it was reputed as a fign of magnanimity to demand, as well as to give things of great price and value. Much more then might man deride and laugh at the auditor, who will move unto a Master or Doctor of the Chaire triffing frivolous, and fruitlesse questions as otherwhilessome of these young men do: who taking pleasure to vaunt themselves, and to shew what great ichollars they are in Logick or the Mathematicks, are wont to put forth questions as touching the jections of things indefinite: also, what be latterall motions or diametricall? Unto whom man may very well answer as Philotimus the Phylitian didunto one that had a suppuration in his chil, and by realon of an inward ulcer of his lungs was in a confumption, who comming to him-for councell, defired that he would give him a medicine for a little whit-flow growing about the root of his naile : but Philotimus perceiving by his colour and shortnesse of wind in what case he was; my good friend (quoth he) you have no such need of a cure for your whit flow, you may hold your peace well enough at this time for any danger there: Even so it may be said unto one of these young men; There is no time now to thinke or dispute upon such questions, but rather by what meanes you may be freed from prelumptuous overweening of your felle. from pride and arrogance, from wanton love and foolish toyes: that you may be jetled in a found flate of life, devoid of vanity. Moreover, this young man is to have a good eye and regard unto the sufficiency of the speaker, whether it be by naturall inclination, or gotten by experience and practice, and accordingly to frame and direct his questions in those points wherein he is most excellent: and in no wife to force him who is well read and Rudied in Morall Philosophy, to anfwer unto Physicall or Mathematicall questions: or him that is better seen in Naturall Philosophy to draw unto Logick, for to give his judgement of Hypotheticall propositions, and to resolve them: or to undoe the knots and make solution of falle Syllogiumes, Elenches sophisticall, and fuch fallacies. For like as one that would go about to cleave wood with a key, or unlock a door with an axe, feemeth not fo much to do hurt unto those instruments, as to deprive himselfe of the proper use and commodity as well of the one as the other; Even so, they that require of a Speaker that which he is not apt unto by nature, or wherein he is not well practised, and will not reape, gather, and take that which willingly commeth from him, and wherewith he is able to furnish them, are not only hurt therein, but incur the name and blame of a peevish, froward, and malicious nature. Furthermore, this heed would be taken, not to over-lay him with many queftions, nor oftentimes to urge him therewith. For this bewrayeth one, that in some fort loveth to heare himselfe speake, and would beseen: whereas, when another doth propose a question to give attentive eare, and that with mildnesse and patience, is a signe of a studious person, and one that knoweth well how to behave himselfe in company, and can abide that others should learne as well as he: unlesse perhaps some private and particular occurrent do urge the contrary, or some passion do hinder, which had need to be stated and repressed or else some malady and imperiection which requireth remedy. For peradventure as Heraclitus faith, it were not good for one to hide and conceale his own ignorance, but to let it appeare and beknown, and so to cure it. But say, that some fit of choler some assault of scrupulous superstition, or some violent quarrell and jar with one houshold and kinsfolke, or some furious passion proceeding from wanton lust,

Which doth the secret heart-strings move,

That erst were never stirr'd with love,

Trouble our understanding, and put it out of tune, we ought not for the avoiding of a reproofe to flie for refuge to other matters, and interrupt the discourse begun, but be desirous to heare of fuch things, even in open places of exercises; and after the exercise or Lecture done, to take the Philosophers or Readers aside and conferre with them to befurther enformed: not as many do, who are wellenough contented to heare Philosophers speake of others, and have them therefore in great admiration: but if it chance that a Philosopher leave other men, and turne his speech to them apart, to tell them freely and boldly what he thinketh, admonifhing and putting them in mind of such things as do concerne them, then they are in a chafe, then they say, he speakes befides the text, and more than needs. For of this opinion are these men, That we are to heare Philotophers in Schooles for pastime, as players of tragedies in a Theatre upon the Stage: As for other matters out of the Schoole, they hold them no better men than themselves: and to say a truth, good reason have they so to deeme of Sophisters, who are no sooner out of their chaires, or come down from off the pulpit, and when their books, and petry introductions are laid out of their hands but in other ferious actions and parts of this life to be discoursed of, a man shall find them as raw as other, and nothing better skilled than the vulgar fort. But to come unto those Philotophers indeed, who worthily are to be called and effeemed, ignorant are such persons above rehearfed, that their words (be they spoken in earnest or in game) their becks, their nods, their countenance, whether it becomposed to smiling, or to frowning, but principally their words directed privately to every one apart, be all fignificant, and carry fome fruit commodious to those that with patience will give them leave to speake, and are willing and used to hearken un-

As concerning the praifes which we are to attribute unto them for their eloquence and well fpeaking, there would in this duty fome wife caution and meane be used if or that in this case peither over-much nor too little is commendable and honest. And verily that schollar, who seement not to be moved or touched with any thing that he heareth, is a heavy and unsupportable auditor, full of a secret presumptions opinion of himselfe; conceited inwardly of his own sufficiency, of an inbred selfe-love and aptiesse to speake much of his own doings, shewing evidently that he thinketh he can speake better than that which hath been delivered: Integard whereof he never firs brow any way decently, he uttereth not a word to tellifie that he heareth willingly and with contentment: but by a certaine forced filence; affected gravity, and con: terfeit countenance, would purchate and win unto himselfe the reputation of a flaied man, of a profound and deep clarke: and is as spary of his praises, as of his purse and money in it, imagining that they bid him loffe, who would have him part with any one jot thereof, as it he robbed himleife of to much as he imparted to another. For many there be who misconster and interpret in ill sense one senzence of Pythagoras, when he faith, That he had gotten this fruit by the sludy of Philosophy, namely, to have nothing in admiration. And these men are of this opinion, that because they are not to admire, praise, and honour others, therefore they must despite and dispraise them, and by the difdaine and contempt of others they thinke themselves to seeme grave and venerable. For reason Philosophicall, although it rejecteth that wonder and admiration which proceedeth of doubt or ignorance, for that she knoweth the cause of every thing, and is able to discourse thereof; yet for all that it condemneth not courtene, magnanimity, and humanity. For certes unto such astruly and certainly are good, a right great honour it is to honour those that are worthy of honour: also for a man to adorne another is an excellent ornament proceeding from a superabundance (as it were) of glory and honour which is in himselfe, void of all envy and malice. Whereas thole that be niggards in praising of another, seeme to be poore and bare themselves that way, and bewray how hungry they be after their own praises. Now on the contrary fide, he who without all judgement and discretion at every word and syllable (in a manner) is ready to rife up and give acclamation, offendeth as much another way, being a man of levity and inconflancy, oftentimes displeaseth, even them that be the speakers, but alwaies is offensive and troublefometo other affiltants about him: causing them to rife up eftioones and lift up themselves against their wills, drawing them perforce to do as they feehim do, and even for very shame and modesty to fet up fome cries and acclamations with himfor company. Now after that he hath reaped no fruit nor edification by the oration that he hath heard, for that he had so troubled and disquieted the auditory by his unfeafonable praifes, he returneth from thence with one of thele three additions to his file: namely, either a Mocker, a Flatterer, or a Blockhead, who understood not what was faid. A Judge, I must needs say, when he sitteth upon the seat of Justice to heare and determine causes, ought to give eare unto both parties without hatred or favors, void of all af-tection, and respective only to right and equity. But in the auditories where learned men are met rogether, there is neither law nor oath hindereth us, but that we may heare him with savour and benevolence who doth speak and discourse unto us. And even our ancients in old time were wont to place and fet Mercury in their temples near unto the Graces giving us thereby to know that above all things afpeech publikely delivered requireth a gracious and friendly andience: for they never thought that the ipeaker would be such an out-cast, or so far short and unsufficient; but if he were not able either to say somewhat of his own invention praise-worthy, or to report from ancients that which is memorable, or to deliver the subject matter of his speech together with his drift and intention, so as it deserved applause: yet at least wise, his eloquution and dispofition of every part might be commendable: for according to the old proverbe,

With Colthrop-thiftles rough and keen, With prick v Rest-harrow, Close Scions f.iir and white are seen With soft wall-slowers to grow.

For if some to shew their wit have taken upon them the praise of vomiting, others of fever, and fome iwis of a pot or caudron, and yet have not failed of favour and approbation: how can it otherwise be, but that the oration composed by a grave personage, who in some sort is reputed, or at least wife called a Philosopher, should ministerunto benevolent, gracious, and courteous Auditors some respite and opportunity of time for to praise and commend the same? All those that are in the flower and prime of their age, faith Plato, one way or other, do affect and move him that is enamoured on them: infomuch'as in they be white of colour, he calleth them the children of the gods: if black of hew, he termes them manly and magnanimous: be one hawkenoted, tuch he nameth Royall and of a Kingly Race: is he camoile or flat noted, him he will have to be gentle, pleasant, and gracious: and to conclude, looketh one pale and yellow, then to cover and mollifie infome fort that ill colour, he wieth to call him Honey-face and every one of their desects, he loveth and embraceth as severall beauties: For in love is no lack, and of this nature is it to claspe and cleave to every thing that it can reach or meet withall, in manner of Ivy; much more then will he that is a studious schollar and a diligent hearer, find alwaivs one thing or other, for which he may feem worthily to praise any one that mounteth up into the chaire for to declaime or discourse. For even Plato himselse, who in the oration of Lysias commended not the invention; and as for the disposition thereof, utterly found fault therewith as disorderly and confused; yet he praised hissisle and eloquution, and gave this attribute unto it, that every word was perspicuous and lightsome, and withall ran round, as if they all had been artificially wrought with the Turners instrument. A man that were so disposed, may seeme in reason to reprove in Archylochus the argument and subject matter: in Parmenides the composition of his verses: in Phocylides, the meane and homely matter: the loquacity of Euripides, and the inequality or unevenstile of Sophacles: After which tort, you shall have among Orators and Rhetoricians, one who cannot expresse the naturall disposition of a man, another who hath no power in refembling passions and affections, and another against who faileth in grace : and yet each one of them commendable enough for some particular and especiallgift, either to move or to desight. In which regard the hearers also may find sufficient matter and pleasure enough to gratifie and content if they lift those that speake and make orations to them. For some of them it infliceth, although we do not tellifie our good diving of them by lively and open voice, to give them a favourable regard of the eye, to shew them a mild and gentle visage, a cheerefull looke, an amiable disposition of the countenance, without any figre of tadnesse and heavinesse. And verily, these things are grown now to be to common and ordinary, that we can afford them even to those who speake but io so, and to no purpole at all; insomuch, as every auditory can skill thereof: But to sit still modetly in his place without any token of dissaine; to beare the body upright, leaning neither one way nor other; to fixe the eye wiltly upon him that speaketh; to shew a forward geffure, as it one gave great attention and marked every word feriously; to fet and dispote the countenance plaine, pure, and simple, without any figuification at all, not only of con-tempt or discontenument, but also of all other cares and thoughts what soever, be evident tokens of approbation, and tend all thereto. For, as inevery thing elie, beauty and favour is composed and framed (as it were) of many numbers meeting and concurring in one, and all together at the same time, and that by a certaine symmetry, consonance, and harmony: but that which is foule and ill-savoured, is bred immediately by the least thing in the world, that either is wanting, or added and put to abfurdly, otherwise than it should; even so we may notably observe in this action of hearing, not only the knitting and bending of the brows, or the heavy cheere of the vilage, a crooked aspect and wandring cast of the eye, a writhing away or turning about of the body, an undecent change of the thighs crosse one over another; but a very nod of the head, or winke of the eye alone, the whitpering or rounding one of another in the eare, a bare fmile, gapings, and drowfie yawnings, as if a man were ready for to dropafleep: finally the hanging down of the head, and what soever gettures of that sort, we are countable for as taule-worthy, and they would be carefully taken heed of. Howbeit, there be some of this opinion, that the speaker indeed ought to looke unto himselfe and his behaviour when he is aloft; but the hearers beneath need not. They would (I say) have him who is to make a speech in publike place, to come well prepared, and with diligent præmeditation of that which he ought to fay : but as for the hearers, they have no more to do but to take their places, without any fore-thinking of the matter, with-out any care and regard at all of duty and demeanour after they be let, as it they were come to a very supper, and nothing else, there to take their repast or ease themselves, whiles others take paine and travell. And yet a guest that goeth to sup with another hath something to do and ob-serve when he sits at table, if he would be thought civill and mannerly: how much more then, in all reason, is an auditor bound so to do, who is to heare another speake. For he is partaker with him of his speech, yea, and by right a coadjutor of him: he ought not then to examine rigoroully hisfaults elcaped; he is not to fift narrowly, and weigh in severe ballance each word of his, and every gefture; whiles he himfelfe (exempt from centure and controlement, and without feare of being espied and searched into) committeeth many enormities, unseemely parts, and incongruities in hearing. For like as at Tennis play, he that receiveth the ball, ought in the stirring and motion of his body to accommodate himselfe handsomely and in order to his fellow that fmit it; even to between the speaker and the hearer, if both of them observe their duty and decency, there would be a mutuall and reciprocall proportion. Now in yeelding praises unto the Reader or Speaker, we must not inconsiderately use all manner of termes and acciamations without diferetion: For Epicurus himselfe is not well liked, but odious, when he faith, That upon the reading of any letters missive from his friends unto him, they that were about him did fet up excessive outcries and applauses, with troubleiome clapping of their hands. And verily those who bring in now adaies into the auditory uncouth and strange noises by way of acclamation; they also who have brought up these termes, O heavenly and divine speech! The voice of God and not of man, uttered by his mouth; and, Who is able to come neere unto him? As though it were not sufficient simply thus to say; O well said, Wisely spoken, or, Truly delivered; (which were the testimonies and signes of praise which Plato, Socrates, and Hyperides used in old time) luch men, I fay, do highly offend, and passe the bounds of decency exceeding much : nay, they do traduce and abuse the speakers themselves, as though they did hunt after, and lay for such excessive and proud commendations. Those also be odious and unpleasant, who as if they were in some judiciall Court, depose and give formall testimony as touching the honour of the speakers, and binde the same with an oath ineither be they in lesse fault, who without regard of the quality of persons do accommodate unto them their titles of praise beside all decorum: As for example, when they be ready to cry aloud unto a Philosopher, O quick and witty saying 1 and unto an old man, O what a brave and jolly speech is this! transferring and applying unto Philosophers thole words and termes that ordinarily are used or attributed to players, or such as exercise and thew themselves in scholastical declamations: and to a serious and sober oration giving a praise more befeeming a light and wanton curte an which is as much, as if upon the head of a victorious Champion, they should let a garland of lillies or roses, and not of the lawrell or wild olive free. Enripides verily, the Poet, when one over-heard him as he prompted and endited unto the actors or perions in the Chorus, a certaine fong fet to musicall harmony, and therewith laughed heartily whiles he instructed them in finging the same; If thou wert not (quoth he) some blockish and senselesse dolt, thou wouldst never laugh when I sung a heavy mixt-Lydian tune, or a note to a dumpe or dolefull ditty. Semblably, a grave Philotopher, and a man exercised in managing Stateaffaires, might very weil in mine advice, cut off, and represse the delicate insolency of some auditor, over-wantonly disposed to mirth and jollity, by saying thus unto him; Thou seemest unto me a brain-sick fellow, and untaught: for otherwhiles whiles I am teaching, preaching, and reproving vices discoursing and reading of policy and the administration of Common-weale, of the nature of the gods, or the duty of a Magistrate, thou wouldst neither dance thus and sing as thou doft. For confider with me in truth what a diforder is this, That when a Philosopher is in the Schoole at his Lecture reading, they within should keep a crying and howling, and make such noyfes, as they that be without cannot tell whether it be some piper, harper, or dancer that they thus do praise, such a consuled brute they make within. Moreover, we ought not to heare the reprehensions, rebukes, and corrections of Philosophers, reachlesly without sense of griefe and dipleasure, nor yet unmanly: for they that can so well abide to be reproved or blamed by a Philolopher, and make nothing adoe at it, infomuch as when they be found fault withall they fall a laughing, or can find in their hearts to praife those that do reprehend them, much like unto these flattering Parasites, who are content to extoll and commend their good Masters that give them their meat and drinke, notwithstanding they be reviled and taunted by them: these fellows (I fay) of all others be most rash, audacious, and bold, shewing thereby their shamelesse impudency, which is no good nor true argument of courage and fortitude. As for a pretty scoffe pleasantly delivered, and in mirth, without any wrong meant or touch of credit, if a manknow how to take it well, and be not moved thereby to choler and displeasure, but laugh it out, it doth argueno base mind, nor want of wit and understanding, but it is a liberall and gentleman-like quality, favouring much of the ingenuous manner of the Lacedamonians. But to heare a sharpe check that toucheth the very quick, and a reprehension to reforme manners, delivered in cutting and tart words, much like unto an eager and biting medicine, and therewith not to be cast down, and fhrinke together for feare, nor to run all into a (wear, or be ready to reele and stagger with a dizzi-nesse in the head, for very shame that hath set the heart on fire; but to inseem sexible and nothing thereat moved, imiling in some fort, and drily scoffing after a diffembling manner, is a notable sign of a most dissolute and illiberall nature, past all grace, and that basheth for nothing, being so long wonted and inured to evill doing; in such fort, as the heart and conscience is hardened and overgrown with a certaine brawne and thick skin, which will not receive the marke or wale of any lash be it never so smart. And as there be many such, so you shall meet with other youths of another nature meere contrary unto them; who if they happen but once to be checked and to heare ill, are soone gone, and will not turne againe, but quit the Philosophers schooles for ever. These being endued by nature with the good rudiments and beginnings of vertue tending unto felicity another day, to wit, Shamefaltnesse and Abashment, lose the benefit thereof in that by reason of their over-much delicacy and effeeminate minds they cannot abide reproofes, nor with generofive endure corrections, but turne away their itching eares, to heare rather the pleasant and smooth tales of some flatterers or sophisters, which yeeld themno fruit flor profit at all in the end. For as he, who after incission made, or the feater of dismensing performed by the Chyrungion, runneth away from him, and will not tarry to have his wound bound up or leared, fulfail. neth all the paine of the cure, but misseth the good that might ensue thereof even so he, who into that speech of the Philosopher which bath wounded and lanced his folly and untowardnesse, will not give leifure to heale the same up, and bring it to a perfect and confirmed skin againe, go eth his waies with the painful bit and dolorous sting, but wanteth all the help and benefit of Philosophy. For not only the hurt that Telephus received, as Euripides laith,

By scales of rust both ease and remedy found, Fil'd from the speare, that first did make the wound.

But also the pricke inflicted upon a towardly young man by Philosophy, is healed by the same words that did the hurt. And therefore when he findeth himselie cheked and blamed; feele he must and suffer some imart, abide (Isay), he ought to be bitten, but not to be crusthed and confounded therewith not to be discouraged and dismaied for ever. Thus he is to thinke of himselfe being now inducted in Philosophy, as if he were a novice newly inflituted and protessed in misselfe being now inducted in Philosophy, as if he were a novice newly inflituted and protessed in the first explaints of the protesses and acreed mysteries; namely, that after he hath patiently endured awhile the first explaints of the protesses he may hope at the end thereof to see and find some sweet wordsulf and institute of consolation after this present disquiettesses and agony. Say also shat he were wrongsulfy and without cause thus inubbed and rebuked by the Philosopher, yet he shall do well to have patient and sit out the end. And after the speech sin sherry of speech and webeneavy of reprote which he now used, for to represse and to read: in Mussel and to play upon the Lute or Harpe; yea, and in bodily exercise, the sear of wrestling and other activities at the beginning be painfull, cumbersome, and exceeding hard, but after that one be well ented and have made some propresse therein, by little and little continual.

use and custome (much after the manner of conversing and acquaintance among men) maketh mailty, engendreth further knowledge, and then every thing that was strange and difficult be-fore proveth familiar and easie enough both to say and do: Even so it fareth in Philosophy, whereat the first there seemeth no doubt to be some strangenesse, obscurity, and I wot not what barrennesse, as well in the termes and words, as in the matters therein contained: Howbeit, for all that a young man must not for want of heart be assonied at the first entrance into it, nor yet for faintnesse be discouraged and give over: but make proofe and triall of every thing, persever and continue in diligence, destrous ever to passe on still and proceed further, and as it were, to draw well before, waiting and attending the time which may make the knowledge thereoffamiliar by the and cultome, the only meanes which every thing that is of it selfe good and honest, to be also sweet and pleasant in the end. And verily this familiarity will come on apace, bringing with it a great clearenesse and light of learning: it doth ingenerate also an ardent love and affection to vertue, without which love a man were most wretched or timorous, if he should apply himselfe to follow another course of life, having once given over for want of heart the study of Philotophy. But peradventure it may fall out to, that young men not well experienced may find at the beginning such difficulties in some matters that hardly or unnerh at all they shall be able to comprehend them. Howbeit, they are themselves partly the cause that they do incur this obscurity and ignorance: who being of divers and contrary natures, yet fall into one and the selle-same inconvenience. For some upon a certaine respectuous reverence which they bare unto their Reader and Doctor, or because they would seeme to spare him, are afraid to aske questions, and to be confirmed and resolved in doubts arising from the doctrine which he delivereth: and so give signes by nodding their heads that they approve all, as if they understood every thing very well. Others againe, by reason of a certaine importune ambition and vaine emulation of others, for to hew the quicknesse and promptitude of their wit, and their ready capacity, giving out that they fully understand that which they never conceived, by that meanes attainer onothing. And thus it commeth to passe, that those bashfull ones, who for modesty and shamefastness are filent, and dare not aske that whereof they are ignorant, after they be departed out of the au-ditory are in heavinesse and doubtfull perplexity, untill at last they be driven of necessity with greater shame to trouble those who have once already delivered their doctrine, to runne (I lay) unto them backagaine and move questions anew. And as for these ambitious, bold and presumptuous persons, they beforced to palliate, cover, and disguite their ignorance and blindnesse which abideth with them for ever. Therefore cashing behind us, and rejecting all such stupidity and vanity; let us take paines and endeavour how oever we do to learn and throughly to comprehend all profitable discourses that shall be taught unto us: and for to effect this, let us be content gently to beare the scoffs and decisions of others, that thinke themselves quicker of conceit than our ielves; according to the example of Cleanthes and Xenocrates, who being somewhat more groffe and dull of capacity than others their school-fellows, ran not therefore away from schoole, nor were any whit discouraged, but the first that scoffed and made sport with themfelves, faying, they were like unto narrow-mouthed vessels, and brazen tables, for that they hardly conceived any thing that was taught them, but they retained and kept the same safe and surely when they had it once: for not only as Phocylides faith,

Who feeks in th' end for goodnesse and for praise, Meane while must be deceived many waies.

But also to infler himselfer be morked oftentimes, and to endure much reproach, to abide broad jelts, and scurrilescoffes: expelling ignorance with all his might and maine; yea, and conquering

Moreover, we must be carefull to avoid one fault more, which many commit on the contrary side; who for that they be somewhat slow or apprehension and idle with all, are very troubleslome into their teachers, and importune them over-much: when they be apart by themselves, they will not take any paines nor labour to understand that which they have heard; but they put their Masters to new travell who reade unto them: asking and enquiring of them ever and anon concerning one and the same thing, refembling herein young callow birds which are not yet seathered and fledged, but alwaies gaping toward the bill of the damme, and so by their good wills would have nothing given thembut that which hath been chewed and prepared already. Now there be others yet, who desirous beyond all reason to be counted quick of wit and attentive hearers, wearie their Masters, even as they are reading unto them, with much prittle practic intertupting them every foot in their lectures, demanding of them one thing or other that is needles and impertinent, calling for proofes and demonstrations of things where no need is:

Thus they much paines for little take, And of short way long journies make.

According as Sophocles haid making much works not only for themselves, but also for others: For staying their teacher thus as they do every foot with their vaine and superfluous questions, as if they were walking together upon the way, they hinder the course of the Lecture, being so often interrupted and broken off. These sellows then according to the saying of Hierow, in this doing are much like to cowardly and bashardly cur-dogs, which, when they be at home within house, will bite the hides and skins of wildbeasts, and lie tugging at their shagged haire: but they dare not touch them abroad in the field. Furthermore, I would give those others, who are but soft spirited and slow withall, this counsell, that retaining the principall points of every matter, they supply the rest apart by themselves, exercising their memory, and, as it were, leading it by the hand to all that dependeth thereto: to the end that when they have conceived in their spirit the words of others, as it were the elementary beginning and the very feed, they might nourish and augment the same: For that the mind and understanding of man is not of the nature of a vesfell that requireth to be filled up: but it hath need only of fome match (if I may fo fay) to kindle and fet it on fire (like as the matter standeth ever in need of the efficient cause) which may ingender in it a certaine inventive motion, and an affection to find out the truth. Well then, like as if a man going to his neighbour for to fetch fire, and finding there good flore, and the same burning light in the chimney, should fit him down by it and warme himselfe continually thereat, and never make care to take some of it home with him, you would take him to be unwise : even so he, that commeth to another for to learne, and thinketh not that he ought to kindle his own fire within, and make light in his own mind, but taketh pleasure in hearing only, and there fitteth by his Mafter fill, and joyeth only in this contentment: he may well get himfelfe a kind of opi-nion by the words of another, like a fresh and red colour by sitting by the fire side; but as for the mosse or rust of his mind within, he shall never scoure it out, nor disperse the darknesseby the light of Philosophy.

Now if there be need yet of one precept more to atchieve the duty of agood auditor, it is this, That we ought to remember eftleones that which now I have to fay: namely, That we exercise our wir and understanding by our selves, to invent fomersthing of our own, as well as to comprehend that which we heare of others: to the end that we may acquire within our selves a certaine habitude, nor sophisticall nor historicall, that is to fay, apparant only, and able to recite barely that which we have been taught by others, but more inwardly imprinted and philosophicall making this account, that the very beginning of a good life is to heare well and as we ought,

Of Morall Vertue.

The Summary.

Defore he entreth into the discourse of vertues and vices, he treateth of Morall vertue in generall:

which he discossing the handexaminath: Wherein after that he had begun to dissure concerning the composition of the soule, he adsoprath his own opinion touching that property, which Morall vertue hath particularly by it suffe, as also wherein it different from contemplative Philosophy. Mediocrity of this vertue, and declared the difference between Continence and Temperance, he seketh of the impression of reason into some last of the singular than the state of the impression of reason into some affections of the soule; proving the inequality therein, with such a

Of Morall Vertue.

Y purpose is to treate of that vertue which is both called and reputed Morall, and namely, wherein it different especially from vertue contemplative: as having for the fubject matter thereof, the passions of themind, and for the forme, Readon Likewise, of what nature and substance it is as also, how it doth substit and hath the being to wit, whether that part of the soule which is capable of the said vertue be endued and adomed with reason as appropriate and peculiar unto its or, whether it borrow it from other parts, and to receiving it, be like unto things mingled, and adhering to the better: or rather, for that being under the government and rule of another, it be said to participate the power and pussificance of that which commendent it? For, that vertue also may jub soft and have an effentiall being, without any subject matter and mixture at all, J suppose it is very evident and apparent. But first and formost, I hold it very expedient, briefly to run through the opinions of other Philosophers, nor so much by way of an Historical Inartation and so an end, as, that when they be once shewed and laid abroad, our opinion may both appeare more plainly, and also be held more surely.

Mendamu then, who was borne in the City Eretria, abolished all plurality and difference of vertues, supposing that there was but one only vertue, and the same known by sundry names:

For he faid, that it was but one and the fame thing, which men called Temperance, Fortitude, and Justice: like as if one should say, A Reasonable creature, and a man, he meaneth the selfefame thing. As for Arifton the Chian, he was of opinion likewile, that in substance there was no more but one vertue, the which he termed by the name of Health : mary, in some divers respects there were many vertues, and those different one from another : as namely for example, if a man should call our eye-fight, when it beholdeth white things, Leucothea: when it feeth black, Melanthie: and so likewife in other matters. For vertue, (quoth he) which concerneth and confidereth what we ought quiffer to do or not to do, beareth the name of prudence: when it ruleth and ordereth our luit or concupitence limiting out a certaine measure, and lawfull proportion of time unto pleasures, it is called Temperance: if it intermeddle with the commerce contracts, and negotiation between man and man, then it is named Judice: like as (to make it more plaine) a knife is the fame fill, although it cut now one thing, and then another: and the fire not withstanding it worketh upon fundry matters, yet it remaineth alwaies of one and the same nature. It feemeth alio, that Zeno the Citiean inclined informe fort to this opinion, who in defining Prudence, faith, that when it doth distribute to every manhis own, it ought to be called Justice; when it is occupied in objects either to be cholen or a worlded, than it is Temperance; and in bearing or inffering it should be named Fortitude. Now, they that defend and maintaine this opinion of Zeno, affirme, that by Prudence he understandeth Science or Knowledge, But Chryopinion of census and the state of the state cy: lo allo of Gracious he comes in with Gratiolity, of Good Goodnetle, of Great Greatnesse. of Honelt Honelty, and all other fuch like Dexterities, affabilities, and courtefies he termed by the name of vertues, and to peffered Philotophy with new, ftrange, and about words, more wis than

Now these Philosophers agree joyntly all in this, that they set down vertue to be a certaine dispension and power of the principall part of the soule, acquired by reason: or rather, that it is reason it selfe: and this they suppose as a truth confessed, certaine, firme, and irrefragable. They hold allo, that the part of the loule, subject to gassions, sensuall, brutish, and unreasonable, different not from reason by any estential difference, or by nature: but they imagine, that the very part and substance of the soule which they call understanding, reason, and the principall part, being wholly turned and changed, as well in judden paffions, as alterations by habitude and diposi-tion, becommeth either vice or vertue, and in it selle hath no brutishnesse at all that is named only unreasonable, according as the motion of the appetite and lust is so powerfull, that it becommeth Mistresse, and by that means she is driven and carrried forcibly to some dishonest and abourd courie, contrary to the judgment of reason: For they would have that very motion or passion itie fe to be realon, howbeit deprayed and naught, as taking her force and strength from falle and perverse judgement. Howbeit, all these (as it may seeme) were ignorant of this one point; hamely, that each one of us (to speake truly) is double and compound: And as for one of these duplicities they never throughly law; that only which is of the twaine more evident, to wir, the mixture or composition of the soule and body they acknowledge. And yet, that there is besides a certaine duplicity in the foule it felfe, which consisteth of two divers and different natures : and namely, that the brutish and reasonlesse part, in manner of another body, is combined and knit into reason by a certaine naturall linke of necessity: It feemeth that Pythagoras himselfe was not ignorant: And this we may undoubtedly gather and conjecture by his great diligence which he employed in that Musick and Harmony which he inferred for the dulcing, taming, and appearing of the foule: as knowing full well, that all the parts thereof were not obedient and jubject to instruction, learning, and discipline, neyet such as might by reason be altered and trained from vice to vertue: but required fome other kind of perswafive power co-operative with it, for to frame the same and make it gentle and trachable: for otherwise it would be hardly or never conquered by Philosophy, and brought within the compasse of obedience; so obstinate and rebellious it is. And Plato verily was of this opinion, (which he professed openly, and held as a firme and undoubted truth) that the foule of this univerfall world is not simple, uniforme, and uncompounded, but mixed (as it were) of a certaine power of * Identity and of Diversity. For after one fort it is governed and turned about continually in an uniforme manner, by meanes of one and the same order, which is powerfull and predominant over all: and after another fort againe. it is divided into circles spheares, and motions, wandring and contrary in manner to the other: whereupon dependent the beginning of diversity in generation of all things in the earth. Semblably (quoth he) the soule of man being a part and portion of that universall soule of the world, composed likewise of proportions and numbers answerable to the other, is not simple and of one nature or affection but one part thereof is more spirituall, intelligible, and reasonable which ought of right and according to nature have the loveraignty and command in man: the other is british sentiall, erroneous and disorderly of it selfe, requiring the direction and guidance of another. Now, this is subdivided againe into other two parts; whereof the one is alwaies called Corporall or Vegetative; the other Thymoeides, as one would fay, Irafcible and

Concupifcible; which one while doth adhere and flick close to the foresaid grosse and corporall portion: and otherwhiles to the more pure and spirituall part, which is the discourse of reaion; unto which according as it doth frame and apply it selfe, it giveth strength and vigour thereto. Now the difference between the one and the other may be known principally by the fight and resistance that oftentimes is between understanding and reason on the one side, and the concupitence and wrathfull part on the other; which sheweth that these other faculties are often disobedient and repugnant to the best part. And verily Arifiale used these principles and grounds especially above all others at the first, as appeareth by his writings: but afterwards, he attributed the irafcible part unto the concupifcible; confounding them both together in one, as if ire were a concupilcence or defire of revenge. Howbeit, this he alwaies held to the very end, That the brurish and sensual part, which is subject unto passions, was wholly and ever distinct from the intellectual part, which is the same that reason: not that it is fully deprived of reason, as is that corporal and groffe part of the foule, to wit, whereby we have fente only common with bealts, and whereby we are nourished as plants. But whereas this being ford and deafe, and altogether uncapable of reason, doth after a fort proceed and spring from the sless, and alwaies cleave unto the body: the other sensual part which is so subject unto passions, although it be in it selfe destitute of reason, as a thing proper unto it : yet neverthelesse apt and sit it is to heare and obey the understanding and discoursing part of the mind; insomuch as it will turne unto it, suffer it leife to be ranged and ordered according to the rules and precepts thereof; unlesseit be utterly spoyled and corrupted, either by blind and foolish pleasure, or else by a loose and intemperate course of life. As for them that make a wonder at this, and do not conceive how that part being in some sort brutish and unreasonable, may yet be obedient unto reason, they seeme unto me nemg in toinerior contains an area of the significant power of reasons assembly better this, and forcible, or how far forth it may pierce and passe in command, guidance, and direction; not by way of rough, churlish, violent, and irregular courses, but by faire and formall meanes, which are able to do more by gentle inducements and perswasions; than all the necessary constraints and inforcements in the world. That this is so, it appeareth by the breath, spirits, sinews, bones, and other parts of the body, which be altogether void of reason: howbeit, fo some as there ariseth any motion of the will, which shaketh (as it were) the reinestof reason never so little, all of them keep their order, they agreetogether, and yeeld obedience! As for example, if the mind and will be disposed to run, the feet are quickly firetched out and ready for a course; the hands likewise tettle to their businesse if there be a motion of the mind either to throw or takehold of any thing. And verily, the Poet Homer most excellently expresses the sympathy and conformity of this brutish part of the foule unto reason, in these verses;

Thus wept the chafte Penelope,
And drench her lovely face,
With dreary teares, which from her eyes
Rau trickling down apace i
For tender heart, bemailing fore
The loffe of husband deares,
Wylfics hight, who was in place
Set by her fale full neare.
And he himfelfe in foules, no leffe,
Didpty for to fee
His heft beloved thus to weep?
But wife and crafty he Kept in his teares: for why?
His eyes within the lids were fet
As fiffe as iron and flundy hornes,
One droywould they no flord.

In such obedien eto the judgement of reason he had his breath, spirits, his bloud, and his teares, An evident proofe hereof is to be seen in those, whose flesh dorn rise upon the first fight of faire and beautifull persons: for no sooner doth reason or law forbid to come neare and touch them, but presently the same falleth, lieth down, and is quiet againe without any stirring or panting at all. A thing very ordinary and most commonly perceived in those, who be enamoured upon faire women, not knowing at first who they were: For so soon as they perceive afterwards that they be their own fifters or daughters, their luft presently cooleth, by meanes of reason that toucheth it, and interposeth it selfe between: so that the body keepeth all the members thereof decently in order and obedient to the judgment of the faid reason. Moreover, it falleth out oftentimes, that we eare with a good floma k and great pleasure certaine meats and viands before we know what they are: but after we understand and perceive once that we have taken either that which was uncleane, or unlawfull and forbidden: not only in our judgement and understanding we find trouble and offence thereby; but also our bodily faculties, agreeing to our opinion, are dismayed thereat: fo that anon there ensue vomits, fick qualmes, and overturnings of the stomack which disquiet all the whole frame. And were it not that I greatly feared to be thought of purposeto gather and infert in my discourse such pleasant and youthfull inducements, I could infer in this place Pfalteries, Luces, Harpes, Pipes, Flutes, and other like mufical linftruments, how they are devited by artifor to accord and frame with humane passions: for notwithstanding they be altogether without life, yet they ceale not to apply themselves unto us, and the judgement of our minds lamenting finging, wantonly disporting together with us, refembling both the turbulent pations, and also the mild affections and dispositions of those that play upon them. And yet verily it is reported also of Zeno himselfe, that he went one day to the Theatre for to heare the Musician Amabem, who fung unto the Harpe: faying unto his schollars, Let us go Sirs and learne what harmony and musick, the entrailes of beasts, their snews and bones make: Let us see (I say) what refenance and melody bare wood may yeeld, being ditpofed by numbers, proportions, and order.

But leaving theie examples, I would gladly demard and aske of them, if when they fee dogs, liofles, and birds, which we nouriff and keep in our houles, brought to that paffe by the feeding, and teaching that they learne to render tentible words, to performe certaine motions, gettures, and diversfeats, both pleasant and profitable unto us; and likewise, when they read in Homer, how Achilles encouraged to battell both horse and man; they do marvell fill, and makedoubt, whether that part and faculty in us, whereby we are angry, do luft, joy, or grieve, be of that nature that it can well obey reason and be so affected and disposed thereby that it may give affent thereto: confidering especially, that it is not feated or lodged without, nor separated from us, ne yet framed by anything which is not in us: no nor shapen by forcible meanes and constraint to wit, by mold, firoke of hammer, or any fuch thing : but as it is fitted and forged by nature, fo it keepeth toher, is convertant with her, and finally perfected and accomplished by custome and continu-ance. Which is the reason that very properly Manners be called in Greeke by the name $60.50 to give us to understand, that they are nothing elie (to speake plainly and after a grosse manner) but a certaine quality imprinted by long continuance of time in that part of the soule which of it selfe is unreasonable: and is named #005, for that the said reasonlesse part, framed by reason, taketh this quality or difference (call it whether you will) by the means of long time and custome which they terme 2005. For reason is not willing to root out quite all passions (which were neither possible nor expedient) but only it doth limit them within certaine bounds, and setteth down a kind of order: and thus after a fort causeth Morall vertues not to be impassibilities, but rather mediocrities and regularities, or moderations of our affections: and this it doth by the meanes of prudence and wildome, which reduceth the power of this fenfuall and patheticall part unto a civil and honest habitude. For thesethree things (they say) are in the soule of man, to wit, a naturall puissance or faculty, a passion or motion, and also an habitude. Now the said faculty or power is the very beginning, and (as a man would fay) the matter of passions, to wit, the power or apineffe to be angry, to be ashamed, or to be confident and bold. The passion is the actuall moving of the faid power: namely, angerit selle, shame, confidence, or boldnesse. The habitude is a fetled and confirmed strength established in the sensual or unreasonable part by continuall use and custome: which if the passions be ill-governed by reason, becommet to be a vice: and contrariwife, a vertue; in case the same be well ordered and directed thereby. Moreover, foraimuch as Philotophers do not hold and affirme, that every vertue is a mediocrity, nor call it Morall: to the end therefore that we may the better declare and shew the difference, we had need to fetch the beginning of this discourse farther off.

Of all things then that be in the world, some have their effence and being of themselves absolutely and simply: others respectively and in relation to us. Absolutely have their being the earth, the heaven, the stars, and the sea: Respectively, and in regard of us, Good, evill, profitable, hurtfull, pleasant, and displeasant. Now it being so, that reason doth contemplate and behold the one fort as well as the other: the former ranke of those things which are simply and absolutely fo pertaine unto Science and speculation as their proper objects: the second kind of those things which are understood by reference and regard unto us pertaine properly unto consultation and action. And as the vertue of the former fort is called Sapience: to the vertue of the other is named Prudence. For difference there is a between Prudence and Sapience: in this, that Prudence confideth in a certaine relation and application of the contemplative faculty of the foule unto action, and unto the regiment of the tentual part according to reason: by which occasion Prudence had need of the affiftance of Fortune: whereas Sapience hath nothing to do with it, no more than it hath need of consultation for to attaine and reach unto the end it aimeth at. For that indeed it concerneth such things as be ever one and alwaies of the same sort. And like as the Geometrician neverconfulteth as touching a triangle, to wit, whether it hath three angles equall to twaine that be right, or no? Because he knoweth affuredly that it hath (for all consultations are concerning things that alter and vary sometime after one fort, and otherwhiles after another, and never medleth with those that be firme stable, and immutable) even so, the underflanding and contemplative faculty of the mind, exercifing her functions in those first and principall thirgs which be permanent, and have evermore the same nature, not capable of change and mutation, is sequestred and exempt altogether from consultation. But Prudence which descendeth to things full of variety errour, trouble, and confusion, must of necessity estsoones intermede with calualties and tile deliberation in things more doubtfull and uncertaine : yea, and after it hath consulted to proceed unto action, calling and drawing unto it the reason lefte part also to beaffiftant and prefent, as drawn unto the judgement of things to be executed. For need those actions have a certaine inftinct and motion to fer them forward, which this Morall habitude doth make in each passion, and the same instinct requireth likewise the assistance of reason to limit it that it may be moderate, to the end that it neither exceed the meane, nor come short and be defective: for that it cannot be chosen but this brutish and passible part hath motions in it 3 fome over-vehement, quick, and sudden, others as flow againe, and more flack than is meet. Which is the reason that our actions cannot be good but after one manner: whereas, they may be evillafter divers forts: like as a man cannot hit the marke but one way: mary he may miffe fundry waies either by over-shooting or comming short. The part and duty then of that active faculty of realon according to nature, is to cut off and take away all those excessive or defective passions, and to reduce them unto a mediocrity. For whereas the laid instinct ormotion, either by infirmity, effeminate delicacy, feare, or floathfulnesse, doth faile and come short of the duty and the end required, there active reason is present ready to rouze, excite, and stir up the same. Againe on the other side, when it runneth on end beyond all measure, after a dissolute and disorderly manner, there reason is prest, to abridge that which is too much, and to represse and stay the same: thus ruling and restraining these patheticall motions, it breedeth in man these Morall vertues whereof we speake, imprinting them in that reasonlesse part of the mind: and no other they are than a meane between excesse and defect. Neither must we thinke, That all vertues do consist in a mediocrity: for Sapience or Wisdome, which stand in no need at all of the brutish and unreasonable part, and consist only in the pure and sincere intelligence and discourse of understanding, and not subject to all passions, is the very height and excellency of reason, perfect and absolute of it selfer a full and accomplished power (I say) wherein is engendred that most divine, heavenly, and happy knowledge. But Morall vertue which savoureth somewhat of the earth, by reason of the necessities of our body, and in which regard it standeth in need of the inftrumentall ministry of the patheticall part, for to worke and performe her operations, being in no wife the corruption or abolition of the fenfuall and unreasonable part of the foule, but rather the order, moderation, and embellishment thereof, is the extremity and height of excellence, in respect of the facultie and quality: but considering the quantity is rather a mediocrity, taking away the excesse on the one side, and the defect on the other, "

But now, forasmuch as this terme of Meane or Mediocrity may be understood diverse waies. we are to let down what kind of meane this Morall vertue is First and formost therefore, whereas there is one meane compounded of two simple extremes, as a misset or brown colour between white and black: also that which containeth and is contained must need be the midst between the thing that doth containe and is contained, as for example, the number of 8, is just between 12 and 4, like as that, which taketh no part at all of either extreame, as namely, those things which we call Adiaphora, Indifferent, and do partake neither good norill: In none of these significations or fenses can this vertue be called a meane or mediocrity. For furely it may not be in any wife a composition or mixture of two vices which be both worse: neither doth it comprehend the lefte and defective: or is comprehended of that which is over-much above decen-cy, and exceffive, ne yet is it altogether void of passions and perturbations, subject to excelle and defect, to more and lesse than is meet. But this morall vertue of ours, as it is in deed, so also it is called a Meane, especially in respect of that mediocrity which is observed in the Harmony and accord of founds. For like as in Musicke there is a note or found called the Meane, for that it is the midst between the base and trebble, which in Greeke be called Hypate and Nete, and lieth just betwixt the height and loudnesse of the one, and the lownesse or basenesse of the other: Even so, morall vertue being a motion and faculty about the unreasonable part of the soule, rempereth the remission and intention; and in one word, taketh away the excesse and defect of the paffions, reducing each of them to a certaine Mediocrity and moderation that falleth not on

Now, to begin with Fortitude, they say it is the meane between Cowardise and rash Audacity, of which twaine, the one is a defect, the other an excelle of the irefull passion. Liberality, between Nigardile and Prodigatity; Clemency and Mildneffe; between fenfeleffe Indolence and Cruelry: Justice, the meane of giving more or lesse than due; in contracts and affaires between men: Like as Temperance, a mediocrity between the blockish stupidity of the mind moved with no touch of pleasure, and an unbridled loosenesse whereby it is abandoned to all sensuality. Wherein especially and most clearely is given us to understand and see the difference between the brutish and the reasonable part of the soule: and thereby evident it is that wandring passions be one thing, and reason another: for otherwise we should not discerne Continency from Temperance, nor Incontinency from Intemperance, if p easure and lusts, if that faculty of the mind whereby we judge, and that whereby we cover and defire were all one and the fame: but now, Temperance is, when reason is able to manage, handle, and governe the sensual and passionate part (as if it were a beaft brought up by hand and made tame and gentle, fo it will be ready to obey it in all defires and lufts, yea, and willing to receive the bit) whereas Continency is when reason do trule and command concupicence, as being the stronger, and leader it, but not with-our some paines and trouble thereof, for that it is not willing to shew obedience, but striveth, flingerh our sidelong, and goeth crossed, insomuch as it hathenough to do for ro master it with ftripes of the cudgell, and with hard bits of the bridle to hold it in and reftraine it, whiles it refifteth all that ever it may, and putteth reason to much agony, trouble and travell: which Plato doth lively represent unto us by a proper similitude, saying, that there be two draught beasts which draw the chariot of our soules, whereof the worst doth both winseand strive against the other) fellow in the lame yoke, and also troubleth the coach-man or charioter, who hath the conduct of them; purting him to his shifts, that he is faine alwaies to pull in and hold his head hard, otherwhites glad to let him flack and give him the head for feare, as Simonides faith,

Out of his hands should slip anon.
Thus you see what the reason is, why they do not vouchfase Continency, the name of a persect vertue in it selfe, but thinke it to be lesse than vertue. For there is not in it a certaine mediocrity arising from e Symphony and accord of the worse with the better : neither is the excesse of paffion cut away, ne yet doth the appetite yeeld it selfe obedient and agreeable to reason: but doth trouble and vexe, and is troubled and vexed reciprocally, being kept down perforce and by constraint; like as in a seditious state, both parties at discord intending mischiete and war one against another dwell together within the precinct of one wall: insomuch as the soule of a continent person for the fight and variance between reason, and appetite, may aptly be compared as Sophocles faith unto a city,

Which at one time is full of incense sweet,

Refounding mirst with loud trimmphant fong,
And yet the fame doth yetdan every firee
All fignes of grifte, with plaints and grounts among.
And hereupon it is allo, that they hold incontinency to be leffe than vice: mary, Intemperance they will have to be afull and compleat vice indeed: For that in it as the affection is ill, so the reason also is corrupt and depraved! and as by the one it is incited and led to the appetite of filthineste and dishonesty, so by the other through perverse judgement it is induced to give consent unto dishonest lusts, and withall groweth to be senselesse, and hath no seeling at all of sins and faults which it committeth: whereas Incontinency reteineth still a right and found judgement by meanes of reason: Howbeit through the vehement and violent passion which is stronger than reason, it is carried away against the owne judgement. Moreover, in these respects, it differeth from Intemperance : For that the reason of the incontinent person is over-matched with passion: but of the other it doth not so much as enter combatetherewith, He, albeit he contradict gain fay, and frives a whilesyet in the end yeeldeth unto lufts & followeth them; but the Intemperate man is led thereby, and at the first giveth confent, and approve th thereof. Again, the Intemperate person is well content, and taketh joy in having sinned: whereas the other is presently grieved thereat. Agains he runneth willingly and of his own accord to commit sin and villany; but the incontinent man, maugre and full against his mind doth abandon honesty. And as there is this diffinct difference plainly leen in their deeds and actions, fo there is no lesse to be observed in their words and speeches. For the sayings ordinarily of the Intemperate person be these and such

What mirth in life, what pleasure, what delight, Without content in Sports of Venus bright? Were those joyes past, and I for them unmeet, Ring out my knell, bring forth my winding sheet. Another faith, To eate to drinke, to wench, are principalli

All pleasures else, I Accessories call. As if with all his heart and sople he were wholly given to a voluptous life, yea, and overwhelmed therewith. And no leffe than those, he also who hath these words in his mouth,

Now Suffer me to perish by and by ; It pleaseth, nay, it booteth me to dy.

Speaketh as one whose appetite and judgement both were out of order and diseased. But the speeches of Incontinent persons be in another key and far different: For one faith,

My mind is good and that her doth fway, My nature bad and puts it away. Another,

Alas, alas, To fee, how Gods above Have fent to men on earth this mifery To know their Good, and that which they should love, Tet wanting grace to do the contrary! And a third.

Now plucks, now hales, of deadly ire a fire: But furely hold my reason can no more: Than anchor flouke shay ship from being split, When grounded'tis on fands neare to the shore.

He nameth not unproperly and without good grace the flouke of an anchor resting lightly upon the loofe fand, to figuifie the feeble hold that reason hath, which is not resolute and firmly seated, but through the weakenesse and delicacy of the soule, rejecteth and forsaketh judgement: And not much unlike hereunto is this comparison also that another maketh in a contrary sense;

Much like a ship which fastned is to land With cordage strong, whereof we may be bold, The winds do blow, and yet she doth withst and And check them all her cables take (uch hold.

He termed the judgement of reason, when it resisteth a dishonest act, by the name of Cable and Cordage; which notwithstanding afterwards may be broken by the violence of some passion (as it were) with the continual gales of a bluftering wind. For to fay a very truth, the intemperate person is by his lusts and desires carried with full faile to his pleasures; he giveth himselse thereto, and thither directeth his whole courie: but the incontinent person tendeth thither alfo: howbeit (as a man would fay) crookedly and not directly, as one defirous and endeavouring to withdraw himselfe, and to repell the passion that draweth and moveth him to it, yet in the end he also slideth and falleth into some foule and dishonest act: Like as Timen by way of biting scoffed traduced and reproved Anaxarchus in this wife,

Here (hews it felfe the dogged force of Anaxarchus fell, So stubborne and so permanent, when once he tooke apitch: And yet as wife as he would seeme, a wretch (I heard folke tell) He judged was, for that to vice and pleasures overmuch By nature prone he was: a thing that Sages most do shun,

Which brought him back out of the way, and made him dote anon.

For neither is a wife Sage properly called continent, but temperate: nor a foole in continent, but intemperate: because the one taketh pleasure and delight in good and lionest things; and the other is not offended nor displeased with foule and dishonest actions. And therefore incontinemy refembleth properly a mind (as I may fo fay) Sophisticall, which hath some use of reason, but the same so weake, that it is not able to persever and continue firme in that which it hath once known and judged to be right, Thus you may see the differences between Intemperance and Incontinence: As for Continency and Temperance, they differ also incertaine respects correspondent in some proportion unto those on the contrary fide. For remorfe, forrow, displeasure and indignation, do not as yet abandon and quit continence: whereas in the mind of a temperate person, all lieth plaine and even on everyside; nothing therebut quietnesse and integrity; in such fort, as whosoever feeth the great obeisance and the marvellous tranquillity whereby the reasonlesse part is united and incorporate together with the reasonable, might

And then anon the winds were down. A calme ensued straight way: Nowaves were feen, some power divine The fea afteep did lay.

Namely, when reason had once extinguished the excessive, surious, and raging motions of the lusts and defires. And yet these affections and passions which of necessity nature hath need of the fame hath reason made so agreeable, so obeysant, so friendly and co-operative, yea, and ready to second all good intentions and purposes ready to be executed; that they neither run before it, nor come dragging behind; ne yet behave themselves ditorderly, no, nor shew the least disobedience: io as each appetite is ruled by reason, and willingly accompanieth it,

Like as the sucking foale doth go And run with dam, both to and fro.

The which confirmeth the laying of Xenocrates, touching those who earnestly study Philosophy, and practice it : For they only (quoth he) do that willingly, which others do perforce, and for dread of the Law: who for beare indeed to fatisfie their pleasures, and turne back, as if they were leared from them for feare of being bitten of some curit mallive or shrewdeat, regarding nothing eliebut danger that may entue thereupon. Now, that there is in the foule a fenseand perceivance of that strength, firmity, and resolution to encounter sinfull lusts and desires, as if it had a power to frive and make head againe it is very plaine and evident: howbeit, somethere be, who hold and maircaine, That Passion is nothing different from Reason: neither (by their laying) is there in the mind a dissension or sedition (as it were) of two divers faculties: but all the trouble that we feele is no more but an alteration or change of one and the felfe-same thing, to wit, reafon both waies; which we our selves are not able to perceive, for that for looth it changeth suddealy and with such celerity: never considering all the while, that the same saculty of the mind. is framed by nature to concupilience and repentance both : to be angry and to feare: enclined to commit some soule and dishonest fact by the allurement of pleasure, and contrariwise restrained from the same for seare of paine. As for lust, seare, and all such like passions, they are no other (say they) but perverie opinions and corrupt judgements not arising and engendred in any one part of the foule by it felfe, but spread over that which is the chiefe and principall, to wit reason and understanding: whereof they be the inclinations, affentions, motions, and in one word, certaine operations, which in the turning of a hand be apt to change and passe from one to another: much like unto the sudden braids, starts, and runnings to and tro of sittle children, which how violent foeverthey be and vehement, yet by reason of their weakenesse are but slippery, unstediast and

But these affertions and oppositions of theirs are checked and resuted by apparant evidence and common tenie: For what man is he that ever felt in himselfe a change of his lust and concupitence into judgement: and contrariwise an alteration of his judgement into lust: neither doth the wanton lover cease to love when he doth reason with himselfe and conclude, That such love is to be repressed, and that he ought to strive and fight against it: neither doth he then give over reasoning and judging, when being overcomethrough weakenesse, he yeeldeth himselse prisoner and thrail to lust but like as when by advertisement of reason he doth resist in some forta passion ariting, yet the same doth (till tempt him: so likewise when he is conquered and overcome therewith by the light of the lame reason at that very instant he leeth and knoweth that he sinneth and doth amise: 10, that neither by those perturbations is reason lost and abolished; nor yet by reaton is he freed and delivered from them: but whiles he is to fled thus to and fro, he remaineth a neuter in the midft, or rather participating in common of them both. As for those who are of opinion, that one while the principall part of our foule is lust and concupilcence: and then anon that it doth refift and standagainst the same, are much like unto them, who imagine and say, that the hunter and the wild beast be not twaine, but one body, changing it selfe, one while into the forme of anhunter, and another time taking the shape of a savage beast: For both they in a manifelt and apparant matter should seem to be blind and see nothing: and also these beare wirnesseand depole against their own sense, considering that they find and feele in themselves really not a mutation or change of one only thing, but a lensible strife and fight of two things together within them. But here they come upon us againe and object in this wife. How commeth it to passe then (say they) that the power and saculty in man which doth deliberate and consult is not likewise double (being oftentimes distracted, carried, and drawn to contrary opinions, as it is, namely, touching that which is profitable and expedient) but is one fill and the same? True we must confesse, that divided it seemeth to be : But this comparison doth not hold, neither is the event and effect alike: for that part of our soule wherein prudence and reason is seaten fighteth not with it felfe, but using the help of one and the same faculty, it handleth divers arguments, or rather being but one power of discoursing it is employed in fundry subjects and matters different: which is the reason that there is no dolour and griefe at one end of those reaforings and discourses which are without passion; neither are they that consult, forced (as it were) to hold one of those contrary parts against their mind and judgement; unlesse, peradventure it to fall out, that some affection lie close to one part or other, as if a mansh ould secretly and under-hand lay somewhat besides in one of the balances or skales, against reason for to weigh it downe. A thing (I assure you) that many times falleth out : and then it is not reason that is poyled against reason; but either ambition, emulation, favour, jealousie, feare, or some secret pattion, making femblance as if in thew offpeeches, two reasons were at variance and differed one from another. As may appeare by these verses in Homer;

They thought it shame the combate to reject,

And yet for feare they durst not it accept.

Likewise in another Poet:

To suffer death is dolorous Though with renown it meet: Death to avoid is comardife: But yet our life is [weet.

And verily in determining of controversies between man and man in their contracts and suits of Law these passions comming between, are they that make the longest delaies, and be the greatest enemies of expedition and dispatch: like as in the counsels of Kings and Princes, they that speak in favour of one party and for to win grace, do not upon any reason of two tentences encline to the one, but they accommodate themselves to their affections, even against the regard of utility and profit. And this is the cause that in those states which be called Aristocracies, that is to say, governed by a Senate or Councell of the greatest men: the Magistrates who sit in judgement will not suffer Oratours and Advocates at the Bar to move affections in all their Pleas: for in Truth, let not the discourse of reason be impeached and hindered by some passion, it will of it felie tend directly to that which is good and just But in case there do arise a passion between to crosse the same, then you shall see pleasure and displeasure to raise a combate and dissention, to encounter that which by confultation would have been judged and determined. For otherwise, how commeth it to passethat in Philosophicall discourses and disputations a man shall never see it otherwise. but that without any dolour and griefe tome are turned and drawn oftentimes by others into their opinions, and subscribe thereto willingly? Nay, even Aristotle himselfe. Democritus 2sto, and Chrysippus have been known to retract and recant some points, which before time they held, and that without any trouble of mind, without griefe and remorfe, but rather with pleasure and contentment of heart: because in that speculative or contemplative pare of the foule, which is given to knowledge and learning only, there raign no passions to make resistance, insomuch as the brutish part being quiet and at repose loveth not curiously to entermeddle in thele and such like matters: By which meanes it happeth, that the reason hath no sooner a fight of truth, but willingly it enclineth thereto, and doth reject untruth and falfity: for that there lieth in it, and in no other part elfe, that power and faculty to beleeve and give affent one way, as also to be periwaded for to alter opinion and go another way. Whereas contrariwife, the counsels and deliberations of worldly affaires, judgements also, and arbitriments, being for the most part full of passions, make the way somewhat difficult for reason to passe, and put her to much trouble. For in these cases, the sensual and unreasonable part of the soule is ready to stay and stop her course; yea, and to fright her from going forward, meeting her either with the object of pleasure; of else cathing in her way stumbling blocks of feare, of paine, of lusts and defires. And verily the deciding and judgement of this disputation lieth in the sense, which seeleth as well the one as the other and is touched with them both: For fay, that the one doth furmount and hath the victory, it doth not therefore defeatutterly and destroy the other; but drawn it is thereto perforce, and making relistance the while. As for example, the wanton and amorous perion, when he checketh and reprove th himselfe therefore, useth the discourse of reason against the said passion of his; yet so, as having them both actually subsisting together in the soule: much like as it with his hand he repressed and kept down the one part, enflamed with an hot fit of passion, and yet feeling within himselse both parts, and those actually in combate one against the other. Contrariwise, in those consultations, disputes, and inquifitions which are not passionate; and wherein those motions of the brutish part have no thing to do, such I meane as those be especially of the contemplative part of the soule: if they be equall and so continue, there ensueth no determinate judgement and resolution: but a doubt remaineth, as it it were a certaine paule or stay of the understanding, not able to proceed farther, but abiding in suspence between two contrary opinions. Now if it chance to en line unto one of them, it is because the mightier hath over-weighed the other and annulled it, yet so, as it is not displeased or discontent, no nor contesteth obstinately afterwards against the received opinion. To beshort, and to conclude all in one generall word; where it feemeth that one discourse and reason is contrary unto another; it argueth not by and by a conteit of two divers subjects, but one alone in sundry apprehensions and imaginations. Howbeit, when oever the brutish and sensuall part is in a conflict with reason, and the same such that it can neither vanquish, nor be vanquished without some fense of grievance: then incontinently this battell divideth the soule in twaine, so as the war is evident and sensible. And not only by this fight a man may know how the source and beginning of these passions differeth from that sountaine or reason: but no lesse also by the consequence that solloweth thereupon. For seeing that possible it is for a man to love one child that is ingenious and towardly disposed to vertue: as also affect another as well, who is ill given and dissolute: confidering also that one may use anger unjustly against his own children or patents: and another contrariwife justly in the defence of children or parents against enemies and tyrants. Like as in the one there is perceived a manifelt combate and resistance of passion against reason; so in the other, there may be seen as evident a yeelding and obeylance thereof, fuffering it selfe to be directed thereby, yea, and willingly running and offering her assistance and helping hand. To illustrate this by a familiar example, it hapneth otherwhiles, that an honest man espouseth a wise according to the laws, with this intention only to cherish and keep her tenderly, yea, and to company with her duly, and according to the laws of chastity and honesty: howbeit afterwards in tract of time, and by long continuance and converting together, which hath bred in his heart the affection of love, he perceiveth by discourse of reason, and findeth in himselfe that he loveth her more deerely and entirely than he purposed at first. Semblably, young Scholars having met with gentle and kind Masters, at the beginning, follow and affect them in a kind of zeale, for the benefit only that they reape by them. Howbeit afterwards in processe of time they fall to love them; and so instead of familiar and dayly disciples they become their lovers, and are so called. The same is usually to be seen in the behaviour and carriage of men toward good Magistrates in Cities, neighbours also, kinsfolke and allies: For they begin acquaintance one with another, after a civill fort only by way of duty, or necessity and ule: but afterwards by little and little ere they be aware they grow into an affectionate love of them, namely, when reason doth concur, perswading and drawing unto it that part of the mind which is the seat of passions and affections. As for that Poet, whatsoever he was, that first wrote this sentence,

Two forts there be of balkfulneffe, The one we cannot blame, The other troubleih many an house, And doth decay the fame.

Doth he not plainly shew that he hath found in himselse by experience oftentimes, that even this affection by meanes of lingring delay, and putting off from time to time. hath put him by the benefit of good opportunities, and hindred the execution of many brave affaires? Unto these proofes and allegations precedent, the Stoicks being forced to yeeld, in regard they be so cleare and evident: yet for to make some way of evasion and escape they call shame, bashfulnesse; pleasure, joy; and seare, warineffe or circumspection. And I assure you. no man could justly find fault with these dispussements of odious things with honest termes: if so be they would attribute unto these passions the faid names when they be ranged under the rule of reason, and give them their own hatefull termes indeed, when they strive with reason and violently make resistance. But when convinced by the teares which they shed, by trembling and quaking of their joynts yea, by change of colour going and comming: inflead of naming Dolour and Feare directly, come in with (I wor nor what) pretry

deviled termes of Moriures, Contractions, or Conturbations: also when they would cloake and extenuase the imperiection of other pallions, by calling but a promptitude or forwardnesse to a thing: it leemeth, that by a flourish of fine words they devile shifts, evasions, and justifications, not philofophicall but lophidicall. And yet verily they themselves againe do terme those joyes, those promptitudes of the will, and wary circumipections by the name of Espathies, i.e. good affections, and not of Apathies, that is to fay, Impatibilities: wherein they use the words aright and as they ought, For then is it truly called Enpathie : i. e. a good affection, when reason doth not urterly abolish the passion, but guideth and ordereth the same well in such as be discreet and temperate. But what befalleth upto vicious and diffolute perions? Surely, when they have let down in their judgement and resolution to love father and mother as tenderly as one lover may another; yet they are not able to performe to much, Mary fay, that they determine to affect a curtezan or a flatterer, prefently they can find in their hearts to love such most deerely. Moreover, if it were so, that passion and judgement wereboth one, it could not otherwise be, so some had determined that he ought to love or hate but that presently love or hate would follow thereupon. Bur now it falleth out cleane contrary; for that the passion as it accorde th well with some judgements and obeyeth; so it repuganeth with others, and is obstinate and disobedient: whereuponit is, that themselves enforced thereto by the truth of the thing, do affirme and pronounce that every judgement is not a passion, but that only which stirreth up and moveth a strong and vehement appetite to a thing: confessing thereby, no doubt, that one thing it is in us which judgeth, and another thing that infereth, that is to lay, which receiveth passions: like as that which moveth, and that which is moved be divers. Certes, even Chrysppus himselfe, defining in many places what is Patience and what is Continency, doth arouth, I hat they be habitudes, apt and fit to obey and fellow the choice of reason: whereby he heweth evidently that by the force of truth he was driven to confesse and avow, That there is one thing in us which doth obey and yeeld, and another which being obeyed, is yeelded unto, and not obeyed, is refilted.

Furthermore as touching the Stoicks, who hold. That all fins and faults be equall, neither will this place, not the time now serve to argue against them, whether in other points they swerve from the truth: howbeit, thus much by the way I dare be bold to say. That immost things they will be found to trepugne reason, even against apparent and manifest evidence. For according to their opinion every passion or perturbation is a fault, and wholoewer grieve, feare, or lust, do sin: but in those passions great difference there is seen according to more or lesse: for who would ever be so grosse, as to lay, that Dolons feare was equal to the feare of Ajan? who as Homer writeth,

As he went out of filddidturne Andlook behind full of: With knee before knee decently, And so retired soft.

Or compare the forrow of King Alexander, who would needs have killed himfelie for the death of Clyius, to that of Plate for the death of Socrates? For dolours and griefes encrease exceedingly when they grow upon occasion of that which hapneth besides all reason; like as any accident which falleth out beyond our expectation is more grievous, and breedeth greater anguish than that whereof a reason may be rendred, and which aman might suspect to follow. As for example, if he who ever expected to see his son advanted to honour, and living in great reputation among men, should heare lay that he were in prison, and put to all manner of torture, as Parmeno was advertised of his fon Philogas. And who will ever say, that the anger of Nicocreen against Anaxarchus, was to be compared with that of Magaa against Philemon, which arose upon the same occasion, for that they both were frightfully reviled by them in reproachfull termes; for Nicocreon caused Anaxarchus to be braid in a morter with iron pellies: whereas Magus commanded the Executioner tollay a sharpe naked lyaprd upon the neck of Philemon, and so to let him go without doing him anymore harme. And therefore it is, that Plate named anger the finewes of the foule giving us thereby to understand that they might be street hed by bitternelle, and let slack by mildnesse. But the Stoicks, for to avoid and put back these objections and such like, deny that these stretchings and vehement fits of passions be according to judgement, for that it may faile and erre many waies: laying, they be certaine pricks or flings, contractions diffusions, or dilatations, which in proportion, and according to reason, may be greater or lesse. Certes, what variety there is in judgement, it is plaine and evident. For some there be that deeme poverty not to be ill: others hold that it is very ill: and there are againe, who account it the world thing in the world; infomuch as to avoid it, they could be content to throw themselves headlong from high rocks into the ses. Also you shall have those, who reckon death to be evil, in that only it deprive thus of the fruition of many good things: others there be, who think and say as much but it is in regard of the eternall torments and horrible punishments that be under the ground in hell. As for hodily health, some love is no otherwise than a thing agreeable to nature, and profitable withall: others take it to be the loveraigne goodin the world, as without which they make no reckoning of riches, of children, Noyet of crown and regall dignity, Which men do match even with divinity.

Nay they let not in the end to thinke and lay. That vertue it felie ferveth in no flead, and availeth nought unleffeit be accompinied with good health: whereby it appeareth, that as touching judgement, some erre more, some let's. But my meaning is not now to dispute against this evasion of theirs. Thus much only I purpose to take for mine advantage out of their own consession, in that themselves do grant. That the brutish and sensual part, according to which, they say that passions be greater and more violent, is different from judgement: and how/ovever they may seeme to contest and cavil about words and names, they grant the substance and the thing it selse in question, joyning with those who maintain that the reasonates part of the soul which entertaines hossions is a together different from that which is able to discourie reason, and judge. And verily Chrysppus in those books which he entituded, Of Anomology, after he had written and taught, that anger is blind, and many times will not permit a man to see those things which be plaine and apparent, and as offen casten had ark mist over that which he hath already pertectly learned and known; proceedeth forward a little farther: For (quoth he) the passions which arise drive out and shase forth all discourse of reason, and such things as were judged and determined otherwise ag. inst them, jurging it still by force unto contrary actions. Then he useful the testimony of Menander the Poet, who in one place writers thus, by way of exclamation:

Wowerth the time, wretch that 12m2,

How was my mind distraught In body mine? where were my with? Some folly (sure) me caught, What time I fellet this. For why? Thereof I made no choice, Far better things they were, intis, Which had my former voice.

The same Chrysippus also going on still: It being to (quoth he) that a reasonable creature is by nature borne and given to tile the reason in all things, and to be governed thereby : yet notwithstanding we reject and cast it behind us, being over ruled by another more violent motion that carrieth us away. In which words, what doth heelfe but confelle eventhat which hapneth upon the diffention between affection and reason? For it were a meere ridiculous mockery indeed, as Plato faith, to affirme that a man were better and worse than himselse: or that he were able now to master himfelie, and anon ready to be mastered by himselfe, and how were it possible that the same man should be better and worse than himselse, and at once both master and servant, unlesse every one were naturally in some fort double, and had in him somewhat better and somewhat worse? And verily by that meanes he that hath the worse part, obedient to the better, hath power over himselse, yea, and is better than himselse: whereas he that suffereth the brutish and unreasonable part of his soule to command and go before, so as the better and more noble part doth follow, and is serviceable unto it, he no doubt is worse than himselse: he is (I say) incontinent, or rather impotent, and hath no power over himselfe, but disposed contrary to nature. For according to the course and ordinance of nature, meet and fit it is that reason being divine and heavenly should command and rule that which is sensuall and void of reason: which as it doth arise and spring out of the very body, so it resembleth it as participating the properties and passions thereof, yea, and naturally is full of them, as being deeply concorporate and throughly mixed therewith: As it may appeare by all the motions which it hath, tending to no other things but thole that be materiall and corporall, as receiving their augmentations and diminutions from thence, (or to fay more properly) being firetched out and let flack more or lesse, according to the mutations of the body. Which is the cause that young persons are quick, prompt, and audations: rash also, for that they be full of bloud, and the same hot, their lusts and appetites are likewise fiery, violent, and surious: whereas contrariwise in old tolke, because the source of concupiscence seated about the liver is after a sort quenched, yea, and become weake and feeble, reason is more vigorous and predominant in them, as much as the sensual and passion ate part doth languish and decay together with the body. And verily this is that which doth frame and dispose the nature of wild bealts to divers passions: For it is not long of any opinions good or bad which arife in them, that some of them are strong, venturous, and fearelesse, yea, and ready to withstand any perils presented before them: others againe be so surprised with seare and fright, that they dere not flir or do any thing; but the force and power which lieth in the blond, in the ipitits, and in the whole body, is that which causeth this diversity of passions, by reason that the passible part growing out of the flesh as from a root, doth bud forth and bring with it a quality & pronenesse semblable, But in man that there is a sympathy and fe'low moving of the body, together with the motions of the passions, may be proved by the pale colour the red flushing of the face, the trembling of the joynts, and panting and leaping of the heart in feare and anger: And againe on the contrary fide by the dilatations of the arteries, heart, and colour, in hope and expectation of some pleasures. But which as the divine spirit and understanding of man doth move of it selfealone without any passion, then the body is at repose and remaineth quiet, not communicating nor participating any whit with the operation of the mind and intendment, no more than it being disposed to fludy upon any Mathematicall proposition, or other science speculative, it calleth for the help and assistance of the unreasonable part: By which it is manifest, that there be two distinct parts in us, different in faculty and power one from another. In fum, Gothrough the universall world, all things (as they themselves affirme, and evident experience doth convin e) are governed and ordered some by a certaine habitude, others by nature : some by a sensual and unreasonable soule : others by that which hath reason and understanding. Of all which man beth his part at once, yea, and was borne naturally with these differences above said. For contained he is by an habitude: nourished by nature: reason and understanding he wieth: he hath his proportion likewise of that which is unreasonable and inbred, there is together with him the source and primitive cause of passions, as a thing necessary for him, neither doth it enter into him from without : in which regard it ought not to be extirped utterly, but hath need only of ordering and government: whereupon Reaton dealeth not after the Thracian manner, nor like King Lyeurgus, who commanded all vines without exception to be cut down, because wine caused drunkennesse: it rooteth not out (I say) all affections indifferently one with another, the profitable as well as the hurtfull: but (like unto the good gods Phytalmin and Hemerides, who teach us to order plants that they may fructifie, and to make them gentle which were favage) to cut away that which groweth wild and ranke, to fave all the rest, and so to order and mannage the same, that it may serve for good use. For neither do they shed and spill their wine upon the floore who are affraid to be drunke, but allay the same with water: nor those who fear the violence of a passion, do take it quite away, but rather temper and qualifiethe fame : like as folke use to breake horses and oxen from their singing out with their heeles, their stiffenesse and curstnesse of the head, and stubbornnesse in receiving the bridle or the yoke, but do not restraine them of other motions in going about their worke and doing their deed. And even to verily, reason maketh good use of these passions, when they be well tamed and brought (as it were) to hand : without over-weakning or rooting out cleane that part of the foule which is made for to fecond reason, and do it good service: For as Pindarus faith,

The horse doth serve in choriot at the thills The oxe at plough doth labour hard in field, Who lift in chafethe wild Bore for to kill, The hardy hound he must provide with skill.

And I affure you, the entertainment of these passions and their breed, serve infar better stead, when they do affilt reason, and give an edge (as it were) and vigour unto vertues, than the beafts above named in their kind. Thus moderate ire doth second valour and fortitude: hatred of wicked persons helpeth the execution of Justice: and indignation is just and due unto those who without any merit or defert enjoy the telicity of this life: who also for that their heart is puffed up with foolish arrogancy, and enflamed with disdainefull pride and insolence in regard of their prosperity, have need to be taken down and cooled. Neither is a man able by any meanes (would be never to faine) to feparate from true friendship naturall indulgence, and kind affection : nor from humanity, commiteration and pity; ne ver from perfect benev olence and good-will, the fellowship in joy and forrow. Now if it be true (as it is indeed) that they do groffely erre who would abolish all love because of foolish and wanton love: surely they do amisse, who for covetousnesse sake and greedinesse of money do blame and condemne quite all other appetites and defres. They do (Ifay) as much as those, who would forbid running altogether, because a man may stumble and carch a fall as he runneth; or debar shooting for that we may over-shoot and misse the marke: or to condemne hearing of mufick, because a discord or jar is offensive to the eare. For like as in founds, musick maketh an accord and harmony, not by taking away the loud and base notes: And in our bodies Physick procureth health, not by destroying heat and cold, but by a certaine temperature and mixture of them both in good proportion: Even to it fareth in the foule of man, wherein reason hath the predominance and victory: Namely, when the power thereof the passions perturbations, and motions are reduced into a kind of moderation and mediocrity. For no doubt excessive forrow and heavinesse, immeasurable joy and gladnesse in the soule, may be aprly compared to a swelling and instammation in the body but neither joy nor forrow simply in it selfe. And therefore Homer in this wise sentence of

> A man of worth doth never colour change, Excessive feare in him is very strange,

Doth not abolish feare altogether, but the extremity thereof; to the end, that a man should not thinke that either valour is desperate folly, or confidence audacious temerity. And therefore in pleafures and delights we ought likewife to cut off immoderate luft: as also in taking punishment, extreme hatred of malefactors. He that can do so shall be reputed in the one not indolent, but temperate, and in the other not bitter and cruell, but just and righteous. Whereas let passions be rid cleane away (if that were possible to be done) our reason will be found in many things more dull and idle : like as the pilot and Master of a ship hath little to do, if the wind be laid and no gale at all ftirring, And verily (as it should seeme) wife Law-makers, seeing this well enough, have with great policy given occasion in Cities and Common-wealths of Ambition and Emulation among Citizens one with another: and in the field against enemies devised to excite the courage of Souldiers, and to whet their ire and manhood by found of trumpers, fifes, drums, and other instruments. For not only in Poetry (as Platofaith very well) he that is inspired, and (as it were) ravished with the divine inflinct of the Muses, will make a ridiculous soole of him, who otherwise is an excellent Poet, and his crafts-mafter, as having learned the exquisite knowledge of the art: but also in battels, the heat of courage fet on fire with a certaine divine infpiration is invincible, and cannot be withstood. This is that martiall fury, which (as Homer laith) the gods do infuse or in pire rather into warlike men:

Thus having said he did inspire The Princes heart with might andire.

And againe, One god or other surely doth him affists Else faring thus, he never could persist.

As if to the discourse of reason they had adjoyned passion as a prick to incite, and a chariot to see it forward. Certes, even these very Stoicks with whom now we argue, and who seeme to reject all paffions, we may fee oftentimes, how they fir up young men with praifes, and as often rebuke them with sharpe admonitions and severe reprehensions. Whereof there must needs ensue of the one part pleasure, and of the other part displeasure. For surely checks and fault-findings strike a certaine repentance and shame: of which two, the former is comprized under forrow, and the latter under feare: and these be the use that they use principally to chassise and correct withall. Which was the reason that Diogenes upon a time, when he heard Plato to highly praised and extolleds. And what great and worthy matter (quoth he) find you in that man, who having been a Philosopher so long & raught the precepts thereof, hath not in all this time grieved and wounded the heart of any one person? For surely the Mathematicall sciences a man cannot so properly call the eares or handles of Philotophy (to use the words of Xenocrates) as he may affirme that these affections of young men, to wir, bashfulnesse, desire, repentance, pleasure and paine are their handles, whereof reason and law together taking hold by a discreet, apr, and wholesome touch bring a young manspeedily and effectually into the right way. And therefore the Lacedemonian schoole mafter and gover-nour of children said very well, when he professed, that he would bring to passe that the child whom he tooke into his tuition should joy in honest things, and grieve in those that were foule and dis-honest. Then which there cannot possibly be named a more worthy or commendable end of the liberall education and bringing up of a young youth well descended.

Of Vertue and Vice.

The Summary.

N this little Treatife, adjoyned aptly unto the former, the Author proveth, that outward and corruptible things be not they that fet the soule in repose, but reason well ruled and governed: And after that he hath depainted the miserable estate of wicked and sinfull persons, troubled and tormented with their pasfions both night and day he proveth by proper and apt fimilitudes, that Philosophy together with the love of vertue, bringethrue contentment and happinesse indeed unto a man.

Of Vertue and Vice.

'T feemeth, and commonly it is thought, that they be the garments which do heat a man; and yet of themselves they neither do heat, nor bring any heat with them: for take any of them apart by it selse you shall find it cold; which is the reason that men being very hot, and in a fit of a seaver, love often to change their cloaths for to coole and refresh their bodies. But the truth is this, Looke what heat a man doth yeeld from himselfe, the cloaths or garments that cover the body do keep in the same, and unite close together: and being thus included and held in, suffer it not to evaporate, breath out, and vanish away. The same errour in the state of this life hath deceived many a man, who imagine that if they may dwell in stately and gorgeous great houses, be attended upon with a number of servants, retaine a fort of slaves, and cangather together huge sums of gold and filver, then they shall live in joy and pleasure: whereas in very sooth, the sweet and joyfull life proceedeth not from any thing without. But contrariwise when a man hath those goodly things about him, it is himselfe that addeth a pleasure and grace unto them, even from his own nature and civill behaviour, composed by morall vertue within him, which is the very fountaine and lively spring of all good contentment.

For if the fire do alwaies burne out light, More stately is the house, and faire in sight.

Semblably, riches are more acceptable, glory hard the better and more shining lustre, yea, and authority carrieth the greater grace, if the inward joy of the soule be joyned therewith: For surely men do endure poverty, exile, and banishment out of their own countries, yea, and beare the burden of old age willingly and with more eale, according as their manners be mild, and the mind disposed to meeknesse. And like as sweet odors, and Aromaticall persumes, give a pleasant smell unto three-bare and ragged cloaths; but contrariwise, the rich robe of Analyses yeekled from under it stin-king matter and corrupt bloud; which as the Poet saith,

Ren down by dropt upon bis cloake
Of filke so fine, and it did soake.
Even so, with vertue, any sort of life, and all manner of living is pleasant and void of sortow: where as contrariwile, vice caufeth thole things which otherwise seemed great, honourable, and magnificent, to be odious, loathlome, and unwelcome to thole that have them, if (I say) it be mingled therewith, according to the testimony of thesevulgar verses:

This manwho whiles he walks abroad in street Or market place is ever happy thought: No sooner sets within his own house feet, Thrice wretched but he is and not for nought. His wife (as master) hath of all the power, She bids, commands, she chides and fights each houre.

And yet one may with ease be rid and divorced from such a curst and shrewd wife, if he be a man indeed, and not a bond-flave; but for thine owne vice, no meanes will ferve to exempt thee from ir. It is not enough to command it to be gone, by fending a little script or bill of divorcement, and to thinke thereby to be delivered from troubles, and to to live alone in quiet and repose. For it cleaveth close within the ribs it flicketh fast in the very bowels, it dwelleth there both night and

It burneth thee yet fire-brand none is feen, And hastneth age apace before thou ween.

A troublesome companion it is upon the way, by reason of arrogancy and presumption: acossly and samptions guest at the table for gluttony and gournandise: an unpleasant and combersome bediellow in the night, in regard of thoughts, cares, and jealouses, which breake the sleep or trouble the same with fantafies. For whiles men lie asleep the body is at rest and repose; but the mind all the while is disquieted and affrighted with fearefull dreames, and tumultuous visions, by reason of superstitious feare of the gods, faith one. And even so do other vices serve men: to wir, Envy, Feare, Wrath, Wanton love, and Unbridled luft. For in the day time, vice looking out, and composing it selfe somewhat unto others abroad, is somewhat ashamed of her selfe, and covereth her passions; she giveth not her selfe wholly to her motions and perturbations, but many times doth strive againe and make relistance: but in fleep, being without the danger of laws and the opinion of the world, being far removed (as it were) from feare and shame: then it setteth all lusts aworke, then it quickneth and raiseth up all lewdnesse, and then it displayeth all lascivious wantonnesse. It tempteth (as Plate saith) a man to have carnali dealing with his own mother, and to eate of forbidden and unlawfull meats: there is no villany that it forbeareth; executing (lofar forth as it is able) all abomination, and hath the fruition thereof it it be but by illusions and fantasticall dreames, which end not in any pleasure, nor accompliftment of concupitence, but are powerfull only to excite, flir, and provoke fill the fits of fecret pullions and maladies of a corrupt heart. Wherein lieth then the pleasure and delight of fin, if it be to, that in no place, nor at any time, it be void of pensivenesse, care and griefe? If it never have contentment, but alwaies in moleflation and trouble, without repole? As for carnall delights and fleshly pleasures, the good complexion and sound constitution of an healthfull body, giveth thereto meanes, place, opportunity and breeding. But in the foule it is not possible that there should be engendred any mirth, joy, and contentment, unlesse the first foundation be laid in peace of conscience, and tranquillity of spirit, void of feare, and enjoying a settled calme in all assurance and confidence, without any shew of tempest toward. For otherwise, suppose that some hope do smile upon a man; or say that delight tickle a little; the same anon is troubled, and all the sport is marted by some carefull cogitation breaking forth: like as the object and concurrence of one rock troubleth and overthroweth all though the water and weather both be never so calme.

If that I sleep, when sorrows me surprise, Then fearefull dreames me kill before I rise.

Now gather gold and spare nor by heaps, rake and scrape together masses of silver, build faire, gallant and flettely walking places, replenish all thy house with saves, and a whole City with debtors:
unless withall thou do all ay the passions of thy mind; unlesse thou stay and appeale thy insatiable huft and defire; unlefte thou free and deliver thy felfe from all feare and carking cares: thou doft as much as freine wine. or make Ipocras for one that is fick of a feaver, give honey to a cholerick person dileased with the raging motion of choler, offer meats and viands to those that be fick of a stomachicall flux continual lask, ulceration of the guts, and bloudy flix, who neither take pleasure therein, nor are the better but the worse rather a great deale for them. See you not how sick folkes are offended, and their flomacks rife at the most fine, costly, and daintiest meats that be offered unto them? How they ipit them forth againe, and will none, though they be forced upon them? And yet afterwards, when the body is reduced againe into good temperature: when pure spirits and good fresh bloud is engendred; and when the naturall heat is reflored and become familiar and kind: then they rileup on their feet to their ment, then their flomacks ferve to eate full favourly of course bread with cheele or creffes, and therein they take great pleasure and contentment: The like disposition in the mind doth reason works. Then and never before shalt thou be pleased and at peace with thy felfe, when thou haft on elearned what is good and honest indeed: In poverty thou shalt live deliciously like a King: or in a private and quiet state sequestred from civill and publike affaires, thou shalt live as well as they who have the conduct of great armies, and governe the common-weale. When thou hattitudied Philotophy and profited therein, thou shalt never lead a life in discontentment, but shalt learne how to away with any estate and course of life, and therein find no imall joy and hearts ease. Thy riches thou wilt rejoyce in because thou shalt have better means to do good unto all men: In poverty likewise thou wilt take joy in regard that thou shalt have sewer cares to trouble thee: Glory will turne to thy folace, when thou shalt see thy selfe so honoured and thy low estate and obscure condition will be no lesse comfort, for that thou shalt be safe and secured from envy.

That Vertue may be taught and learned.

The Summary.

Plutarch refuting here the error of those, who are of opinion, That by good and diligent instruction a man cannot become the betters recommended sufficiently the study of Vertue. And to prove this aftertion of his he should consequence in this world, witnesset by the study of the should consequence in this world, witnesset by the study of th tion of his you prement that the apprentist age of that, which is of small consequence in this world, with a should be counted to the knowledge of things that are besetting and worthy his person. Afterwards, he declares that as much travell should be employed to make him compehend such things as be fir distant from the capacity and excellence, of his spirit: In which distances have he capacity and excellence, of his spirit: In which distances have he capacity and excellence, of his spirit: In which distances have he takes hove and premanent, and premanent, whereas they should stay and rest upon that which is firme and permanent.

That Vertue may be taught and learned.

E dispute of Vertue, and put in question, whether Brudence, Justice, Loyalty, and Honesty may be taught or no? And do we admire then the works of Oratours, Sailers, and Ship-matters, Architects, Husbandmen, and an infinite number of other fuch which be extent? Whereas of good men we have nothing but their bare and fimple names, as if they were Hippo-Centaures, Gyants or Cyclops: and marvell we that of vertupous actions which be entire, perfect, and unblameable, none can be found: ne yet any manners so composed according to duty, but that they be tainted with some passions and vicious perturbations? Yea, and if it happen that nature of her felfe bring forthfome good and honest actions, the same straightwaies are darkened, corrupted, and in a manner matted by certaine strange mixtures of contrary matters that creep into them: like as when among good corne there grow up weeds and wild bushes that choake the same; or when some kind and gentle fruit is cleane altered by savage nourishment. Men learne to sing, to dance, to read and write, to till the ground, and to ride horses, they learnelikewife to shew themselves, to shoo on their apparrell decently; they are taught to wait at cup and trencher, to give drinke at the table, to leason and dresse meat: and none of all this can they skill to performe and do handlomely, if they be not trained thereto: and yet shall that, for which these and such like qualities they learne, to wit, good life and bonest conversation be reckoned a meere canvall thing, comming by chance and fortune, and which can neither be taught nor learned? Oh good Sirs, what a thing is this? In faying, That Vertue cannot be taught, we deny withall that it is, or hath any being. For it it betrue that the learning of it is the generation and breeding thereof, certes he that hindereth the one disannulleth the other: and in denying that it may be taught, we grant that no such thinke there is at all : And yet as Place faith, for the neck of a Lute not made in proportion to the rest of the body, there was never known one brother go to war with another, nor a friend to quarrell with his friend ne yet two neighbour cities to fall out and maintaine deadly feud, to the interchangeable working and inflering of those mileries and calamities which follow open wax. Neither can any man come forth and say that by occasion of an accent (as for example, whether the word Telchines should be pronounced with the accent over the second syllable or no) there arole fedition and diffention in any city; or debate in a house between man and wife about the warpe and woofe of any webbe: How beit never man yet would take in hand to weare a peece of cloath nor handle a book, nor play upon the lute or harpe, unlesse he had learned before; for albeit he were not like to lustaine any great losse and notall dammage thereby, yet he would feare to be mocked and laughed to scorne for his labour, in which case as Heraclitus laith, it were better for aman to conceale his own ignorance; and may such an one thinke then, that he could order a house well, rule a wife, and behave himlelfe as it becommeth in marriage, beare magistracy, or governea common-weale as he ought, being never bound and brought up to it? Diogenes espying upon a time a boy eating greedily, and unmannerly, gave his Master or Tutor a good custe on the eare: and good reason he had so to do, as imputing the fault rather to him, who had not raught, than to the boy, who had not learned better manners. And is it to indeed? Ought they of necessity, who would be mannerly at the table, both in putting hand to a dish of meat, and taking the cup with a good grace, or as Aristophaneslaith,

to be taught even from their infancy. And is it possible that the same should know how to behave themselves in wedlock, how to manage the affaires of State, how to converse among men, how to beare office without touch and blame, unlesse they have learned first how to carry themselves one toward another? Aristippus answered upon a time, when one said unto him, And are you sir every where ? I should (quoth he, laughing merrily) cast away the fare for ferriage, which I pay unto the marriner, if I were every where. And why might not a man lay likewile, If children be not the better for their teaching, the falary is lost which men bestow upon their Masters and Teachers. But we see that they taking them into their governance presently from their nurses, like as they did forme their limbs and joynts featly with their hands, do prepare and frame their manners accordingly, and fet them in the right way to vertue. And to this purpose answered very wifely a Laconian Schoole-mafter to one who demanded of him, what good he did to the child of whom he had the charge? Mary (quoth he) I make him to take joy and pleasure in those things that be honest. And to say a truth, these teachers and governours instruct children to hold up their heads straight as they go in the fireet, and not to beare it forward : also, not to dip into fauce, but with one finger: not to take bread or fish but with twaine: to rub or scratch after this or that manner: and thus and thus to truse and hold up their cloaths. What shall we say then to him, who would make us believe that the Art of Phylick professes to scoure the morphew, or heale a whit-slaw: but not to cure a pleurine, teaver, or the phrence? And what differeth he from them, who hold that there be schooles and rules to teach petties and little children how to be manuerly, and demeane themselves in small matter. but as for great, important, and absolute things, it must be nothing else but use and custome, or elemeere chance and fortune that doth effect them? For like as he were ridiculous, and worthy to belaughed at, who should say, that no man ought to lay hand upon the oate for to row, but he that hath been prentife to it; but he at thesterne and guid the helme he may who was never taught it: even to he, who maintaineth, that in some inferiour arts there is required apprentifage, but for the attaining of vertuenone at all, deferveth likewife to be mocked. And verily, he flouid do contrary unto the Scythians: For they, as Herodorus writeth, use to put out the eyes of their slaves only, to the end that being blind they might turne round about with their milke, and fo flir and shake it. But he for looth puttern the eye of reason into these base and interiour arts, which are no better than fervants waiting upon others; but plucketh it from vertue. Iphicrates answered contrariwise, being demanded of Callias the son of Chabrias, by way of contempt and derision, in this wife, What are you fir? An Archer? A Targetiere? a man at armes? Or a light armed Souldier? I am none (quoth he) of all these, but rather one of those who commandeth them all. Well, ridiculous then is he, and very abfurd, who would fay, There were an art to be taught, of drawing a bow and shooting, of fighting close at hand being armed at all pieces, of discharging bullets with a sling, or offitting and riding an horse; but for footh to lead and conduct an army, there was none at all: as who would say, that leat were a thing not learned, but comming by chance, I know not how. And yet I must needs fay, more tottish and foolish werehe, who should hold and affirme that Prudence only could not be taught, without which no other Arts and Sciences be worth ought, or availe any whit. That this is true, and that she is alone the guide which leadeth and guideth all other Sciences, Arts, and Vertues, giving them every one their due place and honour, and making them profitable to mankind, a man may know by this, if there were nothing elfe, That there would be no grace at a feast, though themeat were never so well dressed and served up by skilfull Cooks, though there were proper Escuirs or Shewers to set the dishes upon the boord, Carvers, Tasters, Skinkers, and other Servitors and waitors enough, unlessethere be some good order observed among the said Ministers, to place and dispose every thing as it ought.

How a man may discerne a Flatterer from a Friend.

The Summary.

The traveller hath great occasion and cause to rejoyce, if in his journey he go with a good companion, who by his pleasant and profitable also well as may make him forget the tedious difficulty of the way: even so in this is left, happy is the man who can shad and nect with those to be end him company, by whom he may both easily pusses through the occurrent dangers that are presented unto him, and also advance forward cheerefully unto vertue. In which regard, our Author Plutanch houng alsows sea as to cheire the Nurther, Education, and Institution of youth, as also of the eard Ferties in general, by you do with who mit great reason, shown in this Treats so, what for to specify we ought carefully to avoid, and with who mit of your and be acquainted. And as he was aman well experienced and pratisfed in the affaires of this world, affirmed and provet by very sound and sign he resolves to the more works. That there is nothing where of we are to be more wary and heedfull than falfe friendship, which he calleth Flattery. Moreover, this being a matter of so great importance, as every wife manmay well thinke and perceive, he draweth out this prefent discourse in length: and for that his purpose is to instruct me in those meanes whereby we may be able to distinguish between a flatterer and a true friend; he shewethin the first place, That the only principall remedy to stop up the entry against all flatterers, is to know our selves well: for otherwise, we shall have such array and ornaments hanged upon us, that we shall not easily perceive and discerne who we are. And contrariwise sit hapneth oftentimes, that we esteeme them to be our perfect friends, fo skulfull are they in counterfeiting; and withall, when they find us disposed to entertaine such company seur own indiscretion deprive thus of that true in fight and view, which our foule ought to have in discerning a fulle friend from a true. Being willing therefore to aide and help us in this point, he describeth a crafty and wily flatterer, he discovereth his cunning casts, and depainteth him in his colours, showing the very draughs and lineaments which may direst us to the knowledge of him, to wit, I hat he doth conforme and frame himselfe to the humour and nature of those whose company he haunteth; how he is unconstant and mutable, changing and turning into many and fundry fashions, without any right and sincere affection, applying himselfe all the while to every thing but vertue, willing to be reputed alwaies more leud and vicious than those whom he flattereth: without regard of doing them good any way, or feeking their profit, he only aimeth at this, to please them and follow their veine in all thengs by custome and use, bringing him that will give eare unto his words to this passes, That he shall thinke vice to be vertue: working coverity and under-hand for to deceive more cleanly, transforming vertue into vice, and making it nothing strange and cop to blume himselfe, for to do the more mischiefe asterwards to another then he stattereth most when he maketh no semblance or show at all that he mindeth any such thing, and exalteth up to the skie those that be most vicious, and worst of all others, so they will gree him entertainment. Likewife, for that flatterers forw them flows otherwhiles very forward and bold to speake their minds and to find fault, which is one of the best and surfs marks of true friendship, he treateth consequently of this liberty and freedome of speech, and how a man may know whether there be any flatter thereinor no. He declareth therefore, how flatterers use this franke reprehension in vaine and frivolous things, and never in those sins and grosse faults which are indeed blame-worthy: so that this manner of reprehension is a kind of southing them up, and bulling men ascep in their notorious vices; or else they charge them with faults cleane contrary. Now after he hath showed how a man should take heed and beware of them, he discourses of those services which may make flatterers, and wherein the same differ from the offices and duties of friends, and in pursuing and prosenting this Antithesis, he provesh that a flatterer is press andready to do us pleasure in some full matters, whereas a friend sheweth his good willin those that be honest: also that a flatterer is envious, and so is not a friend. And for that our nature is proud and blind with all, having need of good friends to guide and direct it he describeth with what manner of repeanded we ongo to fee and heave those that procure our good, albeit, they may seeme to carry with them a kind of severity. Meanewhile, he exhorteth friends so to temper and qualifie their liberty in reprehension, that all impudency and importunaterigor be far from it. But for a much as this is (as it were) the principall thing in amity, he seweth, That first we must cut away selfe-love in all our reprehensions and secondly all injurious bitter, and biting speeches: then he adjoyneth moreover in what sessions, and upon what occurrences a man ought to reprove and f.y his mind frankly: and with what dexterity he is to proceed: that is to say, that sometimes, yea, and more often, he englit to rebuke his friend apart, or under the person of another: wherein he is to locke unto this. That he eschew all vaine-glory, and season his reprehenstons with some praise among to make them more acceptable and better taken. Consequently, he teacheth us, how we must receive the advertisements, admonitions, and reprehensions of a true friend: and returning to the very point indeed of amity and friendship, he sheweth what meane a man should keep for to evert and turne away the neighbour vice, and to urge our friends forward to their devoir : adding moreover, That all remonstrance and admonition ought to be tempered with mildnesse and lenty: wherein he concludeth this whole Treatife, which I affure you is to be well read and marked in these dues of all persons, but those especially who are advanced above others in worldly wealth or honourable place.

How a mnn may discerne a Flatterer from a Friend.

Lato writeth (O Aniochus Philopappus) that no mendo willingly pardon him, who profefeth, That he loveth himselfe best: Howbeit thereby (quoth he) is ingendred in us this inconnence among many others the greatest: that by this meanes no mancan be a just judge of himselfe, but partiall and favourable. For the lover is ordinarily blinded in the thing that he loveth, unless he have been taught, yea, and accustomed long before to affect and esteeme things honest above those that be his own properly, or inbred and lamiliar to him. This is it that giveth unto a statement har feeld, under pretence of friendhip, where he hath a fort (as it were) commodiously esteed, and with the vantage to affaile and endammage us, and that is, Self-love whereby every man being the first and greatest flatterer of himselse, he can be very well content to admit a stranger to come necere and stater him, namely, when he thinketh and is well willing with all to with him, and to confirme that good selfer-conceit, and opinion of his own. For even he, who is justly reproached to be a lover of Flatterers. loveth himselse not withstanding exceeding well: and for that good affection that he hath, is both very willings, yea, and fully perswaded allo; that all good things are in himselse: and the defire whereof is not simply bad, and unlawfull: but the perswason.

is it that is dangerous and flippery, having need to be restrained with great heed and carefulnesse, Now if truth be an heavenly thing, and the very four e yeelding all good things (as Plato faith) as well to the gods as to men : we ought thus to judge, That a flatterer is an enemy to the gods, and principally to Apillo: For opposite he is alwaies and contrary to this precept of his, Know thy selfe: canning a manto be abused and deceived by his own selfe, yea, and to be ignorant of the good and evillthings that be in him; in making the good gifts which are in him to be desertive and unperfeet: but the evili parts incortigible and fuch as cannot be reformed. Now if it were fo, that flattery (as for the most part of other vices) touched either only or especially bate, meane, and abject perfons, it were perhaps neither to hurtfull, nor to hard to be avoided as it is. But like as wormes breed most of all and soonest in frimme tender, and sweet wood: even so, for the most part the generous and gentle natures and those minds that are more ingenious, honest, amiable, and mild than others, are readiest to receive and nourish the flatterer that hangeth upon him. Moreover, as Simonides was wont to jay, that the keeping of an escuiry or stable of horses, followeth not the lampe or oyle cruet, but the rich corne fields: that is, it is not for poore men to entertaine great hories, but thole rather who arelanded men, and with their revenews able to maintaine them: Even so, we see it is ordinary, that flattery keepeth not company nor forteth with poore folke, or such persons as live obicurely, and are of no ability: but commonly it is the ruine and decay of great houses, and a malady incident to mighty states: which oftentimes undoeth and overthroweth whole Monarchies, Realms, and great Seigniories. In which regardit is no imall matter, nor a thing that requireth little or no forecast and providence to search and consider the nature thereof: lest being so active and buse as it is, and ready to meddle in every place (nothing to much) it do no hurt unto friendship, nor bring it into obloquy and discredit. For their flatterers resemble lice for al. the world: And why? These vermine we see never haunt those that be dead, but leave and torsake the corps to soon as ever the bloud (whereof they were wont to feed) is extinct or deprived of vitall spirit: Semblably, a man shall never see flatterers so much as approach unto such persons as are in decay, whose state is crackt, and credit waxeth coole; but looke where there is the glory of the world, where there is authority and power, thither they flock, and there they grow: no fooner is there a change of fortune, but they freake and flinke away, and are no more feen. But we ought not to attend fo long and stay for this triall, being unprofitable, or rather hurtfull, and not without some danger: For it goeth very hard with a man, it at the very instant and not before, even when he hath most need of friendship, to perceive those to be no friends whom he took to be, and namely, when he hath not with himat hand a good and faithfull friend, to exchange for him that is untrully, difloyall, and counterfeit. For if a man did well, he should be provided before-hand of an approved and tried friend ere he have need to employ him, as well as of current and lawfull money; and not then to make triall of him and find him faulty when he is in greatest necessity, and standeth in most need: For we ought not to make proofe with our losse and find him to be false to our cost and detriment; but contrastivite, to be skilfull in the meanes of smelling out a flatterer, that we receive no dammage by him: For otherwise that might befall us which happeneth unto those who, for to know the force of deadly poyfons, take the affiy, and tafte first themselves thereof: well may they come to the judgement thereof: but this skill is dearely bought when they are fore to die for it. And like as we do not commend such; no more can we praise and approve of those who measure friendship only by honefly and profit: thinking withall, That such as converse and company with thempleasantly are straightwaies to be attained as flatterers, no lesse than if they were taken in the very act of flattery: For furely a friend should not be unpleasant and unsavoury, without any reasoning (as it were) of delightiome qualities: neither isfriendship to be accounted venerable in this respect, that it is austere or bitter; but even that very beauty and gravity that it hath is sweet and desirable and as the Poet faith,

About her alwaie's feated be Delightfome Love and Graces three.
And not he only who is in calamity.
Dath great content and comfort find

To feethe face of trulky fixed.

According as Eurip'des faith, but true amity addeth no leffe grace, pleafure, and joy unto those that be in prosperity, than it easieth them of forrow and griefe who are in coverfity. Evenus was wont to day that of all pleasum same, free was the best and most effectuall: And even so God having mingled friendship with this life of ours hath made all things joyous, sweet pleasant and acceptable, wherea friend is preservand enjoyeth his part. For otherwice a man cannot device not expresses, wherea in his fired fine friendship in the own nature never admitted any thing that was pleasant and delegable. But like as saite and counterstice precess of gold which will not abide the touch represent only the lustre and bright glittering of the gold: So a flatterer, resembling the sweet and pleasant behaviour of a triend sheweth himselfe alwaies jound merry and delightsome, without crossing at any time. And therefore we ought not presently to stude the like mo to be flatterers who are given to praise others: for otherwhices to commend a min, so it be done in time and place convenient, is a property no kile bestting a friend than to blame and reprehends. Nay contraviwite, there is nothing to adverte and repugnant to amity and solvent and evermore fault-finding: whereas, if a man knoweth the good will of his friend to be ever prest and ready to yeeld due prailes, and those in full measure to things well done, he will bear more patiently and in better part another time, his free reprehensions and reproof for that which is done amisse: for that he is verily perswaded of him, that as he was willing enough to praise, to he was as loth to dispraise, and therefore taketh all in good woorth, A difficult matter then it is, will some one lay, to distern a flatterer from a friend, feeing there is no difference between them, either in doing pleasure, or yeelding praise: for otherwise, we see oftentimes, that in many services, courtes and kindness befeles, a flatterer is more ready and forward than a friend. True is is indeed, we shuft needs lay a right hard matter it is to know the one from the other; especially if we speak of a right flatterer indeed, who is his own crafts-mafter, and can skill how to hand, e the matter artificially, and with great cunning and dexterity if (I lay) we make no reckoning of them for flatterers, as the common people do. who are these ordinary imell-scalts, and as ready as slies to light in every dish: these parasites (1 say) whose tongue(as one said very wel) wil be walking so soonas men have washed their hands, and be ready to fit down to meat, cogging and foothing up their good mafters at every word, who have no honesty at all in them, and whose scurrilitie, profane, and irreligious impurity, a man shall soon finde with one dish of meat and cup of wine. For furely there was no great need to detect and convin e the flattery of Melanthius the Parasite and Jester of Alexander Phirmus the Tyrant, who being asset upon a time how Alexander his good Lord and Master was murthered, Mary with a thrust quoth he) of a fword, which went in at his fide and ranne as far as into my belly: neither of inches a mars shall never see to fail, but where there is a good house and plentiful table kept, they will be sure to gather round about it, in such sort as there is no fire nor iron grates, or braste gates, can keep them back, but they will be ready to put their foot under the boord, no nor of those women who in times past were called in Cypres, Colacides. i.e. Plattereffes; but after they were come to Syria, mew named them, Climacides, as one would fay, Loddereffes, for that they used to lie a.ong, and to make their backs stepping stooles or ladders as it were for Queens and Great mens wives to get upon when they would mount into their coaches. What kinde of flatterer there is it to hard and yet needful to beware of? Forfooth, even of him who icemeth none futh, and professeth nothing lesse than to flatter whom a man shall never finde about the kitchin where the good meat is dresed, nor take measuring of shadowes to know how the dayes goe, and when it is dinner or supper time: ne yet fee drunken and lying along the ground untowardly, and full like a beast . But for the most part fober he is enough; he loveth to be a curious Polypragmon; he will have an oat in every boat, and thinks he is to intermeddle in all matters; he hath a mind to be privy, and party, in all deep fecrets; and in one word he carrieth himself like a grave Tragedian, and not as a Comical or Satyrical player, and under that visour and habit he counterfeiteth a friend, For according to the saying of Plato, it is the greatest and most extreaminjustice for a man to make sumblance of being just when he is not, even so we are to think that flattery of all others to be most dangerous, which is covert and not apert or pro-fessed which is serious (Isay) and not practiced by way of jest and port. And werily turn glozing and flattery as this, cauleth men oftentimes to militust, true friendship indeeds, and doth derogate much from the credit thereof: for that in many, things it jumpeth fo even therewith, unleffe a man take very good heed and look narrowly into it. True it is, that Gobriss being tunne into a dark and fecret room, together with one of the ulurping Tyrans of Pirfa, called Magis, whom he purfued hard, and a thandy gripes frugling, grappling, and wrefiling close together, cried out unto Darias-coming into the place with a naked tword, and doubting to thruft at the Unipersitor fear he should runne Gobrias thorough alfo; Thrust hardly and spare not (quoth he) though you dispatch us both at once. But we who in no wife can allow of that common laying, Let afriend perifn, so he take an enemie with him: but are desirous to plack and part a flatterer from a friend; with whom he is coupled and interlaced by means of io many refemblances: we (I say) have great cause to fear and beware, that we do not cast and reject from us the good with the badior least in pardoning and accepting that which is agreeable and familiar unto us-, we fall upon that which is hnrful and dangerous. For like as amongst wild feeds of another kind, those that being of the fame form, fashion, and bignels with the grains of wheat are intermingled therwith a man shall hardly trie out from the rest; for that they will not passe thorough the holes of seve, ruddle or trey, if they benarrows and in case they be large and wide, our goeth the good corn together with them; even loit is passing hard to separate flatterie from frier dship, being so intermed led therewith in all accidents motions; affairs, dealings, employment and convertation as it is. For confidering that a flatterer feeth well enough; that there is nothing in the world so pleasurable as friendship, nor yeeldeth more contentment unto man than it doth: He windeth himself into favour by means of pleasure; and wholy is imploited to procure mirth and delight. Also for that grace and commoditie, doth alwaies accompany amitys in which regard the common Proverbe faith, that a friend is more necessarie than either aire or was ter. Therefore a flatterer is ready to put himself forward, and offereth his fervice with at couble diligence, friving in all occasions and businesses to be ever prompt and officious. And because the principall thing that linketh and bindeth friendship sure at the beginning is the conformity and likenels of manners, studies endeavours and in: linations, and in one word, seeing that to be like affected, and to shew pleasure or displeasure in the same things, is the chief matter that knitteth amity and both combineth, and also keeperh men together, by a certain mutual correspondencie in natural affections: the flatterer knowing to much, composeth his nature (as it were) some unformed matter ready to receive all forts of impressions, studying to frame and accommodate himself wholy to all those things that he taketh in hand; yea, and to resemble those persons just by way of imitation, whom he meaneth to set upon and deceive, as being supple, soft, and pliable to represent them lively in every point, so as a man may say of him after this manner, Achilles sonne think you he is? Nay, even Achilles himself in is.

But the craftiest cast of all other, that he hath, is this, That seeing (as he dot h) libertie of speech, (both in truth, and also according to the opinion and speech of the whole world) to be the proper voice of friendship (as a man would say) of some living creature; insomuch, as where there is not this freedom of speaking frankely, there is no truefriendship nor generofitie in deed. In this point also, he will not feem to come short, nor leave it behinde for want of imitation; but after the fashion of fine and excellent cookes, who use to serve up tart, bitter and sharpe sauces together with tweet and pleafant meats, for to divert and take away the fatietie and fulneffe which toon followeth them. These flatterers also use a certain kind of plain and free speech; howbeit neither lyncere and natural is it, nor profitable, but (as we commonly tay) from teeth outward, or (as it were) beckning and winking flightly with the eye under the browes nor touching the quick," but tickling aloft onely, to no purpole. Well, in these respects above specified, hardly and with much ado, is a flatterer discovered, and taken in the manner; much like unto those beatts, who by nature have this propertie, To change their colour, and in hue to refemble that bodily matter or place whereon they fettle, and which they touch. Seeing then it is 10, that he is 10 apt to deceive folk and lieth hidden under the likenetle of a triend; our part it is, by unfolding the differences that are so hidden, to turn him out of his masking habit, and being despoiled of those colours and habiliments that he borroweth of others, for want of his own (as Platofaith) to lay him naked and open to the eie: let us therefore enter into this discourse, and fetch it from the very first beginning. We have already faid, that the original of friendship among men (for the most part) is our conformitie of nature and inclination, embracing the same customers and manners, loving the same exercities, affecting the lame studies, and delighting in the same actions and imployments: concerning which, these verses well and fitly runne;

Oldfilke love best with aged solk to talk,
And with their seers young children to disport t
Women once met, do let their tongues towalk,
With sick likewise sick persons best do sort:
The wretched man his miseries doth lament
With those, whose states like sortunes do torment.

The flatterer then, being well aware that it is a thing naturally inbred in us, to delight in those that are like our felves, to converse with them, and to use and love them above all others, endevoureth first and somost to draw and to approch, yea, and to lodge neer unto him whom he meaneth to enveagle and compasse, even as if he went about in some great passure to make toward one bealt, whom he purpoteth to tame and bring to hand, by little and little joyning close unto him, as it were to be concorporated in the fame studies and exercises, in the same affections, employments and cour e of life: and this he doth to long, until the party whom he layeth for, have given him some advantage to take holde by, as suffering himself gently to be touched, clawed, handled and stroked, during which time, he letterh slipno opportunity to blame those persons, to reproove those things, and courses of life, which he perceiveth the other to hate: contrariwise to praise and approve all that which he knoweth him to take delight in: and this he doeth not after an ordinary manner and in a mean, but excessively and beyond all measure, with a kinde of admiration and wonder; confirming this love and harred of his, to a thing, not as if he had received the im-pressions from some sudden passion, but upon a stated and settled judgement. Which being so: how, and by what different marks shall he be known and convinced, that he is not the like or the fame indeed, but onely a counterfeit of the like and of the fame? First, a man must consider well, whether there be an uniform equalitie in all his intentions and actions or no? whether he continue and perfift still taking pleasure in the same things and praising the same at all times? whether he compose and direct his life according to one and the same mold and patern? like as it becometh a man who is an ingenuous lover of that friendship and conversation which is ever after one manner, and a waies like it self: for such a one indeed is a true friend. But a flatterer contrariwise is one who hath not one permanent feat in his manners and behaviour, nor hath made choice of any life for his own content, but onely to please another as framing and applying his actions wholly to the humor of another, is never simple, uniform, nor like himself, but variable and changing alwaies from one form to another, much like as water which is powred out of one vessel into another, even as it runneth forth, taketh the form and fashion of that vessel which receiveth it. And herein he is clean contrarie to the aperior the ape as it should feem, thinking to counterfeit a man, by turning. hopping and dan ing as he doth, is quickly caught : but the flatterer, whiles he doth imitate and counterfeit others, doth entice and draw them, as it were, with a pipe or call into his net, and so beguiteth them. And this hedoeth not alwaies after one manner; for with one he danceth and fingeth; with another he will feem to wreftle, or otherwise to exercise the bedie in seats of activity: if he chance to meet with a man that loveth to hunt, and to keep hounds, him he will follow hard at heels, fetting out a throat as loud in a manner as Hippolitus in the Tragedie Phadra, trying,

So ho, this is my joy and onely good, With prieto luve, with tooting horn to winde, By leave of gods to bring into the wood My hounds to roufe and chafe the dapple Hinde.

And yet hath he nothing to do at all with the wild beafts of the forcest, but it is the hunter himself whom he laicth for to take within his net and toil. And say that he light upon a young man that is a Student and given to learning, then you shall see him aid oa sdeep poring upon his book, and alwaies in his Studies you shall have him let his beard grow down to his foot like a grave Philosopher: who but he then, in his side thred-bare Students cloak, after the Greek sashion, as if he had no care of himself, nor joy of any thingels in the world: nor a word then in mouth, but of the Numbers. Orthangles and Triangles of Plato. If peradventure there sall into his hands an idle do nothing, who is rich withal, and a good sellow, one that loveth to eat and drink and make good cheer, offgoes then his bare and overworn studying gown, his beard he causeth to be cut and shorn as neer as a new mowne field in harvest, when all the corn is gone : no talk then but of slagons, bottels, pots, and cooling pans to keep the wine cold: nothing now but merry conceits to move laughter in every walking place and gallerie of pleasure: Now he letteth fle frumpes and fcoffes against Schollers and such as study Philosophie. Thus by report it fell out upon a time at Syraeufa: For when Plate there arrived, and Denys all on a fodain was ter upon a furious fit of love to Philolophie, his palace and whole court was full of dust and fand, by reason of the great recourse this ther of Students in Geometrie, who did nothing but draw figures therein. But no fooner had Plato incurred his displeasure and was out of favor; no sooner had Denys the tyrant bidden Philosophie farewel, and given himfelf again to belly-cheer, to wine, vanities, wantonnesse, and all looienesse of life: but allat once, it seemed the whole court was transformed likewile, (as it were by the forcerie and enchantment of Cyrces) into hatred and detestation of good letters; so as they forgat all goodnesse, and betook themselves to folly and sottishinesse. To this purpose it were not amisse for to alledge as teltimonies, the fashions and acts of iome notorious flatterers, such I mean as have governed Common-wealths and affected popularitie. Among whom the greatest of all other was Alcibrades who all the while he was at Athens used to scoffe, and had a good grace in merry conceits and pleasant jests: he kept great horses, and lived in jolitie, most gallantly, with the love and favor of all men: when he fo journed in Sparta, he went alwaies shaven to the bare skin, in an overworn cloke, or elie the same very course, and never washed his body but in cold water. Afterwards, being in Thrace, he became a Souldier, and would carroule and drink lustily with the best. Hecame no fooner to Tifaphernes in Asia, but he gave himself to voluptuousness and pleasure, to riot, wantonnels, and superfluous delights: Thus throughout the whole course of his life, he wan the love all men, by traming himself to their humors and fashions wheresoever hecame. Such were not Epiminondas and Agestlam: For albeit they converied with many soits of people, travailed divers cities, and law fundry fashions and manners of strange nations; yet they never changed their behavior, they were the same men still, reteining evermore a decent port which became them, in their apparel, speech, diet, and their whole carriage and demeanour, Plato likewise was no changeling, but the same man at Syracusa, that he was in the Academie or College at Athens: and look what his carriage was before Dion, the same it was and no other in Denys his court.

But that man may very easily finde out the variable changes of a flatterer, as of the fish called the

Pourcuttle, who will but ftrain a little and take the pains to play the diffembler himself, making shew as if he likewise were transformed into divers and fundry fashions, namely in misliking the course of his former life, and fodainly feeming to embrace those things which he rejected before, whether it be in diet action or speech : For then he shall soon see the flatterer also to be inconstant, and not a man of himle f. taking love or hatred to this or that joying or grieving at a thing, upon any affection of his own that leadeth him thereto, for that he receiveth alwaies as a mirrour, the images of the passions . motions and lives of other men. If you chance to blame one of your friends before him, what will be say by and by? Ah well, You have found him out I see now at last though it were long first: I wish I liked him not a great while ago : Contrariwise, if your minde alter, so that you happen tofall a praising of him &c. Very well done will he say, and binde it with an oath, I con you thank for that: I am very glad for the mans fake, and I beleeveno lesse of him. Do you break with him about the alteration of your life, and bear him in hand that you mean to take another courle, as for example, to give over State affaires, to betake your self to a more private and quiet life. Yea marie (quoth he) and then you do well, it is more than high time to to do: for long fince we should have been disburdened of these troubles so full of envie and peril. Make him beleeve oncethat you will change your copie and that you are about to shake off this idle life, and to betake your selfunto the Common-weal, both to role and also to speak in publike place: you shall have him to sooth you up and second your song with these and such like re-ponds: A brave mind (believe me) and beseeming a man of your worth and good parts: For to fay a truth, this idle and private life, though it be pleasant, and have ease enough, yet it is but base, abject, and dishonourable; when you finde him there once, mustle his note immediately with this pose,

Good fir methinks you foon do turn your stile, You feem much chang'd from him you were ere while.

Thave no need of fuch a friend, that will alter as I do, and follow me every way (for my shadow can do that much better) I had rather have one that with me will follow the truth, and judge according to it and not otherwise, Avant therefore, I will have nought to do with thee. Thus you see one way to discover a shatterer.

A fecond difference, we ought to observe in his imitations and resemblances, for a true friend doth not unitate all that he seeth him whom he loveth to do; neither is he sorward in praising every thing, but that onely which is best: For according to Sophocles,

In love he would his fellow be,

But not in hate and enmitte. And verily one friend is ready and willing to affift another in well doing and in honeft life, and never will yeeld to be companion in leawdnesse, or help him to commit any wicked and heinous fact; unlesse peradventure through the ordinarie conversation, and continual acquaintance together, he be tainted with infection of some ill quality and vicious condition, even against his will and ere he be well aware:much like as they who by contagion catch rheumaticke and bleered eyes; or as the familiar friends and Schollers (by report) of Plato did imitate him in flooping forward: and those of Aristotle in his stammering and massling speech; and the Courtiers of Alexander the Great, in bending of his neck, and rough voice when he spake. For even to, some there be who receive impression of their manners and conditions at unawares and against their wils. But contrariwise, it fareth with a flatterer even as with the Chamolion; For as he can take upon him any colour lave onely white : semblably, a flatterer cannot possibly frame himself to any thing that good is and of importance: but there is no naughtinesse and badnesse in the world which he will not quickly imitate, And well I may compare such fellowes to ill painters, who when through insufficiency in their art they be not able to draw to the life, the beautie and favour of a good face, wil be sure yet to expresse the rivels, warts moules, freckles, scarres and fuch like deformities. For even so a flatterer can imitate very passing well, Incontinencie, foolish superstition, hastines and choler, bitternesse towards houshold fervants, diffrust and diffidence infriends and kinsfolk, yea, and treathery against them: for that by nature he is alwaies inclined to the worse; and besides, so far he would be thought from blaming vice, that he undertaketh to imitate the same. For those that seek for amendment of life and reformation of manners are ever inspected: such (I say) as shew themselves displeased and offended at the faults and misdemeanors of their friends, And this was it that made Dion odions to Denys the Tyrant, Samius to Philip, and Cleomenes to Prolomeus, and in the end was their ruine and overthrow. The flatterer who defireth to be both pleasant and faithful at once, or at least wise so be reputed, for excessive love and friendship that he pretendeth, will not seem to be offended with his friend for any lewed parts, but in all things would be thought to carry the same affection, and to bein manner of the same nature and incorporate into him:whereupon it cometh to passealso, that even in casual things and the occurrences of this life, which happen without our will and counsel he will needs have a part, there is no remedie. Thus if he bedisposed to flatter fick persons, he will make as though he were fick also of the same disease for company: and if he have to do with such as be dimfighted or hard of hearing, he will be thought neither to see nor heare well for sellowship. Thus the flatterers about Denys the Tyrant, when he had an impediment in his eies that he could not fee cleerely, faigned that themselves like wife were halfblind, and to make it good, hit one upon another at the board and overthrew the dishes upon the Table as they sate at supper. Others there be that proceed farther than fo, and because they would appear more touched with a sellow-seeling of affections, will enter as farre as to the very inward secrets that are not to be revealed. For if they can perceive that they whom they do flatter, be not fortunate in their marriage, or that they are growne into distrust, jealousie, and smister opinion, either of their own children, or their neer kinsfolk and familiars; they spare not themselves but begin to complain, and that with grief of heart and forrow of their own wives and children, of their kindred and triends, laying abroad some criminous matters, which were better (iwis) to be concealed and imothered, than uttered and revealed. And this relemblance and likenesse that they take upon themselves, causeth them to seem moreaffectionate andfuller of compassion. The other then, thus flattered, thinking that by this means they have received from them a sufficient pawn and assurance of their fidelitie, stick not rolet fall from their mouth some matter of secrecie also; and wen they have once committed it unto them. then they are ever after bound to usethem, yea, and be afraid to mistrust them in any thing. I myself knew one who feemed to put away his own wedded wife, because his friend whom he flattered had divorced his before: and when he had to done, was known to go feeretly unto her, and melsengers there were who passed to and fro between them under hand: which the divorced wise of the other perceived and found out well enough. Certes little knew he what a flatterer was, and he had no experience of him who thought these Iambick verses to expresse the Sea-crab better then him,

A beast whose body and belly are meet, The eye doth serve each way to see: With teeth it crespes, they standfor feet, A readnow what creature this may be?

For this is the very portraiture and image of a parasite, who keeps about the frying-pan (as Eupolis faith) of his good friends, and waiteth where the cloth is laid. But as touching these things, let us referthem to their proper places for to be discoursed more at large, Howbeit, for the present let us not leave behinde us one notable devise and cunning cast, that a flatterer hath in his imitations; to wit, that if he do counterfeit some good quality that is in him whom he doth flatter, yet he giveth him alwayes the upper hand: For among those that be true friends, there is no emulation at all, no jealoufie or envy between one and another:but whether they be equal in wel doing or come behinde they take all in good part and never grieve at the matter. But the flatterer bearing well in minde that he in every place, is to play the second part, yeeldeth alwayes in his imitation the equalitie from himself, and doth affect to counterfeit another to, as he will be the inferiour, giving the superioritie unto the other in all things but those which are naught, for therein he challengeth to himself the violorie over his friend. If he be somewhat male-content and hard to be pleased, then will the flatterer professe himself to be stark melancholike: if his friend be somewhat too religious or superstitious, then will he make semblance as though he were rapt and tran ported altogether with the sear of the gods: If the other beamorous, he will be in love furious: when the other faith I laughed a good while; but I (wil he fayagain) lughed until I was well neer dead. But in good things it is clean contraries for when he speaketh of good tootmanship he will say, I runne swiftly indeed; but you fly away. Again, I sit a horle and ride reasonable well; but what is that to this Hippo-Centaure here for good horsemanship? Alfo, I have a prettie gift in Poetrie (I must needs say) and am northe worst versifier in the worlds in these and such like speeches two things at once he doth: for first he seemeth to approve the enterprise of the other as singular good, because he doth imitare him; and secondly, he sheweth that his sufficiency therein is incomparable and not to be matched, in that he consessed the himself to come short of him. And thus much of the different marks between a flatterer and a friend as touching the incomparable research.

Now, forasmuch as there is a communitie of delectation and pleasure in them both (as I have faid before) for that an honest man taketh no lesse joy and comfort in his friends, then a lewd perfon in flatterers, let us consider likewise the distinction between them in this behalf. The onely way to diftinguish them asunder in this point, is the marke, the drift and end of the delectation both in the one and the other which a man may see more clearely by this example: There is a sweet oint-ment an odoriferous smell; so is there also in an Antidote or medicine; but hereinlieth the difference, for that in the ointment above faid, there is a reference to pleasure onely, and to nothing else; but in the Antidote, beside the delectation that the odor yeeldeth, there is a respect also of some medicinable vertue, namely either to purge and clense the bodie, or to heat and chase it, or else to incarnate and make new flesh to come. Again, Painters do grinde and mix fresh colours and lively tinctures; fo the Apothecary hath drugs and medicines of a beautiful and pleasant colour to the eye, that it would do a man good to look upon them. But wherein is the difference? Is there any man fo groffe that conceiveth not readily, that the ods lieth in the use or end, for which both the one and the other be ordained? Semblably the mutual offices and kindnesses that passe from friend to friend, befide the honesty and profit that they have, bring with them also that which is pleasing and delectable, as if some dainty and lively slowers grew thereupon: For sometime friends use plaies and passimes one with another: they invite one another, they eat and drink together: yea, and otherwhiles (beleeve me) you shall have them make themselves merry and laugh heartily, jesting, gauding, and disporting one with another; all which serve as pleasant sauces to season their other serious and honest affaires of great weight and con equence. And to this purpole serve well these verses ?

W.th pleafant discourses from one to another They made themselves merry, being met together. Ailo, And nothing essentiationed our amity,

Nor parted our pleasures and mutual joility.

But the whole work of a flatterer, and the one'y mark that he shooteth at, is alwayes to device, prepare and consecutive were, some play or spore, some action and speech, with pleasure and to do pleasure. And to knit up all briefly in one word, he is of opinion that he ought to do all for to be pleasant: whereas the true friend doing alwayes that which his duty requirech, many times pleaseth, and as often again he is displeasant: not that his invention is to displease at any time; how beit if he see it expedient and better so to do, he will not sit k to be a little harsh and unpleasant. For like as a Physician when need requireth putterth in some Saftson or Spiknard into his medicine yea and other while permitteth his patient a delicate bath, or liberal and dainty diet to his suit contentment: but some times for it again, leaving out all tweet odors, casteth in Castoreum,

Or Polium which strong sent doth yeeld, And strokes most of all herbs in field, or else he bruiseth and fampeth some Ellebore, and forceth his patient to drink of that potion : not proposing either in the former medicine pleasure, nor in the latter displeasure for the end: but both by the one and the other, training the sick perion under his hand to one and the same effect of his cure to wit, his good and the health of his body; even so it is with a true friend: one while with praises and gracious words he extolleth and cheereth up his friend; inciting him thereby alwaies to that which is good and hones, as he in Homer;

Deer heart Sir Teucet worthy sonne of Telamon that Knight,
Come Prince and slowe of valiant knights,
Shoot thus your arrowes slight,
And another,
How can I ever put out of minde
Heavens! Ulysses a Prince so kinde?

Contrariwife, another while where there is need of Chastifement and correction, he will not spare but use sharp and biting words: yea, and that free speech which carrieth with it an affection carefull todogood, and such as indeed becement a turor and governour, much after this manner:

What Menelaus! how ever that from Jupitet you descend: Tou play the sool, for solly such I cannot you commend.

It falleth out so likewise, that sometime he addeth deeds to words. And thus Mendemus shur the door against the son of Aslepades his friend, and would not deigne once to salute him, because he was a rotous youth, and lived dissolutely and out of all orderby which means he was reclaimed from a loope life, and became an honest man. Arcessam like manner excluded Bassus out of his school, and would not suffer him to enter, because in a Comedic that he composed, he had made one verile against Cleanshes; but a sterwards Bassus repenting of that he had done, and making saisafetion unto Cleanshes, was pardoned and received again into his savor. For a manmay oftend his striend with intention to do him good; but he must not proceed so farre in displeasing him, that thereby he break or undo the knot of triendship; he ought (I say) to use a sharp rebuke, as a Physician doth some bitter or tart medicine, to save or preserve the life of his patient. And a good friend is to play the part of a mussican, who to bring his instrument into tune, and so to keep it, setteth up the strings and letteth down those: and so ought a friend to exchange profit with pleasure, and use one with another, as occasion serveth, observing still this rule, ostentimes to be pleasing unto his friend, but alwayes prositable: whereas the statterer being used evermore to sing one note, and toplay upon the same string, that is to say, Toplease; and in all his words and deeds, to aim are nothing-life but the contentment of him whom he stattereth, cannot skill either in act to resist, or in speech to reprove and offend him; but goeth on still in following his humor, according alwayes with him in one tune, and keeping the same note just with him.

Now, as Xenophon writeth of King Agefilaus, that he was well apaied to be commended of them who he knew also would blame him, if there were cause; so we are to think well of friendship when it is pleasant. delightiome and cheerful, if other whiles also it can displease and crosse again; but to have in suspition the conversation and acquaintance of such, as never do or say anything but that which is pleasing, continually keeping one courie without change, never rubbing where the gall is, nor touching the fore, without reproof and contradiction. We ought (I say) to have ready alwayes in remembrance the faying of an ancient Laconian, who hearing king Charilans to highly praised and extolled; Andhow possibly (quoth he) can he be good, who is never sharp or severeunto the wicked? The gad-flie (as they fay) which uleth to plague bulles and oxen, feeleth about their eares, and to doth the tick deal by dogges: after the fame manner, flatterers take hold of ambitious mens ears, and possesse with praises; and being once set fast there, hardly are they to be removed and chased away. And here most needful it is, that our judgement be watchful and observant, and do discern whether these praises be attributed to the thing or the person; we shall perceive that the thing it felf is praised, if they commend men rather abient than in place: also if they defire and affect that themselves, which they do so like and approve in others: again, if they praise not us alone, but all others, for the semblable qualities: likewise if they neither say nor do one thing now, and another time the contrary. But the principal thing of all other, is this, If we our selves know in our own secret conscience, that we neither repent nor be ashamed of that, for which they so commend us; ne yet wish in our hearts, that we had said or done the contrary: for the inward judgement of our mind and foul bearing witnesse against such praises, and not admitting thereof is void of affections and passions, whereby it neither can be touched nor corrupted and surprited by a flatterer. Howbeit, I know not how it commeth about, that the most part of men cannot abide nor receive the confolations which be ministred unto them in their adversities, but rather take delight and comfort in those that weep, lament and mourn with them: and yet the same men having offended or being delinquent in any dutie, if one come and find fault or touch them to the quicke therefore, do strike and imprint into their hearts remorfe and repentance, they take him for no betterth an an accuser and an enemie: contrariwise, let one highly commend and magnifie that which they have done him they falute and embrace, him they account their wel-willer and friend indeed. Now, who oever they be that are ready to praise and extol with applause and clapping of hands, that which one hath done or faid, were it in earnest or in games such (I say) are dangerous and hurtfulfor the present onely, and in those things which are next hand but those, who with their praises pierce as farre as to the manners within, and with their flatteries proceed to corrupt their inward natures and dispositions, I can liken unto those slaves or houshold servants, who rob their masters, nor only of that corn which is in the heap, and lieth in the garners, but also of the very seed; for the inclination and towardness of a man, are the feed that bring forth all his actions, and the habitude of conditions and manners, are the very four eard head from whom runneth the course of our whole life, which they pervert in giving to vices the names of vertues. Thucydides in his Story writeth: That during civil feditions and warres, men transferred the accustomed fignifications of words unto other things, for to justifie their deeds: for desperate rashnes without all reason was reputed valour, and called Love-friend: provident delay and temporizing, was taken for decent cowardile:Modestie and temperance, was thought to be a cloke of effeminate unmanlinesse: a prudent and wary circumspedion in all things, was held for a general sloth and idlenesse. According to which precedent, we are to confider and observe in flatterers, how they term prodigality by the name of liberality:cowardite is nothing with them but heedful warinesse: brainsicknesse they entitle promptitude, quicknesse, and celeritie: bate and mechanical niggardise, they account temperate frugality. Is there one full of love and given to be amorous? him they call good fellow, a boon-companion, a man of a kinde and good nature. See they one hasty, wrathful, and proud with all? him they will have to be hardy, valiant and magnanimous: contrariwile, one of a base minde and abject spirit, they will grace with the attribute of fellow-like, and full of humanity. Much like to that which PLato hath written in one place: That the amorous lover is a flatterer of those whom he loveth. For if they be flat noted like a shooing horn, such they call lovely and gracious be they hawk-noted like a griffin,Oh, that is a kingly fight lay they:those that be black of colour, are manly: white of complexion,be Godschildren. And as for the term Melichris, that is Hony-coloured, it is alwayes (verily) a flattering word, devised by a Lover, to mitigate and diminish the odioustresse of a pale hue, which he seemeth by that sweet name, not to mislike, but to take in the best part. And verily if he that is foul and ill-favoured, be born in hand that he is fair and beautiful, or one of imall and low stature made beleeve that he is goodly and tall; he neither continueth long in this his error, neither is the damage that he sustaineth thereby grievous and great, nor unrecoverable: but the praises which induce and inure a man to beleeve, That vice is vertue, infomuch that he is nothing at all difcontented in his fin and grieved therefore, but rather taketh pleasure therein those also which take away from us all shame and abashment to commit faults; such were they that brought the Sicilians to ruine, and gave them occasion to beautisse or colour the tyranny and cruelty of Denys and Phalaris, with the goodly names of Justice and Hatred of wickednesse: These were the overthrow of Egpp, in cloking the effeminate wantonnesse, the surious superstition, the yelling noises after a fanati-cal manner of King Prolomans, together with the marks that he carried of Lillies and Tabours in his bodie, with the glorious names of Devotion, Religion, and the service of the gods. And this wasir that at the same time went very neer, and had like to have corrupted and spoiled for ever the manners and fashions of the Romanes, which before were so highly reputed, to wit, naming the riotoulfiels of Antonie, his loofenefle, his superfluous delights, his sumptuous shewes and publike featls, with the profusion and washing of to much mony, by smooth and gentle termes of courtefies, and merriments full of humanity, by which difguisements and pretexts, his fault was mollified or diminished in abusing so excessively the grandeur of his puissance and fortune. And what was it else that made Ptolomeus to put on the malque or muffle (as it were) of a piper, and to hang about him pipes and flutes? What was it that cauled Nero to mount up the Stage to act Tragedies, with a vizour over his face, and buskins on his legs? was it not the praise of in: h flatterers as these? And are not most of our kings being when they sing small and fine after a pulling manner, saluted Apollo's for their musicke: and if they drink until they be drunk, honoured with the name of Bacchus the god of wine: and when they seem a little to wresse or trie some seats of activity, stiled by and by with the glorious addition of Hercules, brought (think you) to exceeding dishonour and shame by this grosse flattery, taking such pleasure as they do in these gallant surnames. And therefore we had most need to beware of a flatterer in the praises which he giveth, which himself is not ignorant of but being careful and very fubtil in avoiding all fulpicion, if haply he meet with one of these fire fools, and delicare minions, well set out in gay apparel: or some ruftical thick-skin, carrying on his back a good leather pilch; or (as they say) one that feedeth gross; such he will not spare but abuse with broad flattery, and make common laughing stocks of them : Like as Struthias, making a very affe of Bias, and riding him up and down, yea, and infulting upon him for his fortishnesse with praises that he would feem to hang upon him: Thou has (quoth he) drunk more than king Alexander the Great, and with that turning to Cyprius laughed as hard as ever he could till he was ready to fink again. But if a flatterer chance to deal with them that be more civil and elegant and do perceive that they have a special eye unto him in this point, namely, that they stand well upon their guard in this place, for fear lest they be surprised by him: then he goes not to work directly in praising of them but he keepeth aloof, he fetcheth about many compasses a great way off at first, afterwards by little and little he winneth some ground and approcheth neerer and neerer. making no noise until hecan touch and handle them . much after the manner of those that come about wild beasts assaying how to bring them to hand and make them tame and gentle. For one while he will report to such a one the praises that some other give out of him; imitating herein the Rhetoricians, who many times in their orations tpeak in the third perion, and after this manner he will begin: I was not long fince (quoth he)in the market place, where I had some talk with certain strangers, and other ancient perlonages of good worth, whom I was glad at the heart to hear, how they recounted all the good in the world of you, and spake wonderfully in your commendation. Otherwhiles he will devise and ferch out of his own fingers ends some light imputations against him, yet all forged and false, agreea-ble to his person and condition, making semblance as if he had heard others what they said of him, and very cunningly will he close with him, and bear him in hand that he is come in all haste to know of him, whether ever he faid or did so as was reported of him: And if the other do denie it, (as it is no other like but he will) thereupon he takes occasion to enter into the praise and commendation of the man in this wife: I marvail truly how that you should abuse and speak ill of any of your familiars, and triends, who were never wont so much as to miscal or fay otherwife than wel of your very enemies? or how it possibly could be, that you should be ready to gapeaster other mens goods, who use to be so liberal and bountiful of your own? Other flatterers there be, who like as Painters to let up their colours and to give them more beautiful light and lu-fire unto them, lay neer unto them others that be more dark and shadowie: so they inblaming, reproving, reproching traducing and deriding the contrarie vertues to those vices which are in them whom they mean to flatter, covertly and underhand do praise and approve those faults and imperfections that they have, and so in praising & allowing, do feed and cherish the same: As for example, if they be among prodigal ding-thrifts and wasters, riotous persons, covetous misers, mischievous wretches, and such as have raked and scraped goods together by hook and crook, and by all indirect means, they care not how: before them they willipeak baiely of Temperance and Abstinence, calling it rufticity; and as for those that live justly and with a good conscience, contenting themselves with their effate, and therein reposing suffisance, those they will nickname, heartlesse and base with their critical training in the state of meddle with ordinary affairs abroad in the world: they will not bash to finde fault with policy & civil government, calling the managing of State matters and common weal, a thankleffe intermedling in other mens affairs, with much travail and no profit. And as for the minde and defire to be a magistrate and to sit in place of authority, they will not let to say it is vain glory and ambition, altogether fruitlesse. For to flatter and claw an Oratour, they will reprove in his presence a Philosopher. Among light huswives that be wantonly given, they win the prize, and are very well accepted, if they call honest matrons and chaste dames (who content themselves with their own husbands, and them love alone) rude and ruttical women, untaught, ill-bred, unlovely and have nograce with them. But herein is the very height of wickednesse, that theie flatterers for advantage will not spare their own selves; For like as wrestlers debase their own bodies, and stoop down low otherwhiles, for to overthrow their fellowes that wrestle with them, and to lay them along on the ground; so in blaming and finding many faults with themselves, they winde in, and creep closely to the praise and admiration of others: I am (quoth one of them) a very coward, and no better then a very flave at fea; I can away with no labour and travel in the world; I am all in a hear of choler, and raging mad, if I hear that one hath given me any bad termes; mary as for this man (meaning him whom he flattereth) he casteth doubts at no peril and danger, all is one with him, tea or land he can endure all hardnesse, and he counterh nothing painful, no hurt there is in him, a singular man he is, and hath not hisfellow, he is angry at nothing, he beareth all with patience. But fay he meet with one at aventure, which standeth upon his own bottom, and hath tome great opinion of his own sufficiency for wit and understanding, who hath a defire to be austere, and not to depend upon the conceits of others, but reseth in his own judgement; and upon a certain uprightnesse in himself, estsoones hath these verses in his mouth:

Sir Diomede, do not me praise So much to mo e or lesse, Nor out of measure me dispraise, I love not such excesse."

This flatterer then, who is his own crafts-mafter and hath thoroughly learned his trade, goeth not the old way to work in setting upon him, but he hath another engin and device in storeto affail such a grim sir withal. He will make an errand to him for counsel in his own affaires, as being the man whom he esteemeth to have more wit and wisdome then himself. There be divers others (quoth he) with whom I have better acquaintance and familiarity than with your felf: Howbeit, fir, I am forced of necessity to make bold and to importune you a little: For whither else should we ingram men repair, that have need of advice? and to whom are we to have recourse in matters of trust and secretie. And then after he had heard once what he will say, and it makes no matter what it be; he will take his leave faying, that he hath received not counsel from a man, but an oracles from some god. Now before he departeth, it haply he perceive that he taketh upon him good skill and infight in literature, he will prefent unto him some compositions of his own penning, praying him withal to perule them, yea and correct the same. Mithridates the King affected and loved the art of Physick very well: by reason whereof some of his familiar friends about. him, came and offered themselves to be cut and cauterised by him: which was a meer flattery indeed

To discern a flatterer from a friend. and not in word. For it seemed that they gave great testimony of his skill, in that they put their lives into his hands.

Of subtill spirits, thus you may see, That many formes and shapes there be.

But this kind of distimuled praises, requiring greater and more wary circumspection to be taken heed of, ifman would derect and convince, he ought of purpole when he is tempted and affailed with such flattery, to obtrude and propose unto the flatterer absurd counsell, if he seeme to demand and aske it : advertisements also, and precepts of the same kind, yea, and corrections without all sense and to no purpose, when he shall offer his labours to be read and perused : In so doing, if he perceive the party suspected to be a flatterer, doth not gainfay nor contradict any thing, but alloweth of all, and receiveth the same, yea, and more than that, when he shall to every point cry out and say, Oh well faid and infliciently: O excellent wit: be fure, then he is caught in a trap: then, I fay, it will be found plainly according to the common by-word,

That when he did a watch-word crave, Some other thing he fought to have: Or as we fay (in Proverbe old) Draffe was his errand, but drinke he would.

That is to fay, he waited for some occasion and opportunity, by praising to puffe him up with vanity and overweening of himselse. Moreover, like as some have defined painting to be a mute Poesie; even so praising is a kind of silent and secret flattery. Hunters (we see) then soonest deceive the poore beafts, when they feeme to do nothing leffe than to hunt, making femblance as though they either travelled like way-faring men, or tended their flocks, or else tilled the ground. Semblably flatterers touch those whom they flatter nearth, and enter to the very quick by praising, when they make no shew thereof, but seeme to do nothing less than praise. For he that given the chaire and feat to another comming in place, or as he is making an oration either in publike place before the people, or in Councell house to the Senate, breakerh off his own speech, and yeeldeth unto him his roome, giving him leave to speake or to opine, and remaineth silent himselfe: by this his silence sheweth, that he doth repute the other a better man, and of more sufficiency for wildome and knowledge than himselfe, much more than it he should pronounce and ring it out aloud to the whole audience. And hereupon it is that this fort of people who make profession of flattery, take up ordinarily the fift and highest feats, as well at fermons and publike obtains whither men flock to heare, as at the Theaters and shewn places, nor that they thinke themselves worthy of shew places, but because they may rise and make roome for better and richer persons as they come, and thereby flatter them kindly. This wefee also, that in solemne affemblies, and great meetings, or auditories, they are by their good wilsthe first that put themselves forth, and make offer to begin speech; but it is for nothing elfe, but that afterward they would feem to quit the place and give affent to their betters, foone retracting their own opinions, when they heare a mighty man, a rich or noble personage in authority to contradict and say the contrary. And here we ought most of all to be circumspeed and wary, that we may evice them of this, That all this courting, this giving place, this yeelding of the victory and reverence made unto others, is not for any more fufficiency that they acknowledge in them, for their knowledge, experience, and vertues; neyet for their worthinesse in regard of elder them, for their knowledge, experience, and vertues, nevertor their mortal age, but only for their wealth, riches, credit, and reputation in the world, * Megaby 1 113 great Lord * pliniere belonging to the Kings court of Persia, came upon a time to visit Applied the painter: and string profits this of Applications when a filing of Applications when the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of Applications are the string of Applications are the string of Applications and the string of the string of Applications are the string of th by him in his shop to see him worke, began of his own accord to discourse I wor not what, of lines, haddows, and other matters belonging to his art: Ap-lles hearing him, could not hold but faid unto him; See you not fir these little prentise boies here that grind Oker and other colours? So long as you sat fill, and said never a word, they advised you well, and their eye was never off, wondering to see your rich purple robes your chaines and jewels of gold, no sooner began you to speak, but they fell to teighing, and now they laugh you to scorne, talking thus as you do of those things which you never learned. And Solon being demanded once by Crassus King of Lydia, what men he had feen whom he reputed most happy in this world? named unto him one Tellus, none of the great men of Athens, but a good plaine and meane Cirizen, Cleobis also and Biton: and thele he said were of all others most fortunate. But these flatterers will affirme that Kings and Princes, richmen and rulers are not only blessed happy, and forcunate; but also excell all others in wisdome, knowledge and vertue. There is not one of them that can endure so much as to hear the Stoicks, who hold, that the lage and wile man (such a one as they depaint unto us) ought all at once to be called, rich, fair, noble, yea and a King: whereas our flatterers will have the rich men onely, whom they are disposed to slatter to be an Oratour and a Poetiyea, and it he will himself, a painter, a good piper, passing light of foot and strong of limmes; infomuch, as whosever wrestleth with him, shall be fureto take the foil and lye along; and whomsoever he runneth within the race, he shall come behind him a fair deal, but how? Surely even as Crisson the Himeraan lagged for the nonce behind King Alexander the Great when he ran with him for the best game: for which the King was highly displeased and wroth at him, when he once perceived it. Carneades was wont to say, that the fons of Kings and great rich men, learned to do nothing well and right, but onely to fit and ride an horle. For that their mafters are wont to flatter and praise them in all their schooles where they be taught: for if they be at the exercise of wrestling, you shall have him that wrestleth with them, felfe; but rather reproveth him for his utterance, and sharply taketh him up for that by drinking of cold water he hath hurt his wind-pipe, and so marred his voice; or to one who being bidden to read over and peruse a poore filly Epigram or other writing which is nothing worth, taketh on and fareth against the paper wherein it is written, for being thick, course, or rugged; or against the wri-of purpose to take a fall and lie under them: Mary, the horse not knowing nor having the reason to differne a private mans son from a prince; nor whether he be poore or rich that his upon his back, will be fure to cast him over his head and lay him along, who loever he be, that cannot skill how to hold and rule him. Bion therefore was but a very lob and foole in taying thus: If I wift that with praising a peece of ground I could make it good, rich, and fertile, it should want for no praises: and rather would I commend it than toyle and moile in digging, tilling, and doing worke about it. And yet I will not say, that a man is too blame and doth amisse in praising: if so be, that those who are praised be the better and more fruitfull in all good things for it. Howbeit to come againe into the ground beforefaid; a field being praised never so much is not the worse nor lessefertile therefore: but I affure you they that commend folkefallely, and beyond their defert and due, puffethem full of wind and vanity, and worke their overthrow in the end. But now having discourted sufficiently upon this article and point of praises, let us proceed forward to treat of tranknesses and liberty of speech.

And verily meet and reason it had been, that as P uroclus when he put on the armour of Achilles, and brought forth his horses of service to battell, durst not meddle with his speare Pelias, but lest it only untouched; so a flatterer also, although he maske and diguise himselfe with other habits, ornaments, and enfignes of a friend, should let this liberty only of speech alone, and not once go about to touch or counterfeit it, as being indeed

That of all others it belongeth only to friendship for to be carried and weilded by it. But for asmuch as our flatterers now adaies are affraid to be detected in laughing in their cups, in their jetts scoffes, and gamefome mirth; therefore to avoid such discovery, they have learned for footh to knit and bend the brows, they can skill, iwis, to flatter, and yet looke with a frowning face and crabbed countenance they have the cast to temper with their glavering gloses some rough reprehensions, and chiding checks among: let us not over-passe this point untouched, but consider and examine the fame likewise. For mine own part I am of this mind: That as in a Comedy of Menander there comes in a counterfeit Herceles to play his part upon the stage with a club on his shoulder, that is (you may be fire) nothing maffie, heavy, stiffe, and strong, but some device and gawd. hollow and empty, within, made of brown paper, or such like stuffe; Even so, that plaine and tree speech which a flatterer useth will be found light, soft, and without any strength at all to give a blow: much like (to fay truly) unto the foft bed pillows that women lieon, which feeming full and piumpe to refift and beare out against their heads yeeld and sinke under the same so much the more. For after the fame manner this counterfeit free speech of theirs puffed up full of wind, or else stuffed with some descitfull light matter, seemeth to rise up, to swell, and beare out hard and stiffe, to the end that being pressed down once (and both sides as it were comming together) it might receive, enlap and enfold him that chanceth to fall thereupon, and so carry him away with it. Whereas the true and friendly liberty of speech indeed taketh hold of those that are delinquent and do offend, bringing with it a kind of paine for the time, which not with standing is wholesome and healthfull: resembling herein the nature of honey, which being applied to a fore or ulcerous place, at the first doth imart and fling; but it doth cleanse and mundifie withall, and otherwise is profitable, sweet and pleasant. But as touching this plaine dealing and franke speech, I will write a part of purpose in place convenient. As for the flatterer he maketh flew at the first, that he is rough, violent, and in-exorable in all dealings with others: For over his servants he carrieth a hard hand, and is not pleafed with their service, with his familiars, acquaintance, and kinsfolke he is sharpe and eager, ready to find fault with every thing; he maketh no reckoning nor account of any man but himselfe; he despiseth and disdaineth all the world besides; there is not a man living that he will pardon and forgive; he blameth and accuseth every one; and his whole study is to win the name and reputation of a man that hateth vice, and in that regard careth not whom he doth provoke, and whose displeafure he incur: as who, for no good in the world would be hired to hold his tongue, nor willingly for beare to speake plainly the truth; who with his good will would never speake or do anything to tooth up and please another: Then will be make semblance as though he neithersaw nor tooke knowledge of any great and groffe fins indeed: but if peradventure there be some light and small outward fault , he will make foule ado thereat, he will keep a wondering and crying out upon them: then shall you have him in good earnest exclaime and reprove the delinquent with a loud and sounding voice: As for example, if he chance to spiethe implements, or any thing else about the house lie out of order; if a man be not well and neatly lodged; if his beard be not of the right cut, or his haire grow out of tashion; if a garment sit not handsomely about him, or if a horse or hound be not to carefully tended as they should be. But say that a man set nought by his parents, neglect his own children, misuse his wise, disdaine and despile his kindred, spend and consume his goods; none of all these enormities touch and move him: Here he is mute and hath not a word to fay; he dates not reprove these abuses: much like as if a Master of the wrestling Schoole, who suffereth a wrestler that is under his hand to be a drunkard and a whoremonger, should chide and rebuke him sharply about an oyle crose or curry-combe; or as if a Grammarian should find fault with his schollar and chide him for his writing tables or his pen, letting him go away cleare with solæcilmes, incongruities, and barbarilmes, as if he heard them not. Also I can liken a flatterer to him, ter, for negligent, flovenly, or impure otherwise. Thus the claw-backs and flatterers about King Prolometus, who would feeme to love good letters, and to be defrous of learning, used ordinarily to draw out their disputations and conferences at length, even to midnight, debating about some glois or fignification of a word, about a verie, or touching some history: but all the while there was not one, among so many of them, that would tell him or his cruelty, of his wrongs and oppressions, ne yet of his * drumming, tabouring, and other enormous indignities, under the colour of religion; and * Tyuttaieeke to reforme him. Certesa foolilh feilow were he, who comming to a man dileased with tumors, swellings, imposs humes, or hollow ulcers, called Fiftulaes, should with a Chiturgions launcet, or Barbers razor, fall to cut his haire, or pare his nailes; even fo it fareth with these statterers, who 25 razor applytheir liberty of speech to such things as neither are in paine, nor yet do any hurt. Moreover, some exforge others there be of them, who being molecunning and crafty than their fellows, the this pain. pound in nedf of language and reprehension of theirs, for to please and make sport with all. Thus Agus the suppers we can be suppersued to the suppersue th Argive, seeing how Alexander the Great gave very great rewards and gifts to a pleasant and odde suggis, and fellow that was a jefter, cried outfor very envy and dolour of heart; O great abuse and monstrous opporting absurdity: The King hearing it, turned about to him in great dipleasure and indignation, demanding of him what he had to fay? I confelle (quoth he) indeed, that I am grieved, and I thinke it a carations. great indignity, when I fee all you that are descended from Jupiter and his sons, to take pleasure in flatterers and jesters about you, for to make you merry. For even so Hercules tooke a delight to have in his company certaine ridiculous Cercopes, and Bacchus had ever in his traine the Silenes. In your court likewise, a man may see such to be in credit and highly esteemed. When Tiberius Casar the Emperour upon a certaine day was come into the Senate house of Rome, one of the Senators who knew how to flatter, arose and stood up, and with a good loud voice, Meet it is (quoth he) Q Cafar, that men free borne should likewise have the liberty of speech, and speake their minds frankly, without diffimuling or concealing any thing which they know to be good and profitable: with this speech of his he stirred up the attention of the whole house, so as they gave good eare unto him, and Tiberius himselse listened what he would say. Now when all was still and in great silence; Hearken, (quoth he) OCessis, what it is that we all accuse and blame you for, but no man date be so bold as to speake it out: You neglect your selfe, and have no regard of your own person; you confirme and spoile your body with continual cares and travels for our fake, taking no rest norrepole either day or night. Now when he had drawn out a long traine of words to this purpole, Cassim Severm a Rhetoricianstood up, and by report said thus; Such liberty of speech as this will be the utter undoing of this man. But these statements are of the lighter sort, and do less hurt: there be other more dangerous, which worke the mischiese and corruption of those who are not wife and take no heed unto them; namely, when flatterers fet in hand to reprove them whom they flatter, for the contrary vices to those that be in them. Thus Himstim the flatterer reproached a certaine rich man of Athens, the veriest pinching miter, and the most covetous withall, that was in the whole City, with the imputations of prodigality, and negligence about his own profit and gaine: charging him that one day he would imart for it, and both he and his children be hungerflerved for want wherewith to sustaine themselves, if he looked no better to his thrift: or when they object miserable niggardize and beggary unto those that are known to be prodigall spenders, and confume all. After which manner Titus Petronius reproved Nero, Againe, if they come to Princes and great Lords, who deale cruelly and hardly with their subjects and tenants, saying unto them, That they must lay away this over-much lenity and foolish pitty of theirs, which neither is feemly for their persons, nor yet profitable for their state. And very like to these is he who maketh semblance to him who is a very senselesse for and foolish foole, that he stands in great feare and doubt of him, left he should be circumvented by him as if he were some cautelous, crafty, and cunning perfon. He allo, that doth rebuke another, who is an ordinary flanderer, who taketh pleafure (upon fpight and envy) to be evertailing on all men, and back-biting them, if he chance any one time to breake out into the praise of some worthy and excellent personage, saying in this manner unto him,

This is a great fault that you have, and a disease that followeth you, thus to praise men of no worth

What is he (I pray you) vehom you thus commend? What good parts be in him? Hath he at any timedoneany doughty deed, or delivered any fingular speech that might deserve such praises? But in amatorious and love matters they passe: there you shall have them most of all to come over those whom they flatter and lay on load; to them they will joyne close, and set them on a flaming fire. For if they see brethren at some variance, or setting nought by their parents, or else to deale unkindly with their own wives, and to fet no flore by them, or to be jealous and suspicious of them; they never admonish, chastile, or rebuke them for it, that they may amend; but rather they vvill kindle more coales between, and encrease their anger and discontentment on both sides: Nay, it is no great matter (vvill they say) it is even vvellenough; you vvill never see and knovy vvho you.

are; you are the cause of all this your oven self; and selfe do, self have; you evermore have born your Celves so pliable, submisse, and lovely toward them, that you are but rightly served. But say there befome itching heate of love or imart anger upon jealousie, in regard of a curtezan or married wife, whom the party is amorous of; then shall you see a flatterer ready at hand to display his cumning openly, and to ipeak his mindfreely unto him, putting fire to fire and feeding his love; you shall openly, and to ipeak his mindfreely unto him, putting fire to fire and feeding his love; you shall havehim to lay the law upon this lover, accuring and entring processe against him in these termes have him to lay the law upon this lover, you have done and said many things not so kindly as beseemed you have broken the lawes of love; you have done and said many things not so kindly as beseemed. a true lover, but rather dealthardly with your love, and enough to lose her heart, and incurreher hatred for ever;

Unthank-full person that thou art, For killes fo many of thy freet hart.

Thus the flattering itiends of Amonius, when he burned in love of the Ægyptian queen Cleopatra, would perswade and make him beleeve, that she it was who was enamoured upon him, and by way of opprobrious imputation they would tell him to his face, that he was proud, dildainful, hard hearted, and void of all kind affection. This nobe queen (would they fay) for laking to mighty and wealthy a Kingdome, io many pleasant palaces, and stately houses of blessed abode, such meanes and opportunities of happinesse, tor the love of you pineth away, and consumeth her self, trudging after your camp to and fro, for to do your Honour content and pleasure with the habit and title of your Con ubine, neglecting her (good lady) and suffering her to perish for sorrow and hearts grief. Whereupon he being well enough pleased to hear himself thus charged with wrong doing to her, and taking more pleafure in the eactulations of theirs, than if they had directly praised him, was so bilined that he could not see how they that seemed thus to admonish him of his duty, perverted and corrupted him thereby so much the more. For this counterfeit liberty of plain dealing and plain speech, may be very weil likened to the wanton pinches and bitings of luxurious women, who tickle and firre up the lust and piessure of men by that which might feem to cause their pain. For like as pure wine, which otherwise of it seif is a fure remedy against the poison of hemlock, if a man do mingle it with the juice of the faid hemlocke, doth mightily enforce the poilonthereof, and make it irremediable for by that means of the heat it conveyeth the same more speedily unto the heartseven so these lewd and mischievous flatterers, knowing full well that frank speech is a singular help and remedy against flattery, abuse it to flatter withal. And therefore it seemeth that Bias answered not so well as he might have done, to one that asked of him, which was the shrewdest and most hurtful beast of all the other: If (quoth he) your question be of wild and savage, a Tyrant is worse in of tame and gentle, a flatterer. For he might have faid more truly; that of flatterers some be of a tame kinde, such (I mean) as these parasites are who haunt the bains and stouphes; those also that follow good heer and keep about the table. As for him, who (like as the Por uttle fish stretcheth out his clawes like branches) reacheth as farre as to the fecret chambers and cabinets of women, with his busie intermedling with his calumniations and malicious demeanors, such a one is savage, sell, intrachable and dangerous to be approched.

Now one of the means to beware of this flatterie, is to know and remember alwayes that our foul consileth of two parts, whereof the one is addicted to the truth loving honelly and reason; the other more brutish, of its own nature unreasonable, given to untruth and withal pullionate. A true friend affilteth evermore the better part, in giving counfel and comfort, even as an expert and skilful Phylitian, who hath an eye that aimeth alwayes at the maintenance and encrease of health but the flatterer doth apply himself, and settleth to that part which is void of reason and sull of paffions: this he scratcheth, this he tickleth continually, this he stroketh and handleth in such fort, by deviling some vicious and dishonest pleasures, that he withdraweth and turneth it away quite from the rule and guidance of reason, Moreover, as there be some kind of viands which if a man ear, they neither turn unto blood noringender spirits, ne yet adde vigor and strength to the nerves and the marrow but all the good they do is happly to cause the flesh organical parts to rile, to stirre and lo ole the belly, or to breed iome foggie, fantom and half rotten flesh, which is neither fast nor found withinseven fo if a man look neerely and have good regardunto a flatterer he shall never find that all the words he wieth minister or procure one jot of good to him that is wile and governed by reafon; but feed fools with the pleasant delights of love; kindle and augment the fire of inconsiderate anger: provoke them unto envie; breed in them an odious and vain presumption of their own wit; increase their forrow and grief, with moaning them and lamenting with them for companies set on work and exasperate the rinbred naughtinesse and lewed dispositions their illiberal minde and covetous naturestheir diffidence and diffruffulnesse of others; their base and service timiditie, making them alwayes worie, and apt to conceive illimore fearful, jealous and furpicious, by the means of tome new acculation, falle furmiles and conjectural fuggedions, which they be ready to put into their he'ds. For evermore it getteth closely into some vi ious passion and assection of the minde, and there lurketh, the same it nourisheth and feedeth fat, but anon it appeareth like a botch, rising eltiones upon the corrupt difeated or inflamed parts of the foul. Art thou angry with one punish him (faith he:) Hast thou a minde to a thing? buy it, and make no more ado. Art thou never so let le afraid > let us flie and be gone: Suspectest thou this or that? believe it considertly faith he.) But if peradventure, he can hardly be feen and discovered about these passions, for that they be so mighty and violent, that oftentimes they chase and expelalluse of reason, he will give fome vantage to be fooner taken in others that be not fo firong and vehement where we shall find him alwayes the same and like himself. For say, a man do suspect that he hath taken a furfeit, either by over-liberal feeding or drinking headie wine, and upon that occasion make some doubt to bathe his bodie, or to eat prefently again and lay gorge upon gorge (as they fay:) A true frieid wil advice him to forbear and abltain; he will admouth him to takeheed to himfer and look to his health: Incomes a flatterer, and he will draw him to the bain in all haste; he will bid him to call for tome novelty or other to be fer upon the boord, willing him to fall fresh to it again, and not to punish his body and do himselt injurie, by fasting and refusing his meat and drink: Also if he see him not diposed to take a journey by land or coyage bysea, or to go out about any enterptise whatsoc-ver it, be:slowly and with anill will, he will say unto him: either that there is no such great need, or the time is not to convenient, but it may be put off to a farther day, or it will ferve the turn well enough to lend others about it. Now if it fall out io, that he having made promile to some familiar friend either to lend or let him have the nie of some money, or to give him it freely, do thange his minde and repent of his promile; but yet be somewhat abashed and ashamed thus to break his word; the flatterer by and by will put himlelf to the worle and lighter end of the ballance, and make it weigh down on the purie fide, soon excluding and cutting off all shame for the matter: What man! (will he say) Spare your purse and save your silver; you are at a great charge; you keep a great house; and have many about you which must be maintained and have sufficient; in such fort, that if we be not altogether ignorant of our felves, and wilfully blinde not feeing that we be covetous, shameleffe, timorous and base minded, we cannot choose but start and finde out a flatterer; neither is it possible that he should escape us. For lurely he will evermore defend and maintain these impersections, and frankly wil he speak his minde in favour thereof, if he perceive us to over-passe our selves therein. But thus much may suffice as touching these matters.

Let us come now to the uses and services that a flatterer is employed in For in such offices he doth confound, trouble, & darken much the difference between him and a true friend; shewing himself in apparence, alwayes diligent, ready and prompt in all occurrences, without feeking any colourable pretences of shifting off, and a refusing to do any thing. As for a faithful friend, his whole carriago and behaviour is simple, like as bethe words of truth, as faith Euripides, without welts and gards, plain without plaits, and nothing counterfeit: vyhereas the conditions of a flatterer to fay a truth,

By nature are difeased much And medicines needful are for such,

not only with wisdome to be ministred and applied, but also many in number, and those (Lassure you) of a more exquisite making and composition than any other. And verily as friends many times when they meet one another in the street, passe by without good-morrow or god-speed, or any word at all between themsonely by some lightsome look, cheerful smile, or amiable regard of the eye reciprocally given and taken, without any other tokenels, there is tellified the good-will and mutual affection of the heart within: whereas the flatterer runneth toward his friend to meet him, followeth apace at his heels, spreadeth forth both his armes abroad, and that afarre off, to embrace him: & if it chance that he be faluted & spoken to first, because the other had an eye on him before, he will with brave words excuse himself, yea, and many times call for witnesses, and bind it with great oather good store, that he saw him not. Even so likewise in their assairs and negociations abroad in the world, friends omit and overflipmany small and light things, not searching narrowly into matters, not offering or expecting again any exquisit service; nothing curious and buse in each thing ne yet putting themselves forward to every kinde of ministery: but the slatterer is herein double diligent, he will be continually employed, and never zelt, without feeming at any time to be weary, no place no space nor opportunity will he give the other to do any service; he looketh to be called unto and commanded, and if he be not bidden, he will take it ill and be displeased; nay, you shall have him then our of heart and discouraged, complaining of his ill fortune, and protesting before God and man, as if he had some great wrong done unto him. These be evident marks and undoubted arguments to such as have wit and understanding, not of a friendship sound, sober and honest, but rather smelling of wanton & whorish love, which is more ready to embrace and clip, than is decent and feemely. Howbeit, to examine the same more particularly, let us consider what difference there is between a flatterer and a friend, as touching the offers and promises that they make; They who have written of this theam beforeus, say very well, that a friends promilegoeth in this

If that I can, or if it may be done, Fulfil I will your mind, and that right foon but the offer of a flatterer runneth in this manner, What would you have? Say but the word to me, Without all doubt. effected it shall be.

For such frank promisers and braggers as these, the Poets also use to bring unto the Stage in their Comedies after this fort;

Now of all loves, Nicemachus, this I crave, Set me against this fouldier here so brave,

I will so swing his coat, you shall it see, That like a pompion his stelp shall tender be: His face, his head I shall much softer make, Than is the spungethat growes in sea or lake.

Moreover, you shall not see a friend offer his helping hand or aide in any action, unlesse he were called before to counsel, and his opinion asked of the enterprise, or that he have approved and set down the same upon good advisement, to be either honest or profitable: whereas the flatterer, if a man should do him so much credit, as to require his consent and approbation, or otherwise request him to deliver his opinion of the thing, he, not onely upon a desire to yeeld unto others, and to gratise them; but also for tear to give any subjection that he would seem to draw back and avoid to set his hand to any work or businesse whatsoever, is ready with the formost to applie himself to the appetite and inclination of another, yea, and withal, pricketh and inciteth him forward to enter upon it. And yet lightly you shall sind even of rich men and kings, but sew or none, who can or will come forth with these words,

Would God some one that needy is and poor, Yea, worse than he that begs from door to door, Would come to me (so that he were my friend) Without all sear, and spoke to me his mind.

But now adayes it is farre otherwise; for they are likemuch unto composers of Tragedies, who will be provided of a quite or dance of their friends to sing with them, or desire to have a Theatre of purpose to give applause and clap their hands unto them. And verily whereas Merope in a certein Tragedie givent these lage and wise advertisements;

Take those for friends, I reed, and holdthem so, Whose speech is sound, and waves not to and fro: But those that please thy mindin word and deed, Count lewd, and such lock forth of door with speed.

Our Potentates and Grand Seigneurs do clean contrary; for such as will not follow their humors. and footh them up at every word, but gain-fay their courses, in making remonstrance of that which is more profitable and expedient such they disdain and will not vouchsafe them a good look. But for those wicked wretches, base minded variets, and colening impostors, who can curry favor, they not onely set their doores wide open for such, and receive them into their houses, but they admit them also to conferences with their inward affections and the very secrets of their heart. Among whom you shall have one more plain perhaps and simple than the rest, who will say . that it is not for him, neither is he worthy to deliberate and confult of fo great affairs; mary he could be content, and would take upon him, to be a poor servicour and minister, to execute what sever were concluded and enjoined him to do: another more crafty and cunning than his fellowes, is willing enough to be used in council, wherehe will hear all doubts and perils that be cast; his eye browes shall speak if they will, his head and eyes shall nod and make signes, but his tongue shall not speak a word: Say that the party whom he minded to flatter, do utter his minde and what he thinketh good to do:then he will cry out aloud and fay, By Hercules I sweat it was atmy tongues end to have said as much, had you not prevented me and taken the word out of my mouth, I would have given you the very same counsel. For like as the Mathematicians do affirm, that the superficial and outward extremities, the lines also of the Mathematical bodies, do of themselves and in their own nature, neither bend nor freech, ne yet move at all: for that they be intellectual onely or imaginary, and not corporal, but according as the bodies do bow, reach or stirre, so do they so you shall ever finde that a flatterer, will pronounce, opine, think and be moved to anger, according as he seeth affother before him. And therefore in this kind, most easie it is to observe the difference between a flatterer and afriend. But yet more evident you shall see it in the manner of doing service. For the offices and kindnesses which come from a friend, are ever best, and (as living creatures) have their most proper vertues inwardly, carrying leaft in shew, and having no outward oftentation of glorious pompe, And as it falleth out many times a Physitian cureth his patient, and sayeth little or nothing at all unto him. but doth the deed ere hebe aware; even so, a good friend whether he be present or departed from his triend, doth him good still, and taketh care for him when he full little knoweth of it. Such a one was Arcefilaus the Philosopher, who beside many other kind parts which he shewed unto his friend Apelles, the painter of Chios, coming one day to visite him when he was fick, and perceiving how poor he was, went his way for that time and when he returned again, brought twenty good drachmes with him: and then fitting close unto Apelles by his beds side: Here is nothing here (quoth he) I fee well, but these four bare Elements that Empedocles writeth of,

Hot Fire,cold Water, sheer and soft: Grosse Earth, pure Aire that spreads aloft.

But me thinkes you lie not atyour cale; and with that he removed the pillow or bolfter under his head, and io conveighed underneath it privily, the small pieces of coinadoretaid. The old woman his murie and keeper, when the made the bed, found this money: whereat the marvelled nor a little, and rold Apeller thereof, who laughing thereat: This is (quoth he) one of Arceflaus his theevish casts. And for that it is a Maxime in Philosophie that children are born like their parents, ome Lacyleta (chollar of Arceflaus a storefaid, being affistant with many other to a friend of his named Cephifescates, when he came to trial in a case of treason against the state: in pleading of wich cause, the accuser his advertary called for Cephifocrates his ring, a pregnant evidence that made against him, which he had cleanly slipped from his finger and let it fall to the ground: whereof the faid Lacydes being advifed, let his foot presently over it, and so kept it out of light so that the main proof of the matter in question lay upon that ring. Now after sentence passed on Cephisocrates his side, and that he was clearly acquit of the crime, he went privately to every one of the Judges for to give them thanks: One of them who (as it should seem) had seen what was done, willed him to thank Lacydes; and with that told how the case stood, and how it went with him as he did: but all this while Lagredes himselfhad not said a word to any creature. Thus I think verily, that the gods themselves beflow many benefits and favours upon men secretly, and whereof they be not aware; being of this nature to take joy and pleasure in bountifulnesse and doing good. Contrariwise, the office that a flatterer seemeth to perform, hath nothing in it that is just, nothing true, nothing timple, nothing liberal: onely you shall see him sweat at it; you shall have him runne up and down; keep a loud crying and a great ado, and let his countenance upon the matter, so as that he maketh right good semblance and thew that he doth especial service, taketh much care and pains about his businesse, and maketh hast to dispatch it and much like are all his doings to a curious picture, which with strange colours, with broken plaits, wrinkles and angles, affecteth and firiveth (as it were) to shew some lively resemblance. Moreover, much ado he maketh, and is troublesome in telling how he went to and fro, wandring here and there about the matter; also what a deal of care he took therein; how he incurred the evil will and displeasure of others; and a thousand hinderances, troubles and dangers, as besides he reckoneth up; insomuch as a man that heareth, would say; All that ever he did was not worth so much as the twittle twattle that he maketh. For surely a good turn that is upbraided in that wife, becometh burtheniome, odious, and not thankfully accepted, but intollerable. In all the offices and services of a flatterer, you shall find these upbraidings and shameful reports, that would make one blush to hear them, and those not onely after the deed done, but at the very infrant when he is about it. But instead hereof, atrue friend, if it fall out so, that he be forced and urged to relate what is done, maketh a plain report and narration in modest manner, but of himself he will never ay a word. After which fort did the Lacedamonians in times past, when they had fent corn unto the Smyrnaans, which, in their extreme necessity they craved at their hands: For at what time as themen of Smyrna magnified, and wanderfully extolled this liberality of theirs, they returned this answeragain: This is not so great a matter that it should deserve so highly to be praised or wondered at: for (say they) gathered we have thus much, and made this supply of your necessities, onely by cutting our selves and our labouring beasts short of one daies pittanee and allowance. Bounty in this wife performed, is not onely gentleman-like and liberal indeed, but also more welcome and acceptable to the receivers; in as much as they think it was no great damage, nor much out of their way that did it. Furthermore, not onely this odious fashion of doing any service with such pain and trouble, or the readinesse to make offer and promise so quickly, doth principally bewray the nature of a flatterer; but herein also much more he may be discoveredifor that a friend is willingly employed in honest causes: but a flatterer in shameful and dishonest: as also in the diversends that they purpose; for the one seeketh to profit his friend, the other to please onely. A friend as Gorgias was wont to say, will never require that his friend should do him a pleasure, but in just things onely: whiles a flatterer serveth his turn in many things that are unjust :

To do good deeds friends should be joint,

But not to sinne in any point, whereas he should endeavour to avert and withdraw him from that which is not decent, or seemly: Now if it happen that the other will not be perswaded by him, then were it not amisse to say unto him, as Antipater once answered Phocion; You cannot have me to be a friend and flatterer too (that is to fay)a friend, and no friend. For one friend is to stand to another, and to assist him in doing, and not in mildoing, in confulting, and not in complotting and conspiring, in bearing witnesse with him of the truth & not in circumventing any one by fallbood, yea and to take part with him in suffring calamity and not to bear him company in doing injurie: For fay that we may chance to be privy unto fome shameful and reprochful deeds of our friend; yet we ought not to be party unto them therein, nor willing to aidethem in any undecent action. For like as the Lacedzmonians being desaited in battell by king Antipater, and treating with him about the capitulations and articles of peace, made request anto him. That he would impose upon them what conditions he would himself, were they never sochargeable and disadvantageous unto them, but in no wise enjoin them to do any shamefull indignity; even so a faithful friend ought to be so disposed, that if his friends occasions do require any matter of expence danger or travail he shew himself at the first call and holding up of his finger, ready to come, and cheerfully to take his part and undergo the same, without any shifting off, or allegation of any excuse whattoever: mary, if there be never so little shame or dishonor that may accrew thereby, he shall then refuse and pray him to hold him excused; he shall request pardon and defire to have leave for to be difmiffed and depart in peace. The flatterer is quite contrary: for in painfull, difficult and dangerous affairs, which require his help and affiftance, he draweth back, and is ready to pluck his neck out of the collar : if (I say) in this case you feem for trial sake to knock(as it were upona pot) to see whether he be right, he will not ring cleer; but you shall see by the dead found of his pretended and forged excuses, that he is ful of cracks, and fla wes: contrariwise, in dishonest, vile, base and shamefull ministeries, I am for you, (will he say) I am yours to command; do with me what you will, tread me under your foot, abule me at your pleasure: to be short, he will think nothing to be an ignominious indignity unto him. See you not the ape? good he is not to keep the house & to give warning of thieves, as dogs do; carry upon his back any burdens he cannot, like the horie neither yet is he note draw or to plough the ground, as the oxe doth; and therefore he beareth all kinde of abuse and missing, all wrongs, all unhappy sports and tricks that can be devised lerving onely as an inflaument of mockerie, and a meer laughing flock. Even to it fareth with a flatterer, being not meet to plead at the barre for a friend, to affift him in counsell, to lay his hand to his purie and supply his wants that way, nor to fight as his champion in maintenance of his quarrel, as one that can away with no labour, no paines taking, or ferious employment; and in one word, fit for nothing that good is mary in such affaires as may be done under the arm, that is to fay, which be close, fecret and filthy fervices, he is the forwardest manin the world, and makes no excuses. A trusty currier he is between, in love matters, in finding favour with a Bawd, and bringing a wench or harlot to your bed, he is excellent, and hath a marvellous gift; to make the shot, and clear the reckoning of any sumptuous feast or banket he is ready and perfect, in providing for a great dinner or supper, and setting the same forth accordingly, he is nothing slow, but nimble enough. To give entertainment unto concubines, he is very handiome, obiequious and ferviceable; if one bid him to speak audaciously and malepartly against a father in law, a guardian, tutour, or any fuch, or to put away his true elpouled wife, like as he feeth his good mafter do before him, he is without all shame and mercy: so that even herein also it is no hard matter to see what kinde of man he is, and how much he differeth from a true friend: For command him to commit what villanie and wickednesse you will, ready he is to execute the same, and so he may gratifie and pleasure you that set him on work, he careth not to do any injurie to him-

There is moreover another means not of the least consequence, whereby a man may know how much a staterer different from a friend indeed, namely, by his disposition and behaviour towards his other friends for a true friend sindeed, namely, by his disposition and behaviour towards his other friends for a true friend sindeth contenument in nothing io much as to love many, and likewise to be loved of many; and herein he labourerth especially with his friend to procure himself many others to love and honorhim: for being of this opinion, that among good friends all things are common, he thinketh that nothing ought to be more common than sinends whenselves. But the supposed, a false and counterfeit friend, being privy to his own conscience, that he doth great injurie to true amitte and friendship; which he doth corrupt in manner of a base piece of money: as he is by nature envious, so he exerciseth that envise of his, upon such as be like himself, firiving with a kinde of emulation to surpasse them in sourcise specific priving of taunts and garnility; but before such as he knoweth better than himself, he trembleth and is atrial, a and in truth dare not come neer nor shew his face to such an one, no more (I assure you) than a footman to go and keep pate (according to the Proverb) with a Lydian chariot, or rather (as Simondes saith).

Laid to fine gold tried clean from drosse, He hath not so much as lead so grosse.

Being compared with true, found and grave friend ship, which (as they say) will endure the ham-mer, he cannot choose but finde himself to be but light, salissed and decentual: seeing then that he must needs be detected and knowne, for such an one as he is, what doth he think you? Sussely he playeth like an unskilful painter, who had painted certain cockes, but very badly: For like as he gave commandement to his boy for to keep away natural and living cockes indeed, farre enough off from his pictures; to aflatterer will do what he can to chase away true friends, and not suffer them to approch neer; or if he be not able to do, than openly and in publike place, he will feem to curry favor with them, to honor and admire them, as farre better than himself, but secretly under hand, and behind their backs, he will not let to raise some privy calumniations, and low slanderous reports tending to their discredit: but if he see that by such privy girds and pinches which will fret and gall the fore, he cannot at the first bring his purpose about; yet he remembreth full and well, and observeth the saying of Medius. This Medius was the chief captain or the troup, or the master rather of the quire (it I may so say) of all those statuterers that wed the court of King Alexander the Great, and came about his person; the principal Sophister also that opposed himself and banded against all good men, and never rested to slander and backbite them: This rule and lesson he taught his scholars and quiristers that were under his hand, To cast out slanders boldly, and not spare, therewith to bite others: For (quoth he) although the fore may heal up again, yet the scarre will remain and be ever seen. By these cicatrices and scarres of salse imputations, or (to speak more properly and truly) by such gangrenes and cankerous ulcers as these, Alexander the King being corroded and eaten, did to death Califthenes, Parmenion, and Philosas, his fast and faithfull friends: but to such as Agnon, Bagoas, Agesias and Demetrius were, he abandoned and gave himself wholy to be supplanted and overthrowne at their pleasure, whiles he was by them adored, adorned, arraied gorgeously with rich robes, and set out like a Barbarian image, statue or idoll. Lo what is the force and power of flattery to win grace and favor; and namely in those, who would be reputed the mightiest monarches and greatest potentiates of the world, it beareth most sway: For fuch are periwaded, and defirous also, that the best things should be in themselves; and this is it. that giveth both credit and also boldnesse unto a flatterer. True it is Imust consesse, that the highelt places and forts fituate upon the lottieft mounts, are least accessible, and most hard to be gained by those who would surprise and force them; but wherethere is an high spirit and haughty minde by nature, not guided by the found judgement of reason, but lifted up with the layors of fortune, or nobility of birth, it is the easiest matter in the world even for most base and vile persons to conquer luch, & the avennes to them lie ready and open to give the vantage of eafiest entrance. And therefore as in the beginning of this Treatife I gave warning; fo now I admonish the Readers again in this place; That every man would labour and strive with himself to root out that self-love and overweening that they have of their own good parts and worthinefle: For this is it that doth flatter us within & possesseth our minds before-hand, wherby we are exposed, and lie more open unto flatterers that are without, finding us thus prepared already for to work upon. But if we would obey the god Apollo, and by acknowledging how much in all things we ought to effect that oracle of his, which commandeth us, To know our lelves, search into our own nature, and examine withall our nurture and education; when we finde there an infinite number of defects, and many vanities, imperfections and faults, mixed untowardly in our words, deeds, thoughts and paffions, we would not so easily suffer thesestatterers to tread us under their seet, and make a bridge of us as they do at their pleasure. King Alexander the Great was wont to say, that two things there were especially which moved him to have lesse beleef in them, who saluted and greeted him by the name of a god: The one was fleep, and the other the use of Venus: in both which he found that he was worle than himself that is to say, subject to infirmities and passions more than in any thing els: But if we would look into our felves, and ever and anon confider, how many groffe vices troublefome passions, imperfections and defects we have, furely we shall finde that we stood in great need, not of a false friend to flatter us in our follies, and to praise and extoll us; but rather of one that would frankely finde fault with our doings, and reprove us in those vices that each one privately and in particular doth commit. But very few there be among many others , who dare freely and plainly speak unto their friends but rather sooth them up and seek to please them in every thing: And even in those, as few as they be, hardly shall you find any that know how to do it well but for the most partthey think that they speak sreely, when they do nothing but reprove, reproch and rail. Howbeit this liberty of speech, where of I speak, is of the nature of a medicine, which if it be not given in time convenient. & as it ought to be, besides that it deth not good at all, it troubleth the body, worketh grievance, and instead of a remedy proveth to be a milchief: For even to, he that doth reprehend and findian't unfeatonably, bringeth forth the like effect with pain, as a flatterer doth with pleasure. Formen are apt to receive hurt and damage, not onely by overmuch praise; but also by inordinate blame when it is out of due time: for it is the only thing that of all others maketh them soonest to turnside unto flatterers, and to be most easily surprised by them; namely, when from those this go that stand most opposite and highest against them, they turn as delike water, and run down those wayes that be more low, easie, and hollow. In which regard it behove the that this liberty in fault finding, be tempered with a certain amiable affection, and accompanied with the judgement of reason, which may take away the excessive vehemency and force of sharp words, like the over-bright shining of some glittering light, and for fear lest their friends being dazeled as it were and frighted with the flashing beames of their rebukes, seeing themselves so reproved for each thing, and blamed every while, may take such a grief and thought thereupon, that for for ow they be ready to flie unto the shadow of some flatterer, and turn toward that which will not trouble them at all. For we must avoid all vice, (O Philop ppus) and seek to correct the same by the means of vertue (and not by another vice contrary unto it) as some do; who for to shun foolish and rustical bashfulnesse, grow to be overhold and impudent; for to eschew rude incivility, fall to be ridiculous jesters and pleasants; and then they think to be farthest off from cowardise and esteminate tendernesse, when they come neerest to extreme audacitie and boatting bravery. Others there be, who to prove themselves not to be superstitious, become meer Atheists; and because they would not be thought and reputed idiots and fooles, prove artificial couny-catthers. And furely in redressing the enormities of their manners, they do as much as those, who for want of knowledge and skil: to let a peece of wood streight that twineth and lyeth crooked one way, do curb and bend it as much another way. But the most shameful means to avoid, and shun the suspicion of a flatterer, is to make a mans felf odious and troublesome without profit; and a very rude and rustical fashionthis is of leeking to win favor, and that with savour of no learning, skill, and civility, to become unp eatant. harsh, and sowre to a friend for to shunne that other extream, which in friendship seemeth to be base and servile; which is as much, as if a freed slave newly franchied, should in a Comedie think that he could not use and enjoy his liberty of speech, unlesse he might be allowed allowed licenciously to accuse another without controlment. Considering then, that it is a foul thing to fall to flattery, in studying to please as also sorthe avoiding of flattery, by immoderateliberty of speeth to corrupt and mar as well the grace of amity and winning love, as the care of remedying and reforming that which is amisse: and seeing that we ought to avoid both the one and the other: and as in all things else, to free speaking, is to have the periodion from a mean and mediocrity; reason would, and by order it were requisit, that toward the end of this Treatise, we should adde tomewhat in manner of a corollary and complement, as touching that point.

Forasmuch as therfore we see that this liberty of language and reprehension hath many vices following it, which do much hurrilet us affay to take them away one after another, & beginn aff with blind feli-love and private regards: where we ought especially to take heed that we be not seen to do any thing for our own interest, and in respect of our telves; and namely, that we seem not, for wrong that we have received our felves, or upon any grief of our own, to reproch, upbraid, or revile other men: forthey will never take it as done for any love or good will that we bear unto them, but rather upon some discontentment and heart-burning that we have, when they see that our speech tendech unto a matter wherein we are interessed our selves; neither will they repute our words spoken by way of admonition unto them, but rather interpret them as a complaint of them. For furely the liberty of speech whereof we treat, as it respecteth the welfare of our friend, so it is grave and venerable; whereas complaints savour rather of self-love and a base minde. Hereupon it is that we reverence, honour and admire those who for our good deliver their minds frankly unto us. contrariwife, we are fo bold as to accuse, challenge and charge reciprocally, yea, and contemps those that make complaints of us. Thus we read in Homer, That Agamemnan, who could not bear and endure Achilles, when he seemed to tell him his minde after a moderate manner; but he was well enough content to abide and fuffer Hiffer, who touched him neer, and bitterly rebuked him in this wife:

Ahwretch, would God some abject hoast beside us, by your hand Conducted were; so that in field you did not us command.

As sharp a check as this was, yet being delivered by a wileman, proceeding from a careful minde, and tendering the good of the Common-weal he gave place thereto, and kicked not agains for this Wiffer had no private matter, nor particular quarrell against him, but ipake frankly for the benefit of all Greece: whereas Achilles seemed to be oftended and displaced with him principally, for some private matter between them twain. And even Achilles also himselfe, althoughhe was never known for to be a man of a gentle nature and of a milde spirit,

But rather of a stomack fell, and one who would accuse A guiltlesse person for no cause, and him full soon abuse, endured Patroclus patiently, and gave him not a word again, notwithstanding he taunted and took him up in this wife:

Thou mercileffe and cruel wretch, for Peleus valiant kinght
Was never (fine) thy father ruse, ne yet dame Thetis bright Thy mother kind: but sea so green,
Or rocks so steep and hard Thee bares (thy heart of pitty hath

So small or no regard.) For like as Hyperides the Oratour required the Athenians (who complained that his orations were bitter) to consider of him, not only whether he were sharpe and eager simply, but whether he were so upon no cause, nor taking any see; even so the admonition and reprehension of a friend, being fincere and cleanfed purefrom all private affection, ought to be reverenced: it carrieth (I fay) authority with it, and no exceptions can well be taken, nor a mandare lift up an eye against it : injuch fort, as if it appeare that he who chideth freely, and blameth his friend, doth let passe and reject all those faults which he hath committed against him, and maketh no mention thereof, but toutheth those errours and misdemeanours only which concerne others, and then, sparehim not, but pierce and bite to the quick: the vehemency of fuch free speech is invincible, and cannot be challenged, for the mildnesse and good will of the chastiser doth fortifie the austerity and bitternesse of the chastilement. Well therefore it was said in old time, That when loever we are angry, or at some jar and variance with our friends, then most of all we ought to have an eye unto their good, and to fludy how to dosomewhat that is either profitable unto them, or honourable for them. And no lesse materiall is this also to the maintenance of friendship, if they that thinke themselves to be despiled and not well regarded of their friends, do put them in mind, and tell them frankly of others who are neglected by them, and not accounted of as they should be. Thus dealt Plato with Donys, at what time he was in difgrace, and faw how he made no reckoning at all of him: For he came unto the Tyrant upon a time, and requested that he might have a day of audience and leave to confer with him: Deny granted his request, supposing verily that Plato had a purpose to complaine and expostulate with him in his own behalfe, and thereupon to discourse with him at large: But Plato reasoned and debated the matter with him in this manner; Sir (quoth he) O Denys, if you were advertised and knew that some enemy or evill willer of yours were arrived and landed in Sicily, with a full intention to do you some displeasure, although he had no opportunity or meanes to execute and effect the same, would youlet him saile away againe and depart from Sicily with impunity, and beforche were talked withall? I tro not, O Pino, (quoth Denys) but I would looke to him well enough for that: For we ought to hate and punish not the actions only, but the very purposes and intentions also of enemies. But how and if (quoth Plato againe) on the contrary side, some other being expressed and of purpose come for meere love and affection that he bearth unto you, and fully minded to do you some pleasure, or to advice you for yourgood, you will give him neither time nor opportunity therefore: is it meet (think you) that he should be thus unthankfully dealt withfully, on the start of your hands? With that Dionyssue was somewhat moved; and demanded who that might be? Eschimes* (quoth Plato) is he, a man saire conditioned, and bit as honest carriage and behaviour, as any, one that ever came out of Socrates shipoole, or daily and samiliarly conversed with him; sufficient and able by his eloquence and pithy speech to reforme the manners of those with whom he keepeth company: This Assignment* (say) having taken a long voyage over sea and arrived here, intending for to confer with you philosophically is nothing regarded, nor see by at all. These words touched Denys to to the very quick, that presently he not only took Plato in his armes, embracing him most lovingly, and yeelding him great thanks for that kindnesse, and highly admiring his magnanimity; but assis for that time forward entreared Eshimer* right courteously; and did him all the honour that he could.

Secondly, this liberty of speech, which now is in hand, we ought to cleare and purge cleane from all contumelious and injurious words, from laughter, scoffes, and scurrile taunts, which are the huttfull and unwholetome fauces (as I may fay) wherewith many use to season their free language! For like as a Chirurgion, when he maketh incition and cutteth the flesh of his patient, had need to use great dexterity, to have a himble hand and an e.eh; yea, and every thing near and fine belonging to this worke and operation of his: as for all dancing, gelt, inlations beindes of his frigers, toyfilb motions, and superfluous agitation thereof, to shew the affility of his hand; he is to forbeare for that time: So this liberty of speech unto afriend, doth admit well a certaine kind of elegancy and civility, provided alwaies, that the grace thereof retaine fill a decent and comely gravity, whereas if it chance to have audacious bravery, laucy impurity, and infolency, to the hurt or hinderance of credit, it is utterly marred and loseth all authority. And therefore it was not an unproper and unele-gant speech, wherewith a musician upon a time stopped King Philips mouth that he had not a word to lay againe: For when he was about to have disputed and contested against the said min touching good fingering, and the found of the feverall fittings of this infirument: Oh fire (good he) God forbid that ever you should fall to follow an estate as to be more cunning in their matters than 1. But contrativitie, Epicharman spake not so aptly and to the purpose in this behalfe: Forwheid King Hiero, who a little before had put to death some of his samiliar acquisintance; invited him not many daies after to supper. Yea mary fir, but the other day when you facrificed, you bad not your friends to the feast. And as badly answered Antiphon, who upon a time when there was some queftion before Denrsthe Tyrant, what was the best kind of brasse: Mary that (quoth he) whereof the Athenians made the Statues of Harmodius and Aristogism, Such specifical states as the sast he and no good can come thereof, neither hath that scurrility and icoffing manner any delight, but a kind of intemperance it is of the tongue, mingled with a certaine malicioninelle of mind, implying a will to do hurc and injury and shewing plaine enmity, which as many asuse, worke their own mischiefe and destruction dancing (as the Proverbe taith) a dance untowardly about a pits brinke, or jelling with edged tooles. For furely it cost Amiphon his life, who was put to death by the faid Denis. And I imagines lost for ever the favour and friendship of Angustin Cafar, not for any franke speech and broad language that ever he used against him; but only because he had taken up a foolish fashion at every feast or banket, whereunto the Emperour invited him, and whensoever he walked with him, eftloones, and to no purpose he would come out with these veries in Homer, pretending that the cause of that favour which he had with the Emperour, was the grace and gift that he had in flouting and reviling others: and even the very comicall Poets in old time exhibited and represented to the Theaters many grave, authore, and ferious remonstrances, and those pertaining to policy and government of State: but there be currile speeches intermingled among, forto move laughter, which (as one unlavoury dish of meat among many other good viands) marre all their liberty of speech, and the benefit thereof; so asit is vaine and doth no good at all : And even so the Authors and Actors of such broad jests get nothing thereby, but an opinion and imputation of a malicious disposition and impure sculrility: and to the hearers there accreweth no good nor profit at all. At other times, and in other places, I hold well with it, and grant, that to jest with friends and move laughter is tolerable enough: but surely the liberty of speech then ought to be serious and modest. shewing a good intention without any purpose to gallor sling. And if it docon-cerne weighty affaires indeed, let the words be so set and couched; the affection so appeare, the countenance be so composed and the gesture so ordered, and the voice so tuned, that all concurring together may win credit to the ipeech, and be effectuall to move. But as in all things elle, fit opportunity over-flipt and neglected doth much hur; fo especially it is the occasion that the fruit of free ipeech is utterly lost, in case, it be omitted and forgotten. Moreover this is evident, that we must take heed how we speake broad at a table where friends be mer together to drinke wine liberally, and to make good cheere: for he that amidit pleasant discourses and merry talke moveth a speech that cauleth bending and knitting of brows, or others, maketh men to frown and bestowning, he doth as much as overcast faire weather with a black and darke cloud; opposing himselfe unto marted that god * Lyam, who by good right hath that name, as Pindarm the Poet faith,

For that the cord he doth unty Of cares that breed anxiety.

Befides, this neglect of opportunity bringeth with it great danger; for that our minds and spirits, kindled once with wine, are case enflamed with choler; yea, and oftentimes it falleth out, that a man after he hath taken his drinke well, when he thinketh but to ute his freedome of tongue for to give forme wholfome advertiment and admonition, ministreth occasion of great enmity. And to tay all in few words it is not the part of a generous, confident, and resolute heart, but rather of a traven kind and unmanly to sorbeare plaine; peech when men are sober; and to keep a barking at the boord, like unto those cowardly cut-dogs who never snarle but about a bone under the table. And now of this point needless it is to discourse any longer.

But foraimuch as many men neither will nor dare controll and reforme their friends when they do amife, folong as they be in proferrity; as being of opinion that fluth admonition cannot have acceffient reach into a fortunate flate that flandeth upright; and yet the fame perfors when men are falling, are ready to lay them along, and being once down, to make a football of them, or tread them under feet, or elfe keep them fo when they be once underthe hatches, giving their liberty of foech full floope to run over them all at once; as a brooke-water, which having been kept up perforce against the nature and course thereof is, so we let go, and the flood-gates drawn up; rejoying a his change and infortunity of theirs, in regard as well of their pride and arrogately. Who before diddained and despited them; as also of, themselves, who are but in meane and low estate: it were not impertment to this place forto discourse a little of this matter, and to answer that verie of Entipulate.

When fortune dash upon men smile, What need have they of freends the while?

Namely, that even then when as they feem to have forcume at their command they fland in modnectfixy, and ought to have their friends about them to pluck down their plumes and bring under their haughtinefle of heart, occasioned by prosperity; for lew there be who with their outwardtelicity continue wice and sober in mind; breaking not forth into infolence; yea, and many there are who have need of wit discretion and teaton to be put into them from without to abate and deprete them, being set a gog and pussed up with the favours of fortune: Butlay that the dit lie power do change and turne about and overthrow their state, or slip their wings and diminish their greatnesse and authority, then these calonities for timeleves are fourges; officilients, putting them in mind of their errours, and working repentance: and then in such distresse is no use at all either of friends to speake unon them turnely; or of plinching and biting speeches, to moselt and trouble them, but to say a truth, in these causations.

It greatly doth content our minds To see the face of pleasant friends,

Who may yeeld consolation, comfort, and arength to a diffrested heart, like as Xenophon doth write, that in battels and the greatest extremities of danger, the amiable visage and chearefull countenance of Clearchar being once teen of the fouldiers, encouraged them much more to play the men, and fight lustily: whereas he that useth unto a man distressed such plaine speech as may gall and bite him more, doth as much as one who unto a troubled and inflamed eye applieth some quickeye-falve or thatpe drug that is proper for to cleare the fight: by which meane he cureth not the infirmity before-faid, neither doth he mitigate or allay the paine, but unto forrow and griefe of mind already addeth angermoreover, and doth exasperate a wounded heart. And verily so long as a man is in the lati-tude of health he is not so testy, troward, and impatient, but that he will in some fort give eare unto his friend, and thinke him neither rough, nor altogether rude and uncivill, in case he tell him of his loofenesse of life, how he is given too much either unto women or wine; or if he find fault with his idlengife and fitting itill, or contrariwise, his excellive exercise; if he reprove him for haunting to often the baines or hot-houses, and never lying our of them, or blame him for gormandise and belly cheere or eating at undue houres. But if he be once fick, then it is a death unto him, and a griefe unimportable, which doth aggravate his malady, to have one at his bed-fide founding ever in his eares. See what comes of your drunkennesse, your idlenesse, your furfecting and gluttony your wenching and leachery, these are the causes of your disease. But what will the fick man say againe: Away good fir with these unseasonable words of yours: you trouble me much, and do me no good iwis: I am about making my last will and testament; my Physicians are busic, preparing and tempering a potion of Seammony, or a drinke of Castoreum for me: and you come preaching unto me with your Philosophicall reasons and admonitions to chastise me: I have no need of them now, nor of tuch friends as you, Semblably it fareth with those who are fallen to decay & be down the wind; for capable they be not of fententious faws; they have no need as the case now stands of free reprehensions: then lenity and gentle usage aide aide and comfort are more meet for them. For even so, kind nurses when their little babes and infants have caught a fall run not by and by to rate or chide them, but to take them up wash and make them cleane where they were bewrayed, and to still them by all meanes that they can; afterwards, they rebuke and chaffile them for looking no better to their feet. It is reported of Demorrus the Phalerean, when being banished out of his countrey, he lived at Thebre in meane chate and very obfeurely; that at the first he was not well pleased to see Crates the Philosopher, who came to visit him; as looking ever when he would begin with some rough words unto him, according to that liberty of speech which those Cynick Philosophers then used: but whenhe heard Crates once speake kindly unto him; and discouring after a mild manner, of the state of his banishment; namely; That their was no milkry sillen unto him by that meaners, or any calamity at all, for which he should were and todingen himselfe; burerather that he had came to rejoyce; in that he was iequestred and delivered from the charge, and management of such affairs as were cicklish, mutable, and dangerous; and with all exhorting him to pluck up his heart, and be of good cheere, yea; and repose all his comfort in his own selfe and a cleare conscience. Then Demotrius being more lightsome, and taking better courage, turned to his friends and said, Shanerake those affaires and businesses; out upon those troublesome and restlesse occupations, which have kept messom the knowledge and acquaintance of such a worthy man: For

Wheegeana acquamataco, man a notary man if men be in diffress and griefe, Sweet wordt of friends do bring reliefe: But socish for in all their actions, Have need essentially appreceded in the con-

And verily this is the manner of generous and gentle friends; but other bate initided and abjectfellows, who flatter and fawne whiles fortune doth fmile; like unto old reptures, fnafmes, and frame (as Demoßbenerfaith) do then fit and flew themfelves, when any new accident hapretoning the body, so they also flick close oevery change and alteration of fortune, as being glad thereo, and taking pleasure and contentment therein. For, say that a man afflicted were to be put in mind of his fault and missovernment of himselle, by reason that he hath taken lewd courses and followed in counsell, and to fallen into this or that inconvenience, it were sufficient to say this unto him.

You never tooke by mine advice this course, Against the same how oft did I discourse?

In what cases and occurrences then ought a friend to be earnest and vehement? And when is he to use his liberty of speech, and extend it to the full? Even then, when occasion is offered, and the time serveth best to represse excessive pleasure, to restraine unbridled choler, to refraine intollerable pride and infolency, to flay infariable avarice, or to fland against any foolish habitude and inconsiderate motion. Thus Solon pakefreely unto King Crafus, when he faw how he was cleane corrupted. and grown beyond all measure arrogant upon the opinion that he had of his felicity in this world which was uncertaine, advertifing him to look unto the end. Thus Socrates clipped the wings of Alcibiades, and by convincing his vice and erroits, caused him to weep bitterly, and altered quite the dispontion of his heart. Such were the remonstrances and admonitions of Cyrus to Cyaxares, and of Place to Dion, even when he was in his greatest russe; in the very height of his glory: when (I fay) all mens eyes were upon him for his worthy acts and great inccesse in all affaires, willing him even then to take heed and beware of arrogancy and selfe concest, as being the vice that dwelleth in the same house together with solitude, (that is to say) which maketh a man to live apart from the whole world. And to the same effect wrote Speusppus also unto him, when he bad him looke to himlelfe, and not take a pride and prefume much upon this; That there was no talke amone wo-men and children, but of him; rather that he should have a care so to adorne Sicil, with religion and piety towards the gods, with justice and good laws in regard of men, that the schoole of the Academy might have honour and credit by him. Contrariwife, Euctam and Eulam, two minions and favourites of King Perfess, who followed his veine and pleased his humour in all things, like other courtiers of his, all the while that he flourished, and so long as the world went on his side: but after he had loft the field in a battel againft the Romans; fought neare the City Pydna, and was fled, they let fly at him grosse terms and reproachfull speeches, bitterly laying to his charge all the misdemeanours and faults that he had before committed, casting in his dish those persons whom he had evillentreated or despited; which they ceased not to do so long, untill the man (partly for so; row and partly for anger) was so moved, that he stabbed them both with his dagger, and slew them in the place. Thus much in generall may suffice to determine and define as touching the opportunity of free speech to friends: meane while a faithfull and carefull friend must not reject such occasions as many times are represented unto him by them, but to take hold thereof quickly, and make good use of them: for otherwhiles it falleth out, that a demand or question asked, a narration related, a reprehension or commendation of like things in other persons, open the doore and make way for us to enter and giveth us leave to speake frankly. After this manner it is said, that Demaratus tooke his vantage to utter his mind freely: who comming upon a time from Corinto to Macedony, vvhen as King Philip vvas in some termes of distension with his vvise and son, vvas friendly received by Philip and bidden kindly vvelcome. Novv after falutations and other complements paffed between: the King asked him whether the Greeks were at accord and unity one with another? Demaratus, as howvas a friend very inward with him, and one that loved him heartily, answered thus ilt becommeth you well indeed for to enquire of the concord and agreement between the Athenians and the Peloponnesians, when in the meane while you suffer your own house to be full of domesticall quarrels and debates. Well did Diogenes likevvise, vyhe being come into the campe of King Philip, vihen he had an expedition or journey against the Greeks, vvas taken and brought before the King, who not knowing what he was, demanded of him, If he were not a spie:

Yes marty (quoth he) and come I am to spie out your inconsiderate folly (O. Philip.) and want of forecall, who being not urged not compelled by any man, are comethus far to hazard in one houre the stace of your kingdome and your own life, and to lay all upon the chance and cast of a die. But some man perad, enture will say, This was aspech somewhat with the sharpes, and too much biting. Moreover, another st time and occasion there is of admonition, when those whom wemind to reprove having been reproached and saunted already by others for some faults which they committed are become submission and assumed already by others for some faults which they committed are become submission and assumed already by others by some sails which they committed that thus have standard them, yea, and to repulse and put back such opprobrous imputations, but privately he will take his stirend apart by himselfe, and put him in mind to live more warily, and give no such offence, if for no other thing else; yet because his enemies should not take vantage, and beare themselves insolvently agains thim: For how shall they be able to open their mouths against you, and what mist-word can they have to say unto you, if you would leave these things and can them behind you, for which you heare iil and are grown to some obloquy? In this sort ithe matter be handled, all the offence that was taken shall light upon the head of the first standard and the profit shall be attributed unto the other that gave the friendly advertisement, and he shall goar

Some there be moreover, who after a more cleanly and fine manner in speaking of others, admonish their own familiar friends: for they will accuse strangers in their hearing for those faults which they know them to commit, and by this meanes reclaime them from the same. Thus Ammonius Out maller per eiving when he gave lecture in the afternoon, that some of us his scholars had taken a larger dinner, and eate more than was fit for fludents, commanded a lervant of his a franchiled, to take up his own fon and to beat him and why so? He cannot fon ooth make his dinner (quoth he) but he must have some vinegarto his meat. And in saying so he cast his eye uponus, in in h fort, that a many as were culpable took themselves to be rebuked, and thought that he meant them. Furthermore, this good regard would be observed, that we never use this fashion of free speech, and reproving our friend in the presence of many persons, but we must remember that which befell unto Pleto: for when upon a time Socrates, in a di putation held at the table, inveighed somewhat too bitterly against one of his familiars before them all: had it not been better (quoth Plate) to have toid him of this privately, but thus to shame him before all this company? But Socrates taking him bresently therewith; And you also might have done better to have said this tomy selfe when you had found me alone. Pythagoras by report gave such hard termes by way of reproofe to one or his scholars and a quaintaine in the hearing of many, that the young man for very griefe of heart was weary of his life and hanged himselfe. But never would Pythagoras after to his dying day reprove or admonish any man if another were in place. And to say a truth, as well the detection as the correction of a fin ought to be tecret, and not in publike place, like as the discovery and cure also of tome filthy and foule dilease: it must not, I say, be done in the view of the world (as if some shew or pompe were to be exhibited unto the people) with calling witnesses or spectators thereto. For it is not the part of a friend, but a trick of some Sophister, to seeke for glory in other mensfaults, and affect outward shew and vaine oftentation in the presence of others: much like to these Mountebanke Chirurgions, who for to have the greater practile, make shew of their cunning casts, and operations of their art in publike Theaters, with many gesticulations of their handy-worke, Moreover, befides that there should no infamy grow to him that is reproved, (which indeed is not to be allowed in any cure or remedy) there ought also to be some regard had of the nature of vice and sin, which for the most part of it ielse is opinionative, contentious, stubborne, and apt to stand to it, and make meanes of defence. For as Euripides faith,

We dayly see, not only wanton love Doth presset the more, when one doth it reprove.

But any vice whatfoever it be, and every imperfection, if a man do reprove it in publike place before many, and foarenor at all, putteth on the nature of impudence, and turneth to be fhamelefle: itse as therefore Plate givetha precept, that elder folke, if they would imprint fhame and grace in their young children, ought themselves first to shew shamefaced behaviour among them; even fo, the modest and bassiful liberty of speech which one friend uses, doth strike also a great shame in another. Also to come and approach by little and little unto one that offendeth, and after a doubting manner with a kind of seare to touch him, is the next way to undermine the vice that he is prone and given unto; whiles he cannot choose but be modestly disposed, who is so modestly and gently entreated. And therfore it would be alwairs very good in those reprehensions to observe what he did, who in like catereproving a friend,

That no man elfe but he might heare.

But lesse seemly and convenient it is for to discover the fault of the husband before his wise; of a father in the presence of his fons; of a lover before his love; or of a schoolemaster in the hearing of his scholars: that were enough to put them beside their right wits for anger and griefe when they shall see themselves checked and discredited before those of whom they desire to be best esteemed. And verify of this mind I am, that it was not the wine so much that see King Alexander in such a chase and rage against Clim when hereproved him, as for that he did it in the presence and hearing of so many. Aristomenes also, the master and tutor of king. Protomesus, for that in the fight of an embassisation had not of a sleep, and willed him to give care unto the embassige that was cell ered ministred unto his ill-willers and the slatterers about the court great vantage, who there-room tooke occasion to steeme discontented in the Kings behalfs, and shus to say: What if after so many travels that your Majesty doth undergo, and your long watching for our skes, some sleep do overske you otherwhiles; our part it were to tell-your of it privately, and not thus indely to lay hand as it were upon your person in the presence of so many men. Whereupon Protomesus being moved at these singlessions, sent unto the man a cup of posson, with commandement that he should drinke it off. Arystophases also casted this in Cleon his teeth,

For that when strangers were in place The town with termes he diddisgrare,

And thereby provoke the Atken ans and bring their high displeasare upon him. And therefore this regard would be had especially above all others, that when we would use our liberty of speech, we do it not by way of oftentation in a vaine glory to be popular, and to get applante, but only with atintention to profusand do good, year, and to cure fome infirmity thereby. Over and befides that which Thucydides reporteth of the Corint hians, how they gave out of themselves, and not unfitly, that it belonged unto them, and meet men they were to reprove others; the fame ought they to have in them that will take upon them to be correctors of other persons. For like as Lyfarder anfivered to a certaine Megarian who put himselse forward in an assembly of associates and allies to speake trankely for the liberty of Greece: These words of yours (my friend) would be seeme to have been spoken by some pussant state or City; even so it may be said to every one that will seeme freely to teprehend another, that he had need himselfe to be in manners well reformed. And this most truly ought to be inferred upon all those that will seeme to chastise and correct others, namely, to be wifer and of better government than the reft: for thus Place protested that he reformed Spensippus by example of his own life: and Kenetrates likewife cafting but his eye upon Polemon, who was come inso his schoole like a Ruffian by his very looke only reclaimed him from his loofe life: whereas on the contrary fide, if a light and leved person, one that is full of bad conditions himselfe, would feeme to find fault with others and be busie with his tongue, he must be sure alwaies to heare this on both fides of his eares, Himselfe allful of fores impure Will others feeme to heale and cure.

Howbeir, forasmuch as oftentimes the case standers so, that by occasion of some affaires we be driven to chastise those with whom we converse, when we our selves are culpable and no better than they: the most cleanly and least offensive way to do it, is this, To acknowledge in some for that we be likewise faulty and to include and comprehend our own persons together with them: after which manner is that reproofe in Homer;

Sir Diomede what aileth 111 ?

How is it come about?

That ne should thus forget to fight,

Who earst were though to shout?

Also in another place:

And now we all unworthy are

With Hector only to comtare.

Thus Socrates mildly and gendy would feeme to reprove young men, making semblance as if himfeste were not void of ignorance, but had need also to be instructed in vertue, and professing that he had need with sine no iearch for the knowledge of truth; is for such commonly do win love and credit, yea, and somet shall be beleeved, who are thought subject to the same saults, and seeme willing to correct their friends like as they do their own selves; whereas he who spreadeth and displateth is own wings. in clipping other mens, justifying himselfeas it he were pure, sincere, saulteleste, and without all affections and infirmicies, unless he be much elder than we, or in regard of some notible and approved vertue infar higher place of authority, and in greater reputation than our selves, he shall gainen o profit nor do any good, but be reputed a busine body and troublesome person. And therefore it was not without just cause that good Planix in speaking to Achilles alledged his own mistortunes, and nymely, how in a fit of choler he had like ore day to have killed his own stather, but that suddenly he bethought himselie and changed his mind,

Lest that among the Greeks I should be nam'd A particide and ever af er skam'd:

Which he did no doubt to this end, because he would not seeme in chiding himto arrogate this praise unto himselfe that he was not subject to anger nor had ever done amisse by occasion of that infirmity and passion. Certes such admonitions as these enter and pierce more effectually into the heart, for that they are thought to proceed from a tender compassion; and more willing are were yeeld unto such as seem to have suffered the like than to those that despite and contemne us, But for-assume has neither the eye when it is ensistent can abide any cleare and shining light, nor a passionate mind endure franke speech, or aplaine and bare reprehension, one of the best and most profitable helps in this case is to intermingle therewith a little praisse as we read thus in Homer;

Now (sure) me thinks you do not well, Thus for to leave the field, Who all are known for doughty knights, And best with speare and shield.

A coward if I saw to sice, Him would I not reprove: But such as you thus for to shrinke, My heart doth greatly move. Likewife, O Pandar, where is nowthy bow, Where are thine arrows flight: Where is that honour in which none With thee dare strive in fight?

To discerne a Flatterer from a Friend.

And verily such oblique reprehensions also as these are most effectuall and wonderfull in reclaiming those that be ready to run on end, and fall to some grosse enormities: as for example,

What is become of wife Oedipus, In riddles areading who was so famous. And Hercules, who hath endur'd such paine, Speakes hethese words so foolish and so vaine?

For this kind of dealing doth not only asswage and mitigate the roughnesse and commanding power that is in a reprehension and rebuke, but also breedeth in the party in such fort reproved a certaine emulation of himselfe, causing him to be abashed and ashamed for any sollies and dishonest pranks, when he remembreth and calleth to mind his other good parts and commendable acts, which by this meanes he erreth before his eyes, as examples, and so taketh himselfe for a patterne and prelident of 't ter things: But when we make comparison between him and others, to wit, his equals in age his fellow-citizens or kinsfolks; then his vice which in the own nature is stubborne, and opimonative enough becommeth by that means more froward and exasperate, and oftentimes he will not flick in a fume and chase to fling away, and grumble in this wise, Whygo you not then to those that are io much better than 1? Why can you not let me alone but thus trouble me as you do? And therefore we must take heed especially, that whiles we purpose to tell one plainly of his faults, we do not praise others, unselled haply they be his parents: as Agamemon did unto Diomedes,

Unlike himselfe, and much grown out of kind,

And Uly fes in the Tragedy entituled Seyrii, You fir, whose father was a knight, The best that ever drew A [word of all the Greeks, in field, And many a Captaine flew, Sit you here carding like a wench, And finning wooll on rock, Thereby the glorious light to quench Of your most noble stock?

But most unseemely it were and undecent of all other, if when one is admonished by his friend, he should fall to admonish him againe; and being told freely of his fault, serve him the like, and quit him with as much : for this is the next way to kindle coales, and to make variance and discord; and in one word verily, such a rejecting and spurning agains as this may seems in effect to bewray, not a reciprocal liberty of rendring one for another, but rather a peevish mind that can abide no manner of reproofe. Better therefore it is to endure patiently for the time a friend that telleth us plainly of our faults; and if himself afterwards chance to offend and have need of the like reprehension, this after a fort giveth free liberty unto him that was rebuked afore to use the same liberty of speech again unto the ther: For calling to minde by this occasion, without any remembrance of old grudge and former injurie, that himself also was wont not to neglect his friends when they did amisse and forgat themselves, but took pains to reprove, redresse, and teach them how to amend, he will the sooner yeeld a fault, and receive that challifement and correction, which he shall perceive to be a retribution of like love and kindness, and not a requital of complaint & anger. Moreover, like as Thucydides faith. That the man is wife and well advited, who incurreth the envie of men for matters of greatest weight and importance; even so we say: That if a friend will adventure the danger and heavy load and ill will for blaming his friends, he must make choice of such matters as be of great moment and much consequence: for if he will take exceptions at every trifle and little thing indifferent if he will ieem evermore to be finding fault, and carry himself not like a kind and affectionate friend, but a precise, severe and imperious School-master, to spie all faults, and correct every point and tittle, certes he shall finde afterwards, that his admonitions even for the greatest offences. shall not be regarded, nor any whit effectual: for that he hath used already to no purpose, his frank reprehension (the foveraign remedie for groffe and main faults) in many others that are but flight, and ot worthy reproof: much like unto a Physician, who hath employed and spent a medine that is strong and bitter, howbeit, necessary and costly, in small infirmities, and of no reckoning to speak of Afriend therefore is to look unto this; That it be not an ordinary matter with him to be alwayes quartelfome, and desirous to finde one fault or other. And if peradventure he meet with such a companion as is apt to fearch narrowly into all light matters, to cavil and wrangle for every thing, and ready to raise calumniations like a petty Sycophant for toyes and trifles, he may take the better advantage and occasion thereby for to reprove him again, in case he chance to fail in greater and more

Philotimus the Physician answered pretily unto one, who having an impossume growner of suppuration about his liver, shewed unto him a singer that was fore, and troubled with some blister or whitflaw, and defired his counsell for the fame: Mygood friend (quoth he) the disease that you are to look unto, is not a whitflaw nor about your nail-root; even fo, there may be occasion and opportunity offered unto a friend to lay unto one that ever and anon is finding fault, and reproving fmall errors not worth the noting, to wit, sports and pastimes, feathing and merty meeting, or such liketrishing tricks of youth: Good sir, let us find the meanes rather, that this man whom you thus blame may cast off the harlot that he keeps, or give over his dice playing; for otherwise, he is a man of excellent and wonderful good parts. For he that perceiveth how he is tolerated or winked at, yea, and pardoned in small matters, will not be unwilling, that a friend should use his liberty in reproving his greater vices: whereas he that is evermore urgent upon one, preffing and lying bety mich ways bitter and unpleasant prying and looking in every corner, and taking know-ladge in all things: luch an one (I say) there is neither childe nor brother will endure; nay he is intolerable to his very lervants: But like as Euripides faith, lerable to his very lervants: Dit like as Europaer hair).

All is not naught that old age brings,

Me may init finde some good things.

No more is the folly of friends so bad but that we may pick some goodnesse out of them; we ought therefore to observe diligently, not onely when they do amisse, but also when they do, well and betherefore to observe amigenty not onerly when they do annue, out and when they are many do as the Smiths who temper yron: For when they have given it a fire, and made it by that means fort, look and pliable, they drenth and dip it in cold water, whereby it becometh compact and hard, taking thereby the due temperature of ftiff steel; even so, when we perceive that our friends be well beat and relaxed (as it were) by hearing themselves praised by us, then we may come upon them by little and little with a tineture (as I may so fay) of reproof, and telling them of their faults. Then will it be afit time to fpeak unto a friend thus: How lay you, are these pranks worthy to be compared, with those parts? See you not the fruits that come of vertue? Lo what we your iriends require of you, theleare the duties and offices which are befeeming your person: for these hath nature made and framed you. As for those lewd verses, fie upon them,

Send such away, confine them farre, unto the mountain wild, Or into roaring fea from land let them be quite exil'd.

For like as an honest minded and discreet Physician, will choose rather to cure the malady of his Patiene by rest and sleep, or by good nuritiure and diet, than by Castoreum or Seammonium: even so, 2 kinde and courteous friend, a good father and gentle schoolmaster, taketh pleasure and joyeth more toule praises than reproofs, in the reformation of manners. For there is nothing that maketh theman, who boldly findeth fault with his friends to be foliate offentive unto them, or to do more good and cure them better, than to be void of anger, and to feem after a milde fortin alllove and good and the them to them when they do amiffe. And therefore neither oughthe to urge them overmuch; and feem too eagerly to convince them if they deny the thing; neyet to debarre them of liberty to make their answer and cleare themselves: but rather to Belp them out, and after a fort to ministerunto them some honest and colourable precences, to excuse and instances out, and after a fort to ministerunto them some honest and colourable precences, to excuse and instances out, and after a fort to ministerunto them some honest and colourable precences, to excuse and instances out, and after a fort to ministerunto them some honest and colourable precences, to excuse and instances out, and after a fort to ministerunto them some honest and colourable precences. fe their facts: and when a manseeth them do amisse by reason of some worse canic indeed, to law thefault upon another occasion that is more colerable: As Heffor when he laid unto Plaris;

Unhappy manjalasyou do not well To bear in brest a heart so fell.

As if his brothers retire out of battell and refufall to combat with Menelium, had not been a meer flight and running away, but very anger and a curft stomack. Likewise Nessor unto Agamemnon,

But you gave place unto your haughty mind:

And feed those firs which come to you by kind.

For in mine advice a more milde reprehension is this than to have said: This was injuriously done of you, or this was a shameful and villanous part of yours: As allo to sayunto one, You could not tell what you did; you thought not of it; or you were altogether ignorant what would come thereof, is better and more civil, than bluntly to charge him and fay: This was a meer wrong, and a wicked act of yours. Also thus do not contest and quarrell in this wife with your brother is lefte offenfive then to fay:Deal not thus enviously and spitefully against your brother:Likewise it were a more gentle manner of reproof to fay unto a man: Avoid this woman that spoileth and abuseth you; than thus: Give over this woman, spoil and abuse her nomore. Thus you see what meanes are to bee used in this liberty of speech, when a friend would cure a malaly,

But for to prevent the same, there would be practised a clean contrary course for when it behoves to avert and turn our friends from committing a fault, whereto they are prone and enclined; orto withstand some violent and disordinat passion, which carrieth them a clean contrary way; or when we are defirous to incite and flir them forward unto good things, being of themselves slow and back ward: when, I fay, we would give an edge unto them, who are otherwife dull, and hear them being cold, we ought to transferre the thing or act in hand to fome abfurd caufes, and those that be unseen. ly and undecent. Thus Weffespricked on Achylles in a certain Tragedie of Sophocles, when hefuld thus unto him : It is not for a supper Achilles that you are so angry, but

For that you have already seen

The mals of Troy, your fearfull teen.

And when upon these words Achilles took great indignation, and chased more and more, saying. that he would not fail forward but be gone back again, he came upon him a second time with this re-

I wrote well why you gladly would depart: Tis not because at checks or taunts you chase, But Hector is not far, he kils your hart; For dread of him to stay it is not (afe.

By this meanes when we fear a valiant and hardly man with the opinion of cowardife; an hone, chafte and civill person, with the note of being reputed loose and incontinent; also a liberal and fumptuous Magnifico, with the fear to be accounted a niggard or a mechanical micher; we do mighrily incite them to well doing, and chase them from bad wayes. And like as when a thing is done and past, and where there is no remedie, there should be born a modest and temperate hand, in such fortthat in our liberty of speech we seem to shew more commiseration, pitty and fellow-grief of minde for the fault of a friend, than eager reprehension; so contrariwise where it stands upon the point that he should not fault, where (I fay) our drift is to fight against the motion of his passions, there we ought to be vehement, inexorable, and never to give over nor yeeld one jot unto them. And this is the very time when we are to show that love of ours and good will which is constant and setled, and sure, and to use our true liberty of speech to the full. For to reprove faults already com mitted, we see it is an ordinary thing among arrant enemies. To which purpose said Diogenes very well: That a man who would be an honed man ought to have either very good triends, or mod threwd and biner enemies: for as they do teach and infinites: fo these are ready rosinote fault and in prove. Now far better it is for one to abstain from evil doing, in beleeving and following the sound counsel of his friends, than to repent afterwards of ill doing, when he feeth himself blamed and accused by his enemies. And therefore if it were for nothing else but this, great different and circumspection would be used in making remonstrances and speaking freely unto friends: and so muchus rather, by how much it is the greater and stronger remedie that friendship can use, and hath more need to be used in time and place convenient, and more wisely to be tempered with a mean and me diocrity. Now forasmuch as I have said fundry times already, that all reprehensions whatsoem are dolorous unto him that receiveth them; we ought in this case to imitate good Physicians and Chirurgians: for when they have made incision or cut any member, they leave not the place in pin and torment fill, but use certain fomentations and lenitive infusions to mitigate the anguish: No more do they that after a civil manner have chid or rebuked, run away presently so soon as they have bitten and pricked the party, but by changing their manner of speech, entertain their friends thusgled and wounded, with other more mild and pleafant discourses; to asswage their grief and result their hart again that is cast down and discomforted: and I may well compare them to these cutters and carvers of images, who after they have rough hewne and scabbled over certain peeces of stones to make their statures of do polish and smooth them fair, yea and give them a lightsome lustre. But if a man bestung and nipped once, or touched to the quick by some objurgatory repehension, and fo left rough, uneven, disquieted swelling and pussing for anger, he is ever after hardly quieted or re claimed, and no consolation will serve the turn to appease and comfort him again. And there forethey who reprove and admonish their friends, ought to observe this rule above all others. Not to forsake them immediately when they have so done, nor to break off their conserences. dainly, or to conclude their speech with any word that might grieve and provoke them.

Of Meekness, or how a Manshould refrain Choler. A Treatise in manner of a Dialogue.

The Summarie of the Dialogue.

Fter we are taught how to discern a flatterer from a friend, it seemeth that this Treatise, as touch-Aing mildnesse and how we ought to bridle anger, was set here in this proper place. For like as we may foon erre grofly in those whom we are willing and well content to have about us , and in that respect are may founding evoly in those whom we are willing and well content to have about us, and in that respect to be circumssets, and to stand upon our guard of one-have no less cause to consider how we should convert monogo as incipally the state of the state forth at Philosphiemorall is able to perform. And for to attain unto 6 grea: a benefit, he sheweth in the style place, that we ought to procure our friends for to observe and mark our impersations, that by long continuance of time we may accustome our selves to holde in your judgement by the bit of reason. After certain proper similitudes serving for this purpose, and a description of the inconveniences, and barmes that come by wrath, he proveth , that it is an easie maiter to restrain and represente same: to which purpose he setteth down divers means, upon which he discourseth after his usuall manner, that is to (ay, with reasons and inductions, enriched with notable similitiades and examples, afterwards, having spoken of the time and manner of chastifing and correcting those who are under our power and governance, he proposeth aswell certain remedies to cure choler, as preservatives to keep us from relapse into it again. Which done he representesh ire lively, as in a painted table, to the end that it of who suffer themselves to be sur-prised therewith, may be abashed and assumed for their unhappy state: and therewith he gives he sive notable advertisements for to attain thereto, which be as it were preservatives by means whereof we would not feel our selves attaint any more with this maladie.

Of Meekness, or bow a man should refrain Choler.

SYLLA.

T seemeth unto me (O Fundamus) that painters do very wel & wisely, to view & consider their works often and by times between, before they think them finished and let them go out of their hands: for that by letting them to out of their fight, and then afterwards having recourie thither again to judge thereof, they make their eyes (as it were) new judges to fpie and discern the least fault that is, which continually looking thereupon, and the ordinarie view of one and the same thing doth cover and hide from them. But for a smuch as it is not possible that a man should depart from himself for a time, and after a certain space return again; nor that he should break, interrupt and discontinue his understanding and sense within (which is the cause that every man is a worle Judge of himself than of others.) A second means and remedie therefore in this case wou'd be used namely to review his friends sundry times, and estioons likewise to yeeld himfelf to be seen and beheld by them, not so much to know thereby whether he aged apace and grow foon old; or whether the constitution of his body be better, or worse than it was before, as to furvey and combider his manners and behaviour, to wit, whether time harh added any good thing, or taken away ought that is bad and naught. For mine own part, this being now the fecond year fince I came first to the Citie of Rome, and the shith moneth of mine acquaintance with you, I think it no great wonder, that confidering your towardness and the dexterity of your nature, those good parts which were already in you, have gotten to great an addition, and be so much increased, as they are: but when I see how that vehement inclination, and ardent motion of yours to anger, whereunto by nature you were given, is by the guidante or reason become lo milde, fo gentle and tractable, it cometh into my minde to fay thereunto, that which I read in

O what a wondrous change is here? Much milder are you than you were.

And verily this gentleness and meekness of yours is not turned into a certain sloth, and generall distolution of our vigouribut like as a peece of ground well titled, lieth light and even, and befides more hollow than before, which maketh much for the fertility thereof; even so, your nature hath gotten in flead of that violent disposition and sudden propension unto choler, a certain equality and profundity ferving greatly to the management of affairs, whereby also it appeareth plainly that is is not that your hallinesse and cholericke passion is thus faded, but rather by means of good reasons and instructions well cured. And yet verily (for unto you I will be bold to say the truth) at the first I suspected and could not well beleeve Eros our familiar friend, when he made this report of you unto me; as doubting that he was ready to give this testimony of you in regard of affection and good will, bearing me in hand of those things which were not indeed in you, but ought to be in good and honest men: and yet (as you know well enough) he is not such a man, as for favour of any person, and for to plea e, can easily be perswaded and brought to say otherwise than he thinketh. But now as he is freed and acquit from the crime of false witnesses you (since this journey and travell upon the way affordeth you good leafure) will (I doubt not) at my request, declare and recount unto us the order how you did this cure upon your self; and namely, what medicines and remedies you used, to make that cholericke nature of yours, so gentle, so tractable, so soft and supple, so obeifant (I fay) and subject wholly to the rule of reason? Fundanús.

But why do ye not your self (O Sylla)my deerest and most affectionate friend, take heed, that for the amity and good will which you bearunto me, you be not deceived, and see one thing in me for another? As for Eros, who for his own part hath not alwayes his anger fledfaftly flayed with the Cable and Anchor of Homers Peifa (that is, obedient and abiding firm in one place) but otherwhiles much moved and out of quiet, for the hatred that he hath of vice and vicious men, it may very well be, and like it is that unto him I feem more mild and gentle than before; like as we see in changing and altering the notes of Prick-fong, or Gam-ut in Musick, certain Netz or Notes which are Trebles in one 8. being compared with other Netze more high and small become Hypatz, i.e. the Basses.

It is neither so nor so (O Fundanus) but of all loves, do as I desire you for my sake. Fundanus.

Since it is so (Sylla) among many good advertisements of Musonius which come to my minde, this is one: That whosever would live is and in health, ought all their life time to look to themselves, and be as it were in continual Physick. For I am not of this minde, neither do I think it convenient that like as Elleborns, after it hath done the deed within a fick mans bodie and wrought a cure, is cast up again together with the maladie; so reason also should be sent out after the passion which it hath cured, but it ought to remain still in the mind for to keep and preserve the judgement. For why? reason is not to be compared with medicines and purgative drugs, but rather to holesome and nourishing meats, engendring mildly in the mindes of them unto whom it is made familiar, a good complexion and a fast habit together with some perfect health: whereas admonitions and corrections applyed or ministred unto passions when they swell and rage, and be in the height of their heat and inflammation hardly and with much ado work any effect at all, and if they do, it is with much pain. Neither differ they in operation from those strong odors which well may raise out of a fit those who are fallen and be subject to the Epileps; or falling sickness; but they cure not the difease, nor secure the patient for falling again. True it is that all other passions of the minde, if taken in hand at the very point and instant when they are in highest sury, do yeeld in some fort, and they admit reason coming from without into the minde for to help and succour, but anger not onely as Melanthius faith,

but also turneth her clean out of house and home, shutteth and locketh her out of doors for altogetherinay it fareth for all the world like to those who set the house on fire over their own heads, and burn themselves and it together: it filleth all within full of trouble, smoke & confused noises, in fuch fort that it hath neither eye to see, nor ear to listen unto those that would, and might assist and give aid: and therefore sooner will a Ship abandoned of her Master in the mids of the Sea, and there hulling dangerously in a storm and tempest receive a Pilot from other Ship without; than a man toffed with the waves of fury and anger, admit the reason and remonstrance of a stranger; unlesse his own reason at home were before-hand well prepared: But like as they who look for no other but have their City besieged, gather together and lay up fafe their own store and provision, and all things that might serve their turn, not knowing nor respecting any aid or relief abroad during the siege: even to ought we to have our remedies ready and provided long before and the same gathered out of all parts of Philosophie and conceived into the mind for to withstand the rage of choler: as being assured of this, that when need and necessity requireth to use them, we shall not easily admit the fame and fuffer them to have entrance into us. For furely at fuch a time of extremity the foul heareth not a word that is faid unto it without, for the trouble and confusion within, unlesse her own reason be affittant, ready both to receive and understand quickly every commandement and precept, and also prompt the same accordingly unto her. And tay that she doth hears look what is faid unto her after a milde, calm, and gentle manner, that she despiseth; again, if any be more instant, and do urgeher somewhat roughly, with those she is displeased, and the worse for their admonitions: for wrath being of the own nature proud, audacious, unruly, and hardly suffering it self to be handled or firred by another, much like unto a tyrant attended with a firong guard about his person, ought to have fomething of the own which is domestical, familiar and (as it were) in-bred together with it, forto overthrow and dissolve the same. Now the continual custome of anger and the ordinary or often falling into a chafe, breedeth in the minde an ill habit called wrathfulnesse, which in the end groweth to this passe, that it maketh a man cholerick and hasty, apt to be moved at everything; and befides, it engendreth a bitter humor of revenge, and a tellinesse implacable, or hardly to be appeafed namely when the mind is exulcerate once taking offence at every small occasion, quarreling and complaining for toyes and trifles, much like unto a thin or a fine edge that entreth with the least force that the graver puteth it to. But the judgement of reason opposing it self straightwayes against fuch motions and fits of choler, and ready to suppresse and keep them down, is not onely a remedy for the present miss hief, but also for the time to come doeth strengthen and fortifie the mind. cauling it to be more firm and strong to resist such pussions when they arise. And now to give fome instance of my telf: The tame hapned unto me atter I had twice or thrice made head against choler, as befell fometimes to the Thebanes; who having once repelled and put to flight the Lacedæmonians (warriors thought in those dayes invincible) were never in any one battel afterward defeated by them. For from that time forward I took heart and courage, as feeing full well, that conquered it might be with the discourse of reason. I perceived moreover, that anger would not onely be quenched with cold water powred and call upon it, as Arifforle hath reported unto us, but also that it would go out and be extinguished, were it never to light a fire before, by presenting neer unto it fome object of fear nay (1 affure you) by a fudden joy coming upon it unlooked for in many a man, according as Homer faith, choler hath melted, diffolyed and evaporated away. And therefore this resolution I made, that anger was a passion not incurable, if men were willing to be cured: for furely the occasions and beginnings thereof are not alwayes great and for . ible but we see that a left, a scoff, some sport, some laughter, a wink of the eye, or nod of the head, and such small matters, hath fee many in a peiting chafe: even as Lady Helena faying no more but thus unto her neece or brothers daughter at the first meeting,

Electra Virgin, long time fince I you fam, &c. drave her in such a fit of choler, that therewith she was provoked to break offher speech with this aniwer,

Wife now at last though all too late, you are I may well say ,

Who whilom left your husbands house, and ran with shame away,

Likewise Callist henes mightily oftended Alexander with one word, who when a great boule of wine went round about the table, refused it as it came to his turns faying: I wil not (I trow) delink so to your health Alexander, that I shal have need therby of Acfoulapins (i. a Physician,) A firethat newly hath caught a flame with hares, or conies hair, drie leaves, hurds and light flraw, flubble and rakings, it is an easie matter to put out & quench; but if it have once taken to found fewell & such matter as hath folidity, substance and thickness in it, soon it burneth and consumeth as Assembles faith:

By climbing up and mounting hie
The stately works of Carpentrie.
Semblably, he that will take heed unto choler at the beginning, when he seeth it once to smoke or flame out by occasion of some merry speech, flouting scoffes, and soolish words of no moment, needs not to frive much about the quenching of it: for many times it he do no more but hold his peace or make imal account or noneat all of fuch matters, it is enough to extinguish and make it go out. For he that ministreth not fewel to fire, putteth it out; and whosoever feedeth not his anger, at the first, and bloweth not the coals himself, doth cool and represse the same. And therefore Hieronymus the Philosopher, although other wise he have taught us many good lessons and instructions; yet in this point he hath not pleased and satisfied me, when he saith; That a man is not able to perceive in himself the breeding of anger , (so quick and sudden it is) but onely when it is bred, then it may be selt: for surely there is no vice or passion in us, that giveth such warning, or hath either fo evident a generation or so manifest an augment whiles it is stirred and moved, as anger, according as Homer himser right skilfully, and as a man of good experience, giveth us to understand, who bringeth in Achilles fore moved to forrow and grief of heart, even with a word, and at the very instant, when he heard the speeches of Agamennon: for thus reported the Poet of him :

Out of the king his fovereigns mouth, the word of for erp. if, But straight a black and mistie cloud of ire him overcast.

But

But of Agamemnon himselfe he saith, that it was long ere he was angry snamely, after he had been kindled with many hard speeches, that were dealt to and fro, which it any third perion stepping between, would have staid or turned away, certes their quarrell and debate had not grown to such termes of extremity as it did. And therefore Socrates fo often as he felt himselfe somewhat declining and more moved than he should, against any one of his friends, and avoiding as it were a rock in the fea, before the tempett came and the billows arole, would let fall his voice, they a finding countenance, and compole his look and vifage to mirth and lenity, and thus by bending and drawing another way to that whereunto his affection enclined, and opposing himselfe to a contrary passion, he kept upright on his feet, to that he fell not nor was overthrown, For there is (my good friend) a ready meanes in the very beginning to breake the force of choler, like as there is a way to dissolve a tyrannicall rule and dominion, that is to fay, not to obey at the first, not to give eare and be ruled by her commandement, when she shall bid thee to speake and cry out aloud, or to look with a terrible countenance or to knock or beat thy felie; but to be still and quiet, and not to re-enforce and encrealethe passion, as men do exasperate a sicknesse with strugling, striving, tossing, and roaring out aloud. For those things which ordinary overs and amorous young men practice, that is to say, to go in a wanton and merry maske, to fing and dance at the doores of their sweet-hearts and mistresses, to bedeck their windows with coronets and flower-garlands, bring some ease and alleviation (such as it is) of their passions, and the same not altogether undecent and uncivill, according to that which we read in the Poet:

Andwhen I came, aloud I criednot, And a ked who he was, or daughter whose? But kist my love full sweetly that I wot: If this be fin? but fin I cannot choose.

Alfothat which we permit those to do who are in forrow, namely, to mourne, to lament and weep for losses or mishaps; certainly with their sighs which they tetch, and teares that they shed they do fend out and discharge a good part of their griefe and anguish. But it is not to with the passion of anger: for turely, the more that they stir and speake who are surprised therewith, the more hot it is, and the flame burneth out the rather; and therefore the best way is, for a man to be quiet, to flie and keep him out of the way, or elie to retire himselfe into some haven of surety and repose, when he perceiveth that there is a fit of anger toward, as if he felt an accesse of the falling evill comming. This (I say) we ought to do, for feare left we fall down, or rather run and rush upon some one or other. But who be they that we run upon? Surely our very friends, for the greatest part, and those we wrong most. As for our affection of love, it standeth not to all things indifferently, neither do, we hate ne yet feare we every thing alike; But what is it that ire fetteth not upon? Nothing is there but it doth affaile and lay hands on; we are angry with our enemies; we chafe with our triends; with children with parents are we wroth; nay, the very gods themselves we forbeare not in our choleri k mood; we flieupon dumbe and brute beasts; we spare not so much as our utensil vessels. and implements which have neither sense nor life at all, if they stand in our way, we fare like Thamyris the Musician,

Who brake his cornet-finely bound And tipt with gold: his lave he hent Well ftrung and tuned to pleasant sound, And it anon to fitters rent.

Thus did Pandarus also, who cursed, and betooke himselfe to all the fiends in hell, if he did not burst his bow and arrows with his own hands, and throw them into the fire when he had so done. As for Xerxes, he fluck not to whip, to lash and scourge the lea, and to the mountaine Athos he sent his minatory letters in this forme; Thou wretched and wicked Athos, that bear est up thy head aloft into the skie; see thou tring forth no great cranges stones. I advise thee for my works, and such as be lard to be cut and wrought: otherwise, if thou do, I shall cut theethrough and tumble three into the maine sea. Many fearefull and terrible things there be that are done in anger, and as many for them againe, as foolish and ridiculous, and therefore of all passions that trouble the mind, it is both hated and despised moft. In which regards expedient it were, to confider diligently as well of the one as of the other for mine own part, whether I did well or ill, I know not; but furely, when I began my cure of choler in my selfe, I did as in old time the Lacedamonians were wont to do by their Ilotes, men of base and servile condition: For as they taught their children what a foule vice drunkennesse was, by their example when they were drunke, fo I learned by observing others what anger was, and what beaftly effects it wrought. First and formost therefore, like as that malady, according to H programs, is of all others worst and most dangerous, wherein the visage of the sick person is most dissignired and made unlikest it selfe; so, I seeing those that were possessed of choler, and (as it were) beside themselves thereby, how their faces were changed, their colour, their countenance, their gate and their voice quite altered. I imagined thereupon unto my selfe a certaine forme and image of this malady as being mightily displeased in my mind, if happily at any time I should be seen of my friends, my wife, and the little girles my daughters. fo terrible, and fo far moved and transported befide my felfe: not only fearefull and hideous to behold, and far otherwise than I was wont, but also unpleasant to be heard; my voice being rough, rude, and churlish: like as it was my hap to see some of my familiar friends in that case, who by reason of anger could not reteine and keep their ordinary fashions and behaviour, their forme of vilage, nor their grace in speech, ne yet that affability and pleasantnesse in company and talke as they were wont,

This was the reason that (ains Gracehus the Oratour, a man by nature blune, rude in behaviour, and withall over-earnest and violent in his manner of pleading, had a little flute or pipe made for the nonce, such as Musicians are wont to guide and rule the voice gently by little and little up and down, between bale and trebble, according to every note as they would themselves, teaching their scholars thereby to have a tunable voice. Now when Gracchus pleaded at the bar at any time, he had one of his servants standing with such a pipe behind him: who observing when his Master was a little out of tune, would found a more mild and pleasant note unto him, whereby he reclaimed and called him back from that loud exclaiming, and so taking down that rough and swelling accent of his duked and allayed the cholerick passion of the Oratour Certes my selfe, if I had a pretty page to attend upon me, who were diligent, necessary and handsome about me, would not be offended but very veil content, that viven he favi me angry he fhould by and by prefent a mirrour orlooding glass unto me, fuch a one as they ule to bring and sheve unto some that nevely are come out of the baine; although no good or profit at all they have thereby. But certainly for man to fee himselfeat such a time, how disquieted he is, how far out of the way, and befide the course of nature, it were no small meanes to check this passion, and to set him in hatred there with for ever after. They who are delighted in tales & fables, do report by way of merry speech and pastime, that once when Miner was a piping therecame a Satyr and admonished her, that it was not for her to play upon a flute; but she for the time took no heed to that advertisement of his, notwithstanding hespake thus unto

This forms of face becomes you not,

And first he firings a fecret root of heart,

Which to work d floudd not be, but by a part.

The feaverily, when being troubled and disquieted with blustring winds, it casteth up mosse, reits, and fuch like weeds, (they fay) it is cleanted and purged thereby: but the diffolute, bitter, fcurrile, and foolish speeches, which anger sendeth out of the mind when it is turned upside down, first pollute and defile the speakers themselves, and fill them full of infamy, for that they be thought to have their hearts full of such ordure and filthinesse at all times; but the same lurketh there, untill that choler discovereth it: And therefore, they pay most deerely for their speech, the lightest matter of all others (as Platofaith) in that they fuffer this heavy and grievous punishment, to be held and reputed for malicious enemies, curied speakers, and ill-conditioned persons. Which I seeing and observing well enough, it falleth out that I reason with my selfe, and alwaies call to mind what a good thing it is in a feaver, but much better in a fit of choler, to have a tongue faire, even, and smooth: For in them that be fick of an ague, if the tongue be not fuch as naturally it ought to be, an ill figne it is, but not a cause of any harme or indisposition within. How beit if their tongues, who are angry, be once rough, foule, and running dissolutely at randome to absurd speeches, it casteth forth outragious and contumelious language, the very mother and work-mistris of irreconcileable enmity, and bewrayeth an hidden and secret maliciousnesse. As for wine, if a man drinke it, of it selfe undelayed with water, it putteth forth no fuch wantonnesse, no disordinate and lewd speeches, like to those that proceed of ire. For drunken talke serveth to make mirth, and to procure laughter rather than any thingelie: but words of choler are tempered with bitter gall and ran or. Moreover, he that fitteth filent at the table when others drinkemerrily is odious unto the company, and a trouble: whereas in choler there is nothing more decent and beleeming gravity, than to be quiet and fay nothing: according as Sappho doth admonish,

When furious choler once is up, Disperst and preaden brest, To keep the tongue then apt to barke,

And let it lie at rest.

The consideration of these things collected thus together serveth not only to take heed alwaies unto them that are libject to ire and therewith possessed, but also besides to know throughly the nature of anger: how it is neither generous or manuall, nor yet hath any thing in it that favoureth of wildome and magnanimity. Howbeit the common people interpret the turbulent nature thereof to be active and meet for action; the threats and menaces thereof, hardinesse and confidence, the peevish and froward unrulinesse to be fortitude and strength. Nay, some there be who would have the cruelty in it to be a disposition and dexterity to atchieve great matters; the implacable malice thereof to be constancy and firme resolution: the morofity and difficulty to be pleased, to be the hatred of firmand vice; howbeit herein they do not well, but are much deceived, for furely the very actions, motions, gestures, and countenance of cholerick perions do argue and bewray much basenesse and imbecility: which we may perceive not only in these brain-sick sits that they fall upon little children, and them pluck, twitch, and mifufe: flie upon poore filly women, and thinke that they ought to punish and beat their horses, hounds, and mules, like unto Ctesiphon that famous wrestler and professed champion, who stuck not to spurne and kick his mule; but also in their tyrannicall and bloudy murders, wherein their cruelty and bitternesse, which declareth their pusillanimity and base mind; their actions which shew their passions and their doings to others bewraying a fuffering in themselves, may be compared to the stings and bitings of those venemous expents which be very angry, exceeding dolorous, and burne most themselves when they do instict the greatell inflammation upon the patients and put them to most paine: For like as (welling is a symptome or accident following upon a great wound or hurt in the flesh: even so it is in the tenderest and foftest minds, the more they give place and yeeld unto dolour and passion, the more plenty of choler and anger they utter forth as proceeding from the greater weaknesse. By this you may see the reafon why women ordinarily be more waipish, curft and shrewd than men; sick folk more testy than those that are in health; old people more wayward and itoward than those that be in the flower and vigour of their yeares; and finally, such as be inadversity, and upon whom fortune frowneth, more prone to anger than those who prosper and have the world smiling upon them. The covetous mizer and pinching penny-father is alwaies most angry with his steward that layeth forth his money i the glutton is ever more displeased with his cook and caterer; the jealous husband quickly falleth out and brawleth with his wife; the vain-glorious foole is soonest offended with them that speake any thing amisse of him; but the most bitter and intolerable of all others are ambitious perlops in a city, who lay for high places and dignities, such also as are the heads of a faction in a fedition; which is a trouble and mischiefe (as Pindarus faith) conspicuous and honourable. Loe, how from that part of the mind which is wounded, grieved, suffereth most and especially upon infirmity and weaknesse, arrieth anger, which passion resembleth not (as one would have it) the sinews of the foule, but is like rather to their firetching foreines and spasmatick convulsions, when it fireineth and striveth overmuch in following revenge,

Well, the examples of evill things yeeld no pleasant sight at all, only they be necessary and profitable and for mine own part supposing the precedents given by those who have caried themselves gently and mildly in their occasions of anger, are most delectable, not only to behold, but also heare: I begin to contemne and despilethose that say thus:

To man thou hast done wrong : be sure At mans hand wrong for to endure, Down to the ground with him, pare not his coat, Spurne him, and fet thy foot upon his throat.

And other such words which serve to provoke wrath, and whet choler; by which some go about to remove anger out of the nursery, and womens chamber into the hall where men do fit and keep; but herein they do not well: For prowesse and fortitude according in all other things with justice, and going fellow-like with her me thinks is at strife and debate with her about meeknesse and mildnefle only, as if the rather became her and by right appertained unto her: For otherwhiles it hath been known, that the world men have gone beyond and furmounted the better. But for a man to erecta Trophee, and fet up a triumphall monument in his own foule against ire (with which as Heractive faith, the conflict is hard and dangerous: for what a man would have he buyeth with his life) it is an act of rare valour and victorious puissance, as having in truth the judgement of reason, for finews, tendons, and muicles to encounter and relift passions. Which is the cause that I study, and am defirous alwaies to read and gather the fayings and doings, not only of learned clarkes and Philosophers; who as our Sages and wille men fay, have no gall in them, but also and much rather of Kings, Princes Tyrants, and Potentates: As for example, such as that was of Antigonus, who hearing his fouldiers upon a time revilehim behind his pavilion, thinking that he heard them not, put forth his staffe from under the cloth unto them and said: A whorson knaves, could you not go a little farther off when you meant thus to raile upon us. Likewise when one Arcadian an Argive or Achean never gave over reviling of King Philip, and abusing him in most reproachfull termes, yea, and to give him warning

So far to flie untill he thither came Where no manknew nor heard of Philips rame.

And afterwards the man was feen (I know not how) in Macedonia; the friends and courtiers of King Philip were in hand with him to have him punished, and that in any wile he should not let him go and elcape: Philip contrariwife, having him on ein his hands, spake gently unto him, used him courteoufly, sending unto him in his lodging gifts and presents, and so tent him away. And after a certaine time he commanded those courtiers of purpose to enquire what words he gave out of him unto the Greeks: but when every one made report againe, and testified that he was become another man, and ceased not to speake wonderfull things in the praise of him; Lo (quoth Philip) then unto them: Am not I a better Physician than all you and can I not skill how to cure a fouletongued fellow? Another time at the great folemnity of the Olympian games, when the Greeks abused him with very bad language, his familiar friends about him laid they deserved to be sharply chastisted and punished for so miscalling and reviling him, who had been so good a benefactor of theirs: what would they do and say then (quoth he) if I should deale hardly by them and do them finewd turnes? Semblably, notable and excellent was the carriage of Pififrain to Thrafibulus: of King Porfenna to Matim, and of Magas to Philemon, who in a publike and frequent Theatre, had mocked and coffed at him in this manner:

Magas, there are some letters come Unto you from a King, But letter Magas none can read, Nor write for any thing.

Now it chanced afterwards that by a tempeth at fea he was cast upon the Port-towne Paratonium, whereof Magas was governour, and so fell into his hands, who did him no other harme, but commanded one of his guard or officers about him, only with his naked fword to touch his bare neck. and so gently to go his waies and do no more to him: mary afterwards, he sent unto him little bones for cock-all, and a pretty ball to play withall, as if he had been a child that had no witner discretion. and so sent him home againe in peace. King Ptolomeus upon a time gesting and scotling at a simple and unlearned Grammarian, asked him, who was the father of Peleus: I will answer you fir (quoth he) if you tell me first who was the father of Lague: This was a dry flout, and touched King Ptolomaus very neere, in regard of the meaneparentage from whence he was descended: whereat, all about the King were mightily offended, and thought it was too broad a jest and frumpe intollerable; But Proloment, if it be not feemly for a King to take and put up a fcome: furely, as little decent it is for his perion to give a fcome *

Alexander the great was more bitter and cruel (than otherwise his ordinary manner was to others) Towards Callifthenes and Clytus. But King Porus being taken prisoner by him in a battell, befought former wanting. that he would use him royally, or like a King. And when King Alexander demanded moreover what he had more to say, and what he would have else? No more (quoth he) for under this word Royally is comprised all. And therefore I suppose it is, that the Greeks call the King of the gods by the name of Milichini, that is to say, Mild and sweet as honey. And the Athenians named him Munatles, which is as much as, Ready to help and succour: For to punish and torment pertaineth to devils and the surrous fiends of hell: there is no celestiall, divine, and heavenly thing in it. And like as one said of King Philip, when he had rased and destroyed the City Olynthus: Yea marry, but he is not able to let up such another City in the place: Even 10, a man may well say unto Anger; Thou canst overthrow, demolish, marre, and pull down: but to reare and erect againe, to save, to pardon, and to endure be the properties of meeknesse, clemency, mildnesse patience, and moderation: they be the pirts (Isay) of Camillus, Metellus, Aristides, and Socrates: whereas to stick close unto the flesh, to pinch, prick, and bite, are the qualities of pismires; flies, and mice. Moreover and besides, when I look unto Revenge, and the manner thereof, I find for the most part, that if menproceed by way of choler, they miffe of their purpole: for commonly all the heat and defire of revenge is spent in biting of lips spnashing and grating of teeth, vaine running to and fro, in railing words with foolish threats and menaces among, that savour of no wir at all: By which meanes is fareth with them afterwards, as with little children in running of a race, who for feebleneffe being not able to hold out, fall down before they come unto the goale, whereunto they made such ridiculous and fooiish haste, And therefore in my conceit it was not an improper answer which a certaine Rhodian made unto one of the Lictours and Officers of a Roman Generall or Lord Protor, who with vvide mouth bauled at him, and made a glorious bragging and boafting. I paffe nor (quoth he) one voint what thou faieft: I care rather for that which he thinketh there, that faith nothing. In like manner, Sophocles, when he had brought in Eurypilus and Neoptolemus all armed, speaketh bravely in their commendation thus,

They dealt no threats in vaine, no taunts They made nor boafting words: But to't they went, and on their fields They laid on load with swords.

And verily, some barbarous nations there are who use to poison their swords, and other weapons of iron; but valour hath no need at all of the venom of choler, for dipped it is in reason and judgment; whereas whatfoever is corrupted with ire and fury, is brittle, rotten, and ease to be broken into peeces. Which is the reason that the Lacedamonians do aliay the choler of their souldiers, when they are fighting, with the melodious founds of flutes and pipes; whosemanner is also before they go to battell to in rince unto the Muies, to the end that their reason and right wits may remaine in them flill, and that they may have me thereof : yea, and when they have put their enemies to flight, they never purfue after nor follow the chare, but reclaime and hold their lurious anger within compasse, which they are able to weild and manage as they list; no lesse than these daggers or courtlaces which are or a meane fize and reasonable length. Contrariwise, anger harh been the cause that many thousands have come short of the execution of vengeance, and miscarried by the way. As for example, Cyrus and Pel-pidas the Thebane among the reft. But Agathocles endured patiently to heare himfeite reproached and reviled by those whom he besieged : and when one of them said: You Potter there? Heare you? Where will you have filver to pay your mercenary fouldiers and firangers their wages? He laughed againe, and made answer; Even out of this City when I have once for edit. Some there were also that mocked and scorned Antigonus from the very wals, and twitted him with his deformity and ill-favoured face. But he said no more than thus, Why! And I took myselsebesoreto have been very faire and well favoured. Now when he had won the town he fold in open port-fale those that had so flouted him, protefting withall unto them, that if from that it ne-forward they mocked him any more, he would tell their mafters of them, and call them to ac-

How to bridle Anger.

Moreover, I do see that hunters, yea, and orators also commit many faults in their choler. And Aristotle doth report, that the triends of Satyrus the Oratour, in one cause that he had to plead for them, flopped his eares with waxe, for feare lest that he, when he heard his advertaries to raile upon him in their pleas, should mar all in his anger. And do not (1 pray you) we our felves many times misse of punishing out servants by this meanes when they have done some faults: for when they heare us to threaten, and give out in our anger that we will do thus and thus unto them, they be so frighted that they run away far enough off from us. Like as Nurses therefore are wont to say unto their littlechildren, Cry not, and you shall have this or that so we shall do very well to speake unto our choler in this wile; make no such haste, soft and faire, keep not such a crying, make not so loud a noife be not fo eager and urgent upon the point: fo shall you see every thing that you would have, fooner done and much better. And thus a father, when he seeth his child going about to cut or cleave any thing with a knife or edge toole, taketh the toole or knife out of his hand, and doth it himselfe; even so he that doth take revenge out of the hands of choler, punisheth not himselfe but him that deserveth it and thus he doth furely, putting his own person in no danger, without damage and losse, nay, with great profit and commodity. Now, whereas all passions whatsoever of the mind had need of use and custome to tame (as it were) and vanquish by exercise that which in them is unruly, rebellious, and disobedient to reason: certes, in no one point besides had we need to be more exercised. (I meane as touching those dealings that we have with our houshold servants) than in anger: forthere is no envy and emulation that arifeth in us toward them, there is no teare that we need to have of them, neither any ambition that troubleth or pricketh us against them; butordinary and continuall fits of anger we have every day with them, which breed much offence and many errours, cauting us to tread awry, to flip and do amiffe fundry waies, by reason of that licentious liberty unto which we give our felves all the whiles that there is none to controll, none to flay, none to forbid and hinder us: and therefore being in fo ticklish a place, and none to sustaine and hold us up, soone we catch a fall, and come down at once. And a hard matter it is (I may say to you) when weate not bound to render an account to any one, in such a passion as this, to keep our selves uptight, and not to offend; unless we take order before-hand to reftrain and empale (as it were) round about to great aliberty with meeknefle and clemency unlesse (I say) we be well inured and acquainted to beare and endure many shrevvd and unhappy words of our vvives. much unkind language of friends and familiars, who many times do challenge us for being too remisse, over-gentle, yea, and altogether carelesse and negligent in this behalfe. And this in truth hath been the principall cause that I have been quick and sharpe untomy servants, for seare less they might prove the vvorse for not being chastised. But at the last, though late it vvere, I perceived; First, that better it vvas by longsufferance and indulgence to make them somewhat worse, than in seeking to reforme and amend others; to diforder and spoile my selfe with bitternesse and choler: Secondly, when I savv many of them oftentimes, even because they were not so punished, seare and shame to do evill, and how pardon and forgivenesse vvas the beginning of their repentance and conversion, rather than rigour and punishment; and that I assure you they would serve some more willingly with a nod or winke of the eye, and vvithout a word spoken. than others with all their beating and whipping: I was at last persivaded in my mind and resolved, that reason was more worthy to command and rule as a master than ire and vyrath. For true it is not that the Poet saith:

Where ever is feare. Shame also is there:

But cleane contrary: Look who are bashfull and ashamed; in them there is imprinted a certaine fearethat holdeth them in good order: vyhereas continuall bearing and laying on vyithout mercy, breedeth not repentance in fervants for evill doing, but rather a kind of forecast and providence, how they should not be spied not taken in their evill doing. Thirdly, calling to remembrance, and considering evermore with my selfe, that he who taught us to shoot forbad us not to draw a bow, orto shoot an arrow, but to misse the marke: no more will this be any let or hinderance, but that we may chaltife and punish our servants, if we be taught to do it in time and place, with moderatiwe may that the profitably and de ently, as it appertaineth. And verily 1 do enforce my felfe, and firite to mafter my choler and subdue it principally, not denying unto them who are to be punished, the liberty and means to justifie themselves, but in hearing them to speake what they can for their excuse. For as time and space doth in the meane time find the passion occupied another way, and withall bring a certaine delay, which doth flack and let down (as it were) the vehemency and violence thereof; to judgement of reason, all the while meeteth both with a decent manner, and also with a convenient meane and measure of doing punishment accordingly. And besides, this course and manner of proceeding, leaveth him that is punished no canse, occasion, or pretence at all to refift and frive againe, confidering that he is chaffiled and corrected not in choler and anger, but being first convinced, that he had well deserved his correction: and (which were yet worle than all the relt) the servant shall not have vantage to speake more justly and to better reason than his maflet, Well then, like as Phocion after the death of Alex ander the Great, having a care not to suffer the Athenians to rife over-foone, or make any infurrection before due time, ne yet to give credit rashlyunto the news of his death: My Masters of Athens (quoth he) if he be dead to day, he will be dead to morrow also, and three daies hence too; even so should a man (in my opinion) who by the impulsion and instigation of anger maketh haste to take punishment, thus suggest and secretly say to himlelfe: If this lervant of mine hath made a fault to day, it will be as true to morrow, and the next day after that he hath done a fault; neither will there be any harme or danger at all come of it, if he chance to be punished with the latest : but beleeve me, if he be punished over-soone, it will be alwaies thought that he had wrong, and did not offend: a thing that I have known to happen full often. For which of usall is to curst and cruell, as to punish and icourge a servant for burning the roast five or ten daies ago? Or for that so long before he chanced to overthrow the table? Or was somewhat with the flowest in making answer to his Master Or did his errand or other businessenot so soon as he should? And yet we see these and such like be the ordinary causes for which (whiles they be iresh and new done) we take on we stampe and stare, we chase, we frown, we are implacable and vviil heare of no pardon: And no marvell, for like as any bodies feeme bigger through a mist; even so every thing appeareth greater than it is through anger. And therefore at these and such like faults we should winke for the time, and make as though we say them not, and yet thinke upon them neverthelesse, and beare them in mind. But afterwards when the storme is well overblown, we are without passion, and do not suspect our selves, then we may do well to confider thereof: and then if upon mature deliberation, when our mind is staid and our senses setled, the thing appeare to be naught, we are to hate and abhor it, and in no wife either to for-let and put off, or altogether to omit and forbeare correction, like as they refule meats who have no stomack nor appetite to eate. For certainly it is not a thing so much to be blamed for to punish one in anger, as not to punish when anger is past and allayed, and so to be retchlesse and disolute: doing as idle mariners who so long as the sea is calme, and the weather faire loyter within the harbour or haven but a terwards when a tempest is up, spread sailes and put themselves into danger. For even so we, condemning and neglecting the remissenesse and calmenesse of reason in case of punishment, make halte to execute the fame during the hear of choler, which no doubt is a bluffring and turbulent wind. As for meathe calleth for it indeed, and taketh it naturally who is a hungry: but surely he executeth punishment best, who neither hungreth nor thirsteth afterit: neither hath he need to use choler as a fauce or dainty dish for to get him a stomack and appetite to correct: but even when he is farthest off from defire of revenge, then of necessity he is to make use of reason and wildome to direct him : for we ought not to do as Aristotle writeth in his timethe manner was in Tuskane; To whip fervants with found of flutes and hautboies; namely, to make a sport and passime of punishing men and to solace our selves with their punishment for pleasures sake, and then afterwards when we have done repent us of it: for as the one is brutish and beast-like; so the other is as womanish and unmanly: but without griefe and pleasure both, at what time as reason and judgement is in force, we ought to let justice take punishment, and leave no occasion at all for choler to get advantage. But peradventure some one willfay, that this is not properly the way to remedy or cure anger; but rather a putting by our precaution that we should not commit any of those faults which ordinarily follow that passion: Unto whom I answer thus; That the swelling of the Spleene is not the cause, but a symptome or accident of a seaver: howbeit if the said humour be sallen, and the pain mitigated the feaver will be much ealed, according as Hieronymu faith. Allo, when I confider by what meanes choler is engendred: I fee that one falleth into it upon this caule, another upon that: but in all of them it feemeth this general opinion there is, that they thinke themselves to be despised and naught set by. And therefore we ought to meet with such as seem to defend and maintaine themselves, as being angry for just cause, and to cure them after this manner; namely, by diverting and removing from them as far as ever we can, all suspition of contempt and contumacy in those that have offended them and moved their anger; in laying the fault upon inconfiderate folly, necessity, sicknesse, infirmity and misery, as Sophocles did in these verses,

How to bridle Anger.

And unto him rich gifts for to present.

For to beseech and intreat, are signes of a man that despiteth not, and when the party who hathgiven often e becommeth humble and lowly, he removeth all the opinion that might be conceived of contempt. But he that is in a fit of choler must not attend and wait untill he see that, but rather heip himielse with the answer of Diogenes. These fellowshere, said one unto him, do deride thee Diegenes; but I (quoth he againe) do not find that I am derided; even so ought a man who is angry not to be periwaded that he is contemned of another, but rather that himselfe hath just cause to contemie him, and to thinke that the fault committed did proceed of infirmity, errour, headyrashnesse, sloth and idienesse, a base and illiberall mind, age or youth. And as for our servants and riends we must by all means quit them hereof, or pardon them at leastwise: For surely they cannot be thought to contemne us, in regard that they think usunable to be revenged, or men of no execution if we went about it: but it is either by reason of our remissenesse and mildnesse, or else of our love and affection that we feem to be finally regarded by them, whiles our fervants prefume of our tractable nature, case to be pacified, and our friends of our exceeding love that cannot be foon shaken off. But now we are provoked to anger, not only against our wives, or servitors and friends, as being contemned by them; but also many times in our choler we fall upon Inn-keepers, Mariners and Muliters, when they be drunk, supposing that they defpife us. And that which moreis, we are offended with dogs when they bay or barke at us; and with affes if they chance to fling out and kick us. Like unto him who lifted up his hand to ftrike and beat him that did drive an affe; and when the man cried that he was an Athenian: But thou I am sure art no Athenian, (quoth he to the affe) and laid upon the poore beaft as hard as he could, and gave him many a blow with his cudgell. But that which chiefly causeth us to be angry, and breedeth a continual disposition thereto in our minds, causing us so often to breake out into fits of choler, which by little and little was ingenered and gathered there before, is the love of our own felves, and a kind of froward furlineffe headily to be pleased together with a certaine daintipelle and delicacy, which all concurring in one, breed and bring forth a swarme (as it were) of bees, or rather a waspes neast in us. And therefore there cannot be a better means for to carry our selves middly and kindly towards our wives, our services of the control vants familiars, and friends, than a contented mind, and a finglenefle or simplicity of heart, when a man resteth satisfied with whatsoever is present at hand, and requireth neither things superfluous nor exquisite.

But he that never is content With roft or fodsbut Cooke is fhent: How ever he be serv'd, I meane With more with lefferor in a meane: He is not plea'sd nor one goodword Can give of viands fet on boord Without Some Snow who drinks no draught, Nor eateth bread inmarket bought, Whotasts no meate, be't never fo good, Serv'd up in dish of earth or wood: And thinkes no bed nor pillow soft, Unlesse with down like sea alost Stir dfrom beneath, it strut and swell;

For otherwise he sleeps not well.
Who with rods and whips plieth and hastneth the servitors at the table, making them to run untill they (weat againe, crying and bawling at them to come away apace, as if they were not carry-ing diffnes of meat but platters and cataplasmes for some inflammation or painful impostume: subjefting himselse after a flavish manner to a servile kind of dier and life, full of discontenument, quarrels and complaints: little knoweth such an one how by a continual cough, or many concustions and diffemperatures, he hath brought his foule to an ulcerous and rheumatike disposition about the feat and place of anger. And therefore we must use the body by frugality to take up and learne to becontent with a competent meane (forafmuch as they who defire but a little can never be difappointed nor frustrate of much sinding no fault, nor keeping any sit at the beginning about meat, but standing satisfied without saying a word, with that which God sendeth whatsoever it be, not fretting, vexing, and tormenting our selves at the table about every thing, and in so doing, serving both our felves and our company about us of friends, with the most unlavory messe of meat, that is to wit, choler:

A supper worse than this I do not see How possibly one can devised be.

Namely, whiles the servants be beaten, the wife chidden and reviled for the meat burnt, for smoke in the parlor, for want of salt, or for the bread over-stale and drie. But Arcessland upon a time with other friends of his, feasted certain strangers and hosts of his abroad, whole guest he had been; and after the supper was come in, and meat set upon the board, there wanted bread, by reason that his servants had forgotten and neglected to buy any: for such a fault as this, which of us here would not have cryed our that the walles should have burst withall, and been ready to have throwne the house out of the window? And he laughing at the matter. He had need be a wise man (quoth he) I fee well, that would make a feast and set it out as it should be. Socrates also upon a time, when he came from the wreftling school, took Euthydemus home with him to supper: but Xanti ppe his wife fell a chiding and scoulding with him at the board, reviling him with most birter tearms to long, until at last in an anger down went table and all that was upon it: Whereupon Enthydemus a role, and was about to depart; but Socrates: Will you be gone (quoth her) Why, do you and did as much for you? and yet were we not offended nor angry for the matter. And in very truth, we must entertein our friends and guests, with courtesie, mi.th, a smiling countenance, and affectionate love: and not to brow-beat them, nor yet put the servicors in a fright, and make them quake and tremble with our frowning looks. Also we ought so to accustome our selves, that we may be content to be served with any kind of vessels what soever, and not upon a daintinesse to have may be content to be rerved with any kind of veries with all indifferently. And yet there be some io divers, that although there be many cups and globlets standing upon the board, choose one from the rest, and cannot drink for footh but out of that one: according as the Stories do report of Marius, who 'veed one mazar, and could drink out of no other. Thus they do by their oil cruets and currying combs or rubbers, when they are at the bains or flouphes, taking a fancy and affection to some one above the rest but if it chance that one of them be crackt, broken, or belost and miscarry any way; then they are exceeding angry and fall to beating of their fervants. Such men therefore as finde then they are executing argy and fair to accomp or the more and exquisite things, to wir, porse them elves to be cholerick, should do well to forbear all rare and exquisite things, to wir, porse cups, leal-rings of excellent workmanship and precious stones. For that such costly jewels, if they be marred or lost, breed more anger and set men out of order, more than those which be ordinated to the control of t ry and eafe to be come by. And therefore when New the Emperour had caufed to be made a certain pavilion or tabernacle eight square, which was both for the beauty and cost, exceeding fair and sumptuous, and indeed an admirable piece of work. In this Tabernacle (quoth Seneca) unto him, you have bewrayed O Cafar, that you are but a poor man: for if you lofe this once, you shall never be able to recover and get the like again. And so it fell out indeed, for the ship, wherein the same Tabernacle was, chanced to be cast away upon the Sea, and all was drowned. But Nero calling to minde the words of Seneca, took the losse more

Moreover, this contentment of mind, and easinesse to be pleased with any thing in the house, causeth a manalioto be more gentle, milde, and better contented with his servants and people about him: now if it work this effect in us toward our houshold servants, evident it is that we shall be likewile affected to our friends and those that be under our government. We see also, that flaves new bought, are inquisitive as touching him who hath bought them; not whether he be superstitious and envious; but whether be be cholerick and hasty or no. And to be brief 3 neither can husbands endure the pudicity and honesty of their wives; nor wives the love of their husbands; ne yet friends the mutuall convertation one with another, if there do an angry and cholerick humor go withall. Thus we see, that neither marriage nor amity be tollerable with choler. Contrariwise, if anger be away, even drunkennesses it self is tollerable and we can easily abide it: for the very ferula of god Bacchus is a sufficient punishment of drunkennesse, if so be there be no choler therewith which may cause Baschus, that is, Strong wine, in stead of Lyeu and Cherius, That is to fay, The Loofer of cares, and Leader of daunces (which are his furnames) to be call ed Omester and Manates, which signifie Cruell and Furious, As for simple madnesse of it self alone, the Elibore growing in Anteira, is sufficient to cure but if it be mingled with choler, it causeth Tragical sits, and thole so strange, that a man would repute them for meer fables. And therefore we must not give place to anger neither in sport and pastime; for in lieu of good will it breedeth enmity: nor in conference and disputations; for it turneth the love and defire of knowledge in debate and contentions nor in deciding and judging causes; because to authority it addeth violence and insolency: nor in the teaching and instruction of our childrens for it maketh them desperate and haters of learning nor in prosperity; for it encreaseth the envy and grudge of men: ne yet in adversity, because it taketh away pitty and compassion, when they who are fallen in any misfortune, shew themselves testie, froward and quarrellous to those who come to moan and mourn with them. This did Priamus, as we read in Homer:

> Avant (quoth he) you chiding guifts, you odious mates be gone: Have you no forrowes of your own, But you come me to moan?

On the other fide, fair conditions and milde behaviour, yeeldeth fuccour and helps in some cases; composeth and ordereth matters aright in others; dulceth and allayeth that which is tart and fowrerand in one word, by reason of that kinde, meek and gentle quality, it overcometh anger and all waiward retitinesse whattoever. Thus it is reported of Enclide's in a quarrell or variance between him and his brother: For when his brother had contested and said unto him? I would't might die, if he not revenged of thee he inferred again; Nay, let me die for it, if I perswade thee not otherwise before I have dones by which one word he presently won his brothers heart, so that he changed his mind and they parted friends, Polemon likewise, at a certain time; when one who loved precious tiones, and was sick for fair and costly rings and such like curious jewels; did rail at him outragious; answered not a word again, but looked very wissly upon one of the signess that the other had, nd well considered the salinon and workmanship thereof: which when the party perceived, taring as it should seem no small constement; and being very well pleased that he so perused his jewell; Not so Polemon (quoth he again) but look his obisticitus, between you and the light, and then you. will think it much more beautiful. Artisippus sell out upon arime (I know not how) with Assessing and was sin a great choler and fit of anger: How now Artisipus (quoth one who heard him so had and a sin a great choler and fit of anger: How now Artisipus (quoth one who heard him so had a sin a great choler and fit of anger: How now Artisipus (quoth he where I will waken it a non. With that he feets cole to Assessing a shall aid: Think youme founhappy every way and incurable, that I deserved not one admonishment at your hands? No marvells (quoth Assessing ain) if I thought you (who for natural wit and all things elie excellme) to see better in this case also than I, what is meer and expedient to be done. For true it is that the Poer faith;

The boar fowilde whose neck with bristles strong Is thick beset, the tender hand and soft Of woman usice, yea, and of orthantyong, By stroking farre, shall bendand time (full of) Much sooner fare, and that with greater case Than we sters frong with all their force and pesse

Much foner farre, and hat with greater case.

Than we filters firong with all their force and peife.

Than we filters from with all their force and peife.

And we our felves can skill how to tame wilde beafts, we know how to make yong wolves gentle, yee and lions whelps other-whiles we carry about with its in our armestbut see, how we again attendards in a raging fit of choler be ready to fling from us and cast out of our fight, our own children, our friends and familiars and all our houshold servains, and our fellow-citizens and neighbours, we sir loose our tre like some say age and unious beast, and this rage of ours we disguise and cloak for footh with a colourable and false name, calling it Hatrest of vice. But herein (I suppose) we do no otherwise than in the rest of our passions and diseases of the minde: tearning one. Providence and forest disanother Liberality; and a third Piety and religious and yet for all these pretentes of goodly sames, we cannot be cured of the vices which they palliare it owir. I improminess, Prodigality and

And verily, like as our naturall feed (as Zeno faid) is a certain mixture and composition, derived and extracted from all the powers and faculties of the foul; even for in mine opinion, a man may fay that choler is a a miscellane seed (as it were) and a dredge, made of all the passions of the mind: for plucked it is from pain, pleasure and insolent violence: Of envieit hath this quality to joy in the harnes of other men: it standeth much upon murder, but worse it is simply than murder; for the withfull perion striveth and laboureth not to defend and save himself from taking harm; but so he may milchief and overthrow another, he careth not to come by a hurt and shrewd turn himself. It holderhlikewise of concupiscence and lust, and taketh of it the worse and more unpleasant part, in cale it be (as it is indeed) a defire and appetite to grieve, vex, and harm another. And therefore when we approch and come neer to the house of luxurious and riotous persons, we hear betimes in the morning a minitrel-wench, founding and playing the Morrow-watch by break of day: we fee the muddy-grounds and dregs(as one was wont to fay) of the wine, to wit, the vomits of those who tashup their stoma ks: we behold the pieces and fragments of broken garlands and chapless and at the dore we find the lackies and pages of them who are within, drunken and heavy in the head with tipling strong wine. But the fignes that tell where hasty, cholerick, and angry persons dwell, appear in the faces of their fervants, in the marks and weales remaining after their whipping, and in their clogs, yeons, and fetters about their feet. For in the houses of hasty and angry men, a man shall never hear but one kind of musick; that is to say, the heavy note of wailing grones and piteons plaints; whiles either the flewards within are whipped and scourged, or the maidens racked and put to torture, in such fort that you would pitty to see the dolors and pains of yre which the suffereth in thosethings that she lusteth after and taketh pleasure in. And yet as many of us as happen to be truly and justily surprised with choler oftentimes, for the hatred and detestation that we have of vices, ought to cut off that which is excessive therein and beyond measure, together with our over-light beleef and credulity of reports concerning such as converse with us: For this is one of the causes that most of all doth engender and augment choler; when either he whom we took for an honest man proveth dishonest, and is detected for some naughtinesse, or whom we reputed our friend is fallen into some quarrel and variance with us: as for my felf, you know my nature and di position, what small occasi ons make me both to love men effectually, and also to trust them confidently, and therefore (just as it falleth out with them who go over a false floor where the ground is not fast, but hollow under their feet) where I lean most and put my greatest trust for the love that Abear, there I offend most and soonest catch a fall: there (Isay) am I grieved most also, when I see how I was deceived: As for that exceeding inclination and forwardness of mind, thus to love and affect a man, could I never yet to this day wean my felf from, so inbred it is and fetled in me: mary to flay my felf from giving credit over-haltily and too much. I may peradventure use the shidle which Plato speaketh of, to wit, wary circumspection: for in recommending the Mathematician Helicons, I praise him (quoth he) for a man, that is much to say, as a creature by nature mutable & aptrochange. And even those who have been well brought in up in a city, to wit, in Athems, he faith that he is a straid likewise of them, left being men, and coming from the seed of man, they do not one time or other bewray the weaknesse and infirmity of humane nature: and Sophosles when he speak-

Who lift to fearch through all deeds of mankind More bad then good he shall be sure to find,

feemeth to clip our wings, and difable us wonderfully. Howbeit this difficulty and caution in judging of men and pleafing our felves in the choice of iriends, will caule us to be more trackable and moderate in our anger: for whatfoever cometh fodainly and unexpected, the same foon transporteth us beside our selves. We ought moreover as Panatius teacheth us in one place to practile the example of Anaxagoras, and like as he faid when newes came of his fons death; I know well (quoth he) that I begat him a mortal man; so in every fault of our servants or others that shall whetten our choler, each one may fing this note to himself: I knew well that when I bought this slave, he was not a wise Philosopher: I wist also that I had gotten for my friend not one altogether void of affections and passions: neither was I ignorant when I tooka wife, that I wedded a woman. Now if withall a man would evermore when he feeth others do amisse, adde this more unto the dittie as Plato teacheth us, and fing thus: Am not I also such an other? turning the discursion of his judgement from things abroad, to those which are within himself, and among his complaints and reprehensions of other men, come in with a certain caveat of his own, and sear to be reproved himself in the like; he would not haply be to quick and forward in the hatred and deterlation of other mens vices, feeing that himself hath to much need of pardon. But on the contrary fide, every one of us, when he is in the heat of choler and punisheth another, hath these words of severe Aristides and precise Cato ready enough in his mouth: Steal not Sirrha: Make no more lies: Why art thou so idle then? &c. To conclude (that which of all others is most unseemly and absurd) we reproving in anger others for being angry; and fuch faults as were committed in choler, those our selves will punish in choler; not verily as the Physicians use to do, who

A bitter medicine in the body pour, When bitter choler they mean to purge and scour.

But we rather do encrease the same with our bitternesse, and make more trouble than it was before. And therefore when I think and discourse with my self of these matters, I endeavour withall and assay to cut off somewhat from needlesse curiosty. For surely this narrow searching and streight looking into every thing, for to spie and, find out a sault; as for example to sist thy servant and call him into question for all his idle houres; to prie into every action of thy friend; to see where about thy sonnegoeth, and how he spendeth all his time; to listen what whispering there is between thy wise and another, be the very means to breed much anger, daily brauls, and continual jarres, which grow in the end to the height of curstnesse and frowardnesse, hard to be pleased with any thing whatsoever. For according as Euripides saith in one place, we ought in some fort to do:

All great affairs God ay himfelf directeth, But matters (mall to Fortune he committeth.

Formine own part, I do not think it good to commit any bufiness to Fortune; neither would I have a man of understanding to be retchlesse in his own occasions: But with some things to put his wife in trust; others to make over unto servants, and in some matters to use his friends. Herein to bear himself like a Prince and great Commander, having under him his Deputies, Governours, Receivers, Auditors, and Procurators; releaving unto himself and to the disposition of his own judgement, the principall affairs, and those of greatest importance. For like as little letters or a small print do more offend and trouble the eyes then greater, for that the eyes be very intentive upon them even fo, imall matters do quickly move choler, which thereupon foon getteth an ill custome in weightier matters. But above all, I ever reckon that faying of Empedocles to be a divine precept and heavenly oracle, which admonishes us To fast from sin. I commended also these points and observations, as being right honest, commendable, and befeeming him, that maketh profession of wisdome and philosophie, which we use to vow unto the gods in our prayers: Namely. To forbear both Wire and Women, and so to live sober and chaste a whole yeer together, and in the mean while to serve God with a pure and undefiled heart: Also, to limit and set out a certain time, wherein we would not make a lie observing precisely no to speak any vain and idle word, either in earnest or in bourd. With these and such like observations also, I acquainted and surnished my soul, as being no lesse affected to religion and godlines, than studious of learning and philosophie: Namely, first enjoyned my self to passea certainsew Holy-dayes without being angry, or offended upon any occasion whatsoever; no leffethan I would have vowed to forbear drunkennesse, and abstain altogether from wine, as if I sacrificed at the feast Nephalia [wherein no wine was spent] or celebrated the solemnity Melisponda, [in which Hony onely was used,] Thus having made an entrance; I tried afterwards a moneth or two by little and little what I could do, and ever I gained more and more time, exercising my self fill to forbear sinne with all my power and might. Thus I proceeded and went forward daily, bleffung my felf with good words and striving to be milde, quiet and void of malice, pure and clean from evill speeches and lewed deeds: but principally from that passion which for a little pleasure, and the same not very lovely, bringeth with it great troubles and shamefull repentance in the end. Thus with the grace of God, affilling me somewhat (as I take it) in this good resolution and course ofmine, experience it felt approved and confirmed my first intent and judgement, whereby I was taught, That this mildnefte, clemency, and debonair humanity, is to none of our familiars who live and converse daily with us, so sweet, so pleasant, and agreeable, as to our selves who have these vertues and good qualities within us.

Of Curiofity.

The Summary.

THE former Treatife hath showed unto us, how many mischiefs and inconveniences Anger causeth, teaching to the means how to beware of it. Now Plutatch dealeth with another vice, no lesse dangerous than it, which bendeth to the opposite extremity. For whereas ire doth so bereave a man of the use ofreason during the accesse and fit thereof, that the cholericke and furious persons differ not one from another, but in the space of time. This curiosity which is now in hand, being marked under the name of wise-dome and hability of sprit, ii (to say a trueth) a covert and hidden sury, which carrieth the minde of the curious person past himself, for to gather and heap from all parts the ordere and filthinesse of another, and rious person pass complet), you to gaussi and to make thereof a very flore-house, for to insect his afterwards to brong the same into himself, and to make thereof a very flore-house, the follies, backhiting, and wow selfsfirst, and then others, according as the malignity and malice, the follies, backhiting, and slanders of these curious folk do sufficiently declare. To the end therefore that every man who loveth vertue, should divert from such a maladie, our Author sheweth that the principall remedie for to preserve su from it, istoturn this curiosity to our own selves; namely, to examine our own persons more diligently than others. Which point he amplifieth by setting down on the contrary side, the blindnesse of those who are over-busic and curious. Then cometh he to declare, why a curious person goeth forth alwayes out of his own boufe for to enter into another mans; to wit, because of his own filthinesse, which by that means the capitant finell and perceive; but whiles the will neede go to firre and rake instathe life of others, he [neverh and entangleth himself and so perspect his his own folly and indiscretion. Afterwards proceeding to prescribe the remedies for the cure of cursofit, when he had deciphered the villanies and indignities thereof, together with the nature of curious persons, and the enormous vices which accompanie them, he requires hat our hands, that we should not te desireus to know things which be wile, bale, I wad on unpossibile; that we should hold in our eyer, and not cast them at random and aventure within the house of another; that we should not seek after the bruit and rumours that are spread in meetings and companies; that we otherwhiles should for bear even such things, whereof the use is lawfull and permitted: also to take heed that we do not enter nor found too deep into our own affairs; Finally, not to berash and heady in those things that we do be they never so small. All these points premised, he adorneth with industions ssimi-litudes and choise examples, and knitteth up all with one conclusion, which proveth, that eurious solk. ought to be ranged among the most mischievous and dangerous in the world.

Of Curiofity.

HE best way haply it were alrogether to avoid an house and not therein a all to dwell, which is close without fresh air, dark, standing bleak & cold, or otherwise unhealthful Howbeit, if a man by reason that he hath been long used to such an house, delight in that seat, and will there abide, he may either by altering the prospects and removing the lights, or by changing the staires into another place, or elie by opening the dores of one side, and shutting them upon another, make the house more lightsome, better exposed to the wind for to receive fresh air, and in one word more wholiome than before. And verily fome have much amended whole cities by the like alterations: asfor example, men tay that one Charon in times past turned my native City and Place of nativity Charonea to lie Eastward, which before looked toward the Western wind Zepharus, and received the Sunne fetting from the mount Parnaffus. And Empedocles the natural Philosepher, by stopping up the mouth or deep chink of a certain mountain between two rocks, which breathed out a notiome and petitient fouthern wind upon all the champian countrey and plain underneath, was thought to have put by the plague, which by occasion of that wind reigned ordinarily before in that Country. Now for a fruich as there be certain hurtfull and pestifer ous pasfions, which fend up into our foul tempestuous troubles and darknesse, it were to be wished. that they were chased out quite, and throwne down to the very ground; whereby we might give our selves a free prospect, and open and cleer light, a fresh and pure air; or if we be not so happy, yet at least wife endeavour, we ought by all means possible to change, alter, translate, tra pole and turn them fo about, as they may be found more fit and commodious to ferve our rurnes. As for example, and to go no farther for the matter, Curiofity, which Itake to be a defire to know the faults and imperfections in other men, is a vice or dilease which seemeth not cleer of envie and maliciousnesse: And unto him that is injected therewith may very well be faid, avert thineeyes a little from things without, and turn thy much medling and curiofity to those that be within. If thou take to great a pleasure and delight to deal in the Knowledge and Historie of evill matters, thou hast work enough iwis at home, thou shalt finde plenty thereof within to occupie thy felf;

Most spightfull and envious man, why doeft thou ever finde With piercing eyes thy neighbours faults, and in thine own art blinde?

For look what water run's along an Ifthm or Ifte we fee, Or leaves lie spred about the Oke, which numbred cannot be ;

Such a multitude shalt thou finde of finnes in thy life, of passions in thy soul, and of oversights in thy duties. For like as Xenophon faith, That good flewards of an houshold have one proper room by it felf for those utenfils or implements which serve for sacrifice; another for vessels that come to the table; in one place he layeth up the instruments and tools for tillage and husbandry, and in another apart from the rest, he besto weth weapons, armour, and surniture for the wars; even so shalt thou see within thy self a number of manifold vices how they are digested : some proceeding from envie, others from jealousies some from idlenesse, others from nigardise take account of these (I advisethee) survey and pursue them over well: shut all the dores and windowes that yeeld prospect unto thy neighbours: itop up the avenues that give accesse and passage to Curiosity: But set open all other doors that lead into thine own bed-chamber, and other lodgings for men, into thy wives cabinet and the nurfery, into the rooms where thy fervants keep: There shalt thou meet wherewith to amuse and busie thy self: there may curiosity and defire to know every thing be employed in exercises, neither unprofitable nor malicious: nay, in such as be commodious, wholsome and tending to salvation: namely, whiles every one calleth himself to account, saying Wherehave I been, what good I have done, or what have I misdone? Where have I flipt, what duty begun is left by me undone?

But now according as fables make report: that Lamia the Witch whiles she is at home is stark blind, and doth nothing but fing, having her eyes shut up close within a little boxe; but when she means to go abroad, the takes them forth, and fetteth them in their right place, and feeth well enough with them; even to, every one of us when wego forth, fet unto that evill meaning and intention which we have to others, an eye to look into them, and that is curiofity and overmuch medling; but in our own errors, faults and trespasses we stumble and fail through ignorance, as having neither eyes to see, nor light about them whereby they may be seen. And therefore it is, that a busic fellow and curious medler doth more good to his enemies than to himself; for their faults he discovereth and bringerh to light, to them he sheweth what they ought to beware of; and what they are to amend but all this while he overfeeth, or rather feeth not the most things that are done at home, fo deeply amused he is and busie in spying what is a misse abroad. Howbeit wise Mysses would not abide to speak and confer with his own mother, before he had enquired of the Prophet those things for which he went down into hell; and when he had once heard them, then he turned to his mother and other women also, asking what was Tyro? what was Chloris? and what was the occafion and cause that Eperaste came by her death?

Who knit her neck within a deadly string,

And so from beam of lof, y house did king.

But we quite contary, sitting still in supine idlenesse and ignorance, neglecting and never regarding that which concerneth our lelves, go to learch into the genealogie and pedigrees of others; and we can tell readily, that our neighbours grandfather was no better then a base and servile Syrian; that his nurse came out of barbarous Thracia; that such an one is in debt, and oweth three talents, and is behind hand besides, and in arrerages for non-paiment of interest for the nse thereof. Inquisitive also we are in such matters as these: From whence came such a mans wife what it was that such a one and such a one spake when they were alone together in an odde corner? Soerates was clean of another quality; he would go up and down enquiring and casting about what were the reasons wherewith Pythagoras perswaded men to his opinion. Aristippus likewile, at the folemnity of the Olympian games, falling into the company of I schomachas, asked of him, what were the periwafions that Socrates used to yong tolk, wereby they became so affectionate unto him; and after he had received from him some imali teeds (as it were) and a few samples of those reasons and arguments, he was so moved and passionate therewith, that presently his body sell away, he looked pale, poor and lean, untill he having failed to Athens in this wonderfull thirst and ardent heat, had drunk his fill at the fountain and well-head it felf, known theman, heard his discourses and learned his Philolophie; the summe and effect whereof was this: That a man should first know his own maladies, and then the means to be cured and delivered of them. But some there be, who of all things cannot abide to see their own life, as being unto them the most unpleasant sight of all others neither love they to bend and turn their reason as a light to their own selves : but their minde being sull of all forts of evill, fearing and ready to quakefor to behold what things are within, leapeth forth (as one would say out of doors, and goeth wandring to and tro fearching into the deeds and words of other men, and by this means feedeth and fatteth (as it were)her own malicious naughtinesse. For like as a hen many times having meat enough within house set before her, loveth togo into some corner, and there keepeth a pecking and scraping of the ground, even so these busic Polypragmons, passing by those ordinary speeches and matters which are exposed and open for every maninot regarding (I say) the reports and narrations which are free for each one to discourse of, and which neither any man hath to do, to forbid and warn them for to ask and enquire of, nor will be displeased if peradventure he should be demanded and asked the question of them, goup and down in the mean time to gather and learn all the fecret and hidden evils of every houle. Cerres, a prety answer it was of an Ægyptian, and pertinent to the purpose, who when one asked him, what it was that he carried covered all over, and so enwrapped within a cloth: Mary (quoth he) covered it is even for this caute that thou shouldelt not know what it is: And choulikewile, that art fo busie, why dost thou intermedle in that which is concealed? Be sure, that if there were no evilltherein, kept cloie it should not be. And verily, it is not the manner and custome for any body to enter boldly into the house of another man, without knocking at the door, for which purpole we nie potters in theie dayes; whereas in old time there were rings and hammers which ferved the ourn, and by rapping at the gates, gave warning to those within, to the end that no stranger might meet the mistress at unawares in the hall or mids of the honse; or come suddenly upon a virgin or youg damofel her daughter, and find her out of her chamber; or take tome of the fervants a bearing, or the wenches and chambermaids chiding and footlding aloud: whereas a bune fellow lovetha life to flep secretly into a house, for to see and hearingh disorders; and you shall never know him willingly to come and see an honest house and well governed (though one should call and pray him never (o fair,) but ready he is to discover and set abroad in the view of the whole world such things for which we use locks, keies, bolts, barres, portals and gate houses. Those windes (faith Ariston) are wemost troubled and offended with, which drive open our cloaks and garments that cover us, or blow and whisk them over our heads: but buse Posypragmons do lay abroad and display not the cloaks of their neighbours nor their coats; but discover their walls, fet wide open their doors, and like a wind, pierce, creepe and enter fotarre, asto the tender bodied and foft skinned maiden, searching and inquiring in every bacchanall, in all dancings, waking and night feafts, for some matter to raise flanders of her. And as one Cleon was noted by an old Comicali Poet upon the Stage,

To finde perhaps one filly barley corn As she was wont and dung hillheretoforn;

Whose hands were both in Actolie, But heart and minde in Clopidie;

Even of the spirit of a curious and busie person, is at one time in the stately palace of rich and mighty men, in the little houles of mean and poor folk, in Kings Courts, and in the bed-chamber of new wedded wives; it is inquisitive in all matters, searching aswell the affaires of strangers and travellers, as negotiations of Lords and Rulers, and other-while not without danger of his own person. For much like as if a man upon a kindle of wenton curiofity, will needs be tasting of Aconite or Libard-bain, to know (forfooth) the quality of it, cometh by a mischief, and dieth of it before he can know any thirrestiereof. for they that love to be prying into the faults of great persons, many times overthrow themselves before they come to any knowledge. For such as cannot be content with the abundant raies and radiant beams of the Sunne which are spread so clear over all things, but will needs firive and force themselves impudently to look full upon the circle of his body, and audaciously will presume and venture to pierce his brightnesse, and enter into the very mids of his inward light, commonly dazzle their eyes, and become stark blind. And therefore well and properly aniwered Philippides the Writer of Comedies upon a time when King Lyfimachus fpake thus unto him: What Wouldest thou have me to impart unto thee of my goods, Philippides? What it pleaseth your Majesty (quoth he) so it be nothing of your secters. For to say a truth, the most pleasant and beautifull things simply, which belong to the estate of Kings, do shew without, and are exposed to the view and fight of every manito wit, their sumptious feasts, their wealth and riches their magnifreent port and pomp in publick places, their borntifull avours, and liberall gits: but is there any thing feeret and hidden within. Take heed I advise thee how thou approach and come neer, beware (Flay) that thou do not fir and meddle therein.

The joy and mirth of a Prince in prosperity cannot be consealed; he cannot laugh when he is disposed to play and be merry but it is ieen; neither when he mindeth and doth prepare to shew fome gracious favour or to be bountifull unto any is his purpose hidden; but mark what thing he keepeth close and secret, the same is terrible, heavy, stearn, unpeasant, yea, ministring no accesse nor caule of laughter: namely, the treasure-house (as it were) of some ranckor and lettered anger; a deep dasigne or project of revenge; Jealousie of his wife, some suspicion of his own some; or distillation and diffrust in some of his minions favorites and friends. Flie from this black cloud that gathereth fo thick; for when soever that which is now hidden shall break forth, thou shalt see what cracks of thunder and flashes of lightning wil ensue thereupon. But what be the means to avoid it? mary (even as I faid before) to turn and to withdraw thy curiofity another way; and principally to fet thy minde upon matters that are more honelt and delectable; Advise thy self and consider curiously upon the creatures in heaven in earth, in the air, and in the fea. Art thou delighted in the contemplation of great or smalthings if thou take pleasure to behold the greater, busie thy self about the Sunne; seek where he goeth down, and from whence he rifeth; Search into the cause of the mutations in the: Moon, why it should it so change and alter as it doth, like a man or woman? what the reason is that she loseth so conspicuous a light? and how it commeth to passe that she recovereth it How is it when the hath been out of fight

Thus freshshe seems and doth appear with light?
First young and fair whites tha she is but new Tist rosted and full we see the lovely hiero:
No sooner is her beauty at this height
But stade she doth anon, who was so bright
And by degrees she doth decrease and wain
Mutil at length she cometto naught again.

And these truly are the secrets of nature, neither is she offended and displeased with those who can find them out. Distrustest thou thy self to arrain unto these great things? then search into smaller matters, to wit, what might the reason be that among trees and other plants, some be alwaies fresh and green, why they flourish at all times, and be clad in their gay clothes, shewing their riches in every feafon of the yeer; why others again be one while like unto them in this their pride and glory, but afterward you shall have them again like unto an ill husband in his house; namely, laying out all at once, and spending their whole wealth and substance at one time, untill they be poor, naked, and beggerly for it? Also what is the cause that some bring forth their fruit long-wise, others cornered, and others round or circular? But peradventure thou hast no great mind to busie thy self and meddle in these matters, because there is no hurt nor danger at all in them. Now if there be no temedie, but that curiofity should ever apply it self to search into evil things, after the minner of some vene-mous serpent, which loveth to feed, to live and converse in pestilent woods, let us lead and direct it to the reading of histories, and prefent unro it abundance and store of all wicked acts, lewd and sinfull deeds. There shall Curiosity finde the ruines of men, the wasting and consuming of their state. the spoil of wives and other women, the decitfull traines of servants to beguil their masters, the calumniations and flanderous furmifes raifed by friends, poiloning casts envie, jealousie, shipwrack and overthrow of houses, calamities and utter undoing of Princes and great rulers; Satisfie thy self herewith to the full, and take thy pleasure therein as much as thou will; never shalt thou trouble or grieve any of thy friends and acquaintance in so doing. But it should seem that curiosity delighteth not in fuch naughty things that be very old and long fince done; but in those which be fresh, fire new, hot and lately committed, as joying more to behold new Tragedies. As for Comedies and matters of mirth, she is not greatly defirous to be acquainted with such. And therefore, if a man do make report of a marriage, discourse of a solemn sacrifice, or of a goodly shew or pompe that was set forth, the curious busie-body (whom we speak of) will take small regard thereto, and hear it but coldly and negligently. He will say that the most part of all this he heard already by others, and bid him who relateth such narrations to passe them over, or be brief, and cut off many circumstances. Marie if one that fits by him chance to fet a tale on end, and begin to tell him there was a maiden defloured, or a wife abused in adultery : if he recount of some processe of law or action commenced of discord and variance between two brethren; you shall see him then not to yawn and gape as though he had lift to fleep, you shall not perceive him to nod; he will make no excuse at all that his leifure will not serve to hear out the tale.

But bids fay on, and tell us more: And close be holds his ear then efore, So that this sentence, How sooner much are ill newes understood, And heard by men (alas) than tidings good!

is well and truly verified of these curious Polypragmons. For like as cupping glasses, boxes, and ventoses, draw the worst matter out of the slesh; even so, the ears of curious and busie tolk, are willing to receive and admit the most lewed and naughtiest speeches that are: or rather, to speak more properly, as I owns and Cities have certain cursed and unlucky gates, at which they send out malefactors to execution, carry and throw forth their dung, ordure, silthinesse, and cleansings what overet, but never cometh in or goeth out that way, any thing that pure is and holy; femblably, the ears of these curious intermediers be of the same nature: for these entreth and passeth into them nothing that is honest, civil and lovely; but the bruit and rumours of cruel murders have accesse unto them, and there make aboad, bringing the rewith wicked, abominable, profane and cursed reports: and as one said:

The onely bird that in my house doth ever chant and sing Eath night and day is dolefull moan much forrom and mailing.

So this is the Muse, Syrene, and Mere-maid alone, that Busie folk have neither is there any thing that they hearken to more willingly: for Curiofity is an itching defire to hear fecrets and hidden matters and wel you wot that no man will lightly conceal any good thing that he hath; confidering that many times we make semblance of good parts that be not in us. And therefore the buse intermedler who is to defrous to know and hear of evils, is subject to that which the Greeks call on xanguaria, a vice, cholen germain or fifter rather to envie and eye-biting. For almuch as envie is nothing elfe, but the grieffor another mans good: and the forefaid on agreenatia, the joy for his harm: and verily both these infirmities proceed from an untoward root, even another untamed vice and savage disposition, to wit, malignity or malice. And this we know well, that so irksome and odious it is to every man for to bewray and reveal the secrets, evils and vices which he hath, that many men have cholen to die, rather than to discover and open unto Physicians any of their hidden maladies, which they carry about them. Now iuppose that Heraclitus or Erosistratus the Physicians inay Aefculapius himself whiles he was a mortall man, should come to an house furnished with drugs, medicines and instruments requisite for the cure of diseases, and ask whether any man there had a Fistula in Ano, that is, an hollow and hidden ulcer within his fundament? Or if she be a woman, whether the have a cankerous fore within her matrice (albeit in this art such inquisitive curiosity is a special means making for the good & health of the fick) each one I suppose would be ready to hunt & chase away from the house such a Physician, who unsent for, and before any need required, came upon his own accord and motion in a bravery to enquire and learn other folks maladies. What shall we fay then to these busic medlers, who enquire of another the self-same infirmities and worle too? Not of any minde at al to cure and heal the same, but onely to detect and let them abroad: In which respect they are by good right the most odious persons in the world. For we hardly can abide Publicanes, Customers, and Tol-gatherers, but are mightily offended with them, not when they exact of us, and cause us to pay toll for any commodities or wares that are openly brought in; but when they keep a ferferting and fearching for fuch things as be hidden, & meddle with the wares and car-riages of other men: notwithflanding that law granteth and publick authority alloweth them to to do; yea, and if they do it not, they luftain loffe and dammage themselves. But contratiwise, these curious fellowes let their own bulineffe alone, and paffe not which end goes forward, caring not to hinder themselves, whiles they be intentive to the affaires of other men. Seldome go they into the Country, for that they cannot endure the quietness and fill filen e of the wild and solitary fields. But if haply after a long time they make a flatt thither, they cast an eye to their neighbours vines, rather than to their own; they enquire how many beeves or oxen of his died? or what quantity of wine fowred under his hand and no fooner are they full of thesenews, but into the City they trudge and make haste again. As for the good samer and painfull husbandman indeed, he is not very willing togive ear unto thosenews, which without his hearkning after come from the City of the own accord, and are brought unto him, for his faying is:

My ditcher will anon both tell and talk upon what points concluded was the peace, For now the knave about such newes doth walk, And busse he, to listen doth not cease,

But intruth, these busic-bodies, avoiding countrey-life and husbandry, as a vain trade and foolish occupation, a cold manner of living, which bringeth forth no great and tragicall matter. intrude and thrust themselves into the high Courts of Justice, the Tribunal-seats, the Market-place and Publikepulpits where speeches be made unto the people, great assemblies, and the most frequented quarter of the Haven where the Ships ride at Anchor, what: No newes? faith one of them. How now? Were you not this morning at the Market or in the Common-place? What then: How think you, is not the City mightily changed & transformed within these three houres? Now if it chance that fome one or other make an overture, and have fomething to say as touching those points, down he alights on foot from his horse, he embraceth the man, kiffeth him, and therestands attending and giving ear unto him. But fay that the party whom he thus encountreth and meeteth upon the way tell him that he hath no newes to report: what fai'st thou? (will he inferre again, and that in displeasure and discontentment:) Wert not thou in the Market-place of late? Didst not thou passe by the Princes court? Hadft thou no talk or conference at all with those that came out of Italy? In regard of such therefore as these, I hold well with the Magistrates of the City Locri, and commenda law of theirs: That if any Kitizen had been abroad in the Countrey, and upon his return home demanded what news? he should have a fine set on his head. For like as Cooks pray for nothing, but good flore of fatlings to kill for the Kitchin, and Fishmongers plenty of fishes; even so curious and busie people with for a world of troubles and a number of affaires, great newes, alterations and changes of State : to the end that they might evermore be provided of gain, to chase and hunt after, yea and to kill. Well and witely therefored in the Law-giver of the Thurians, when he gave order and forbad exprelly. That no Clitzen thould be taxed, noted by name, or koffed at upon the Stage in any Comedie, save onely adulterers and their built persons. The little yadultery may be compared well to a kinde of curiofity, lear, hing into the pleatures of another lecking (Tiay) and enquiring into thole matters which are kept servet, and concaled from the view of the whole world. And as for cutiofity, it feemeth to be a resolution of lockinets, like high file or corruption, a detection of secrets and laying them taked: For it is an ordinary thing with those who be inquisitive and definous of many newesy for to be blabs also of their tongues, and to be prailing absords which is thereason that Pythierem in joyned yong men five yeers them. The stalled Echemychia, Abstinence from all speech, or holding of their rongue.

Moreover it cannot otherwise be chosen, but that foul and cursed language also should accompamy curiofity; for look what thing loever buffe bodies hear willingly, the fame they love to tell and blurt out as quickly and such things as with delire and care they gather from one, they utter to another with joy: Whereupon it cometh to passe, that over and above other inconveniences which this vice ministreth unto them that are given to it, an impediment it is to their own appetite. For as they defire to know much, to every man observeth them, is beware of them, and endeavouseth to conceal all from them. ... Neither are they willing to do any thing in their fight, nor delighted to fpeak ought in their hearing; but if there be any question in hand to be debated, or business to be confidered and consulted of, all men are content to put off the conclusion and resolution into another time; namely, untill the curious and buffe perfor be out of the way. And fay, that whiles men are in fad, and le ret conference, or about some serious businesse; there chance one of these busines bodies to come implace presently all is husht, and every thing is removed aside and hidden, no otherwife than folkare wont to fet out of the way victuals where a cat doth harm, or when they fee her ready to run by: infomuch as many times those shirings which other medium by infomuch as many times those shirings which other medium by the lame may not be done or faid by them onely. Therefore also it followers by good confequence that a buse and carious person is commonly to farre our occuping that no man is willing to trust him for anythings in such fort, that we commit our letters millive and fighe manual, looner to our fervants and meer frangers, than to our friends and familiars, if we perceive them given to this humor of much medling. But that worthy Knight Belletophoines was to fare from this, that he would not break open those letters which he carried though they were written against himself bir. forbare to touch the Kings epittle, no lesse than he abstained from the Queen his wife even by one and the immersure of Commence. For furely, curiofity is a kind of inconfinency, a fivel, as is adultery, and this moreover it hath befides, that joyned there is with it much folly and extream want of wir: For were it not a past (thinkyou) of exceeding blockish senselesinesse, yea, and madnesse if the highest degree, to passe by so many women that be common, and every whete to be had, and themto make means with great cost and expence to some one kept under lock and key, and besides fumptuous: notwithstanding it fall out many times that such anone is as ill-favoured as she is foul? Semblably, and even the same do our curious folk: they omit and cast behind them many fair. and goodly fights to behold, many excellent lectures worth the hearing, many disputations, difcourses, honest exercises and pastimes; but in other mens letters they keep a puddering they open and read them, they stand like eaves droppers under their neighbows walles, hearkening what is done or faid within, they are ready to intrude themselves to listen what whilpering there is between iervants of the houles what fecret talk there is among filly women when they be in some od corner. &, as many times they are by this means not free from danger; so alwayes they meet with share & infamy. And therefore very expedient it were for fuch curious folk, if they would shift off and put by this vice of theirs, eftfoons to call to mind (as much as they can) what they have either known or heard by such inquisition: for if (as Simonides was wont to say) that when he came (after some time between) to open his desks and coffers, he found one which was appointed for gifts and rewards alwayes full, the other ordained for thanks and the graces void and empty: fo, a min after a good time past, set open the store-house of curiosity, and look into it what is therein, and see it toppe full of many unprofitable, vain and unpleasant things; peradventure the very outward light and face thereof will discontent and offend him, appearing in every respect to lovelesse and toyish as it is. Go to then: if one should set in hand to turn over leaf by leaf the Books of arcient Writers, and when he hath picked forth and gathered out the worst, make one Volume of altogether, to wit, of those headlesse & unperfect verses of Homer, which happly begin with a short syllable, and therefore be called deseased: or of the folocismes & incongruities which be found in Tragedies : or of the undecent and intemperate speeches which Archiochin framed against women whereby he defamed and shamed himself : were he not (I pray you) worthy of this Tragicall cutle:

A Foul-ill take thee thou lend wretch, that lovelt to collect The fault of mortall men now dead, the living to infect.

but to let these maledictions alone, certes this treasuring and scoring up by him of other mens errors and misseeds, is both unseemly, and also unprofitable: much like unto that City which Philip built of purpose, and peopled it with the most wicked, gracelesse, and incorrigible persons that were in his rime.

time, calling it Poneropolis when he had so done. And therefore these curious medlers in collecting and gathering together on all fides the err ours, imperfections, defaults, and folocitimes (as I may fo fay) not of veries or Poems, but of other mens lives, make of their memory a most unpleasant Archive or Regilter, and uncivill Record, which they ever carry about them. And like as at Rome, forme there be who never cast eye toward any fine pictures, or goodly statues, no nor so much as make any account to cheapen beautifull boies and faire wenches which there fland to be fold, but rather go up and down the market where monsters in nature are to be bought, seeking and learning out where be any that want legs, whose armes and elbows turne the contrary way like unto cats; or who have three eyes apeece in their heads, or be headed like unto the Offrich: taking pleasure (I iay to see ifthere be borne

But if a man should bring them to see such sights as these ordinarily, the very thing it selfe would soone give them enough, yea, and breed a loathing in them of such ugly monsters; even so it fareth with those who buse themselves and meddle insearching narrowly into the imperfections of other mens lives, the reproaches of their stocks and kindred, the faults, errours, and troubles that have hapned in other houses; if they call to mind what like defects they have found and known before time, they shall soon find that their sormer observations have done them small pleasure, or wrought them as little profit.

But the greatest meanes to divert this vicious passion is use and custome; namely, if we begin a great way off, and long before to exercise and acquaint ourselves in a kind of continency in this behalfe, and so learne to temper and rule our selves; for surely use it was and custome that caused this vice to get fuch an head, encreasing daily by little and little, and growing from worse to worse : But how and after what manner we should be inured to this purpole, we shall see and understand as we

First and formost therefore, begin we will at the smallest and most slender things, and which most quickly may be effected. For what matter of difficulty is it for a man in the way as he travelleth, not to amuse and ousse his head in reading Epitaphs or inscriptions of Sepulchers? Or what paine is it for us as we walk along the galleries, to passe over with our eyes the writings upon the walls; suppoing thus much fecretly within our felves, as a maxime or generall rule: That there is no goodnesse no pleasure nor profit at all in such writings: For there you may read, That some one doth remember another, and make mention of him by way of hearty commendations in good part; or fuch an one is the best friend that I have, and many other such like mortoes are there to be seen and read, full of toics and vanities, which at first seem not to do any hurt if one read them, but in truth fecretly they do much harme, in that they breed in us a custome and defire to leek after needlesse and impertinent matters. For like as hunters suffer not their hounds to range out of order; nor to follow every fent, but keep them up and hold them in by their collars, referving by that meanes their smelling pure and neat, altogether for their proper worke, to the end that they should be more eager and hot to trace the footing of their game, and as the Poet faith,

With sext most quick of nosethrils after kind,

The runting of the life wids, in challe to find;

Even fo, we ought to cut off these excursions and soolish traines that curious folke make to heare and fee every thing; to keep them short (1say) and turne them another way to the seeing and hearing only of that which is good and profitable. Also, as we observe in Eagles and Lions, That whiles they go upon the ground they draw their talons and claws inward, for feare left they should dull the sharpe edge and weare the points thereof ; so considering that curiosity hath a certain quick conceit and fine edge (as it were) apt to apprehend and know many things, let us take heed that we do not imploy and blunt the same in the worst and vilest of all others.

Secondly, we are to accustome our selves as we passe by another mans doore, not to look in, not to cast our eyes to any thing whatsoever that there is: for that the eye is one of the hands that curiofity useth. But let us alwaies have in readinesse and thinke upon the Apophthegme of Xenocrates, who was wont to lay, That it skilled not, but was all one, whether we fet our feet or eyes within the house of another man. For it is neither meet and just, nor an honest and pleasant sight, according to the old verse,

My friend or stranger, whatever you be, You hall within all things deformed see.

And what be those for the most part which are seen in houses? Dishes, trenchers, and such like utenfils and small vessels lying on the bare ground, or one upon another disorderly the wenches fer and doing just nothing: and lightly aman shall not find ordinarily ought of importance or delight. Now the very cast of the eye upon such things doth therewith turne away the mind; the intentive looking thereupon is unseemly, and the using thereof starke naught. Diagenes welly upon a time seeing Dioxippus, when he entred in his triumphant chariot into the city for winning the best priseat the Olympian games, how as he rode he could not chuse but set his eye upon a certaine faire damozell, who was in place to behold this pompe and folemne entrance of his, but evermore hiseye followed her, whether she were before or behind him: Behold (quoth he) our victorious and triumphant champion, how a young wench hath him fure enough by the neck, and doth writhe him which way she list! Semblably, see you not how these curious solke have their necks benched aside at every foolish fight, and how they turne about with each vanity that they heare and fee, after once they have gotten an habit or custome, to looke every way and to catry a ronling eye in their heads? But in mine opinion, it is not meet that our fenles should gad and wander abroad, like a wild and untaught girle, but when reason hath sent it forth to some businesse; after it hath been there imployed and done the errand about which it was let, to returne speedily againe unto her mistris the soule, and make report how she hath sped, and what she hath done? And then afterwards to stay at home decently like a modelt waiting maiden, giving attendance upon reason, and ready alwaies at her command. But now hapneth that which Sophacles laith,

The head-strong jades that will no bit abide, Hate him perforce who should them reine and guide.

The fenses having not met with good instructions (as I said before) nor been trained to right waies, run before reason upon their own accord, and draw with them many times the understanding, and fend it headlong after such things as are not seemely and decent. And therefore false is that which is commonly reported of Democritus the Philotopher: namely, that willingly he dimmed and quenched (as it were) his own light, by fixing his eyes fast upon a fiery and ardent mirror, to take the reverberation of the light from thence, to the end that they should not disturbe the mind, by calling out effoones the inward intelligence, but suffer it to keep house within, and to be employed in objects intellectuall, as if the windows that regard the fireet and high way were that up. Howbeit most true it is, that those who for the most part occupy their understanding, have least use of their fenies: which is the reason that in old time they both builded the temples of the Mules, that is to fay, houses ordained for students, which they named Musas, as far as they could from Cities and great towns: and also called the night Euphress, as one would say, a triend to sage advice and comfell; as supposing that quiet reft, repose, and slinesse from all disturbance make very much for contemplation and invention of those things that we fludy and leek for.

Moreover no harder matter is it nor of greater difficulty than the rest, when in the open marketplace or common hall, men are at high words, reproaching and reviling one another not to approach and come necreupto them. Also if there be any great concourse and running of people together upon some occasion, not to fir at all but sit still, or if thou att not able to containe and rulethy selfe, to rife up and go thy waies. For furely gaine thou shalt no good at all by intermedling with such busie and troublesome persons; but contrariwise, much feuit maiest thou reapely turning away such curiofity in repressing the same and constraining it by the and custome to obey reason. Having made this good entrance and beginning, to proceed now unto farther and ftronger exercise, it were very good, when oever there is any play exhibited upon the Stage in a frequent Theater, where there is affembled a great audience to heare and fee some worthy matter for to passe by it, and to back thy friends who follicite thee to go thither with them for to see either one dance excellent well or to act a Comedy; nor so much as to turne back when thou hearest some great shour and our-cry, either from out of the race or the grand-cirque, where the horse-running is held for the prize. For like as Socrates gave counsell to forbeare those meats which provoke men to eate when they are not hungry, and those drinks which incire folke to drinke when they have no thirst; even so, we ought to avoid and beware how we either see or heare any thing what somer, which may either draw or hold us thereto, when there is no need at all thereof. The noble prince Gyrus would not so much as see faire Lady Parthea, and when Arasper one of his courtiers and minions made report unto him, that the was a woman of incomparable beauty, and therefore worthy to be looked on: Nay, rather (quoth he) for that cause I ought to forbeate the fight of her; for it by your periwation I should yeeld to go and see her, it may peradventure fall out so that she her selfemight tempt and induce me againe to repaire unto her; even then haply when I shall not have such leiture, yea, and it by her, and keep her company, neglecking in the meane time the weighty affairs of State. Inlike manner Alexander the Great would not come within the light of King Darius his wife not withfranding that the was reported unto him for to be a most gallent and beautifull Lady : Her mother an ancient Dame and elderly matron he did not flick to vifite, but the young gentlewoman her daughter (fresh, faire, and young) he could not be brought fo much as once to fee. As for us, we can talt a wanton eye fecretly into the coaches and horse-litters of wives and women as they ride, we can look out of our windows, and hang with our bodies halfe forth, to take the full view of them as they passe by: and all this while we think we commit no fault, infering our curious eye and wandring mind to flide and run to every thing.

Moreover, it is meet and expedient for the exercise of justice, other whiles to omit that which well and justly might be done; to the end that by that means a man may acquaint himselfe to keep far offfrom doing or taking any thing unjustly. Like as it maketh much for temperance and chaflity, to abstaine other whiles from the use of a mans own wife, that thereby he might be never moved to lust after the wife of his neighbour; taking this courie likewife against curiosity, strive and endeavour sometimes to make semblance as shough thou didst neither heart not see those things that properly concernethy selfe: And if a man come and bring thee a tale of matters concerning thine own houshold, let it passe, and put it over, yea. and those words which seeme to have been spoken as touching thine own perion cast them behind, and give no eare thereto. For default of this discretion, it was the inquisitive curiosity of King Occipus, which intangled and enwrapped him in exceedinggreat calamities and miseries: for when he would needs know who himselfe was, as if he had been not a Corinthian, but a stranger, and would needs go therefore to the Oracle to be resolved, he mer with Lains his own father by the way, whom he slew, and to espouled his own mother, by whole meanes he came to be King of Thebes: and even then when he seemed to be a most happy man, he could not to stay, but proceeded further to enquire concerning himselfe, not with standing his wife did what she possibly could to disswade him from it; but the more earnest she was with him that way, the more instant was he with an old man who was privy to all, using all means to enforce him for to bewray that fecret: at length when the thing it felfe was so pregnant, that it brought him into farther juspition, and withall when the said old man cried out in this manner,

Alas, how am I at the point perforce To utter that which will cause great remorse?

The King surprised still with his humour of curiosity, notwithstanding he was vexed at the very heart answered,

And I likewise for my part am as neare To beare as much but yet I must to heare.

So bitter-fweet is that itching-fmart humour of curiofity like unto an ulcer or fore, which the more it is rubbed and scratched; the more it bleedeth and bloudieth it selfe. Howbeit he that is delivered from this difease, and besides of nature mild and gentle, so long as he is ignorant and knoweth not any evill accident, may thus fay.

any evin actions, as this say, when evils are past and gone,

How sage and wife art thou, oblivion,

And therefore wemust by little and little accustome our selves to this, that when there be any letters brought unto us, we do not open them presently and ingreat haste, as many do, who if their hands be not quick enough to do the leat, set their teeth to, and gnaw in funder the threds that sewed them up fait. Also if there be a messenger comming toward us from a place with any tidings, that we run not to meet him, nor so much as once rise and stir for the matter; and if a friend come unto thee faying, I have some news to tell you of : yea marry (must you say againe) but I had rather that you brought me fomething indeed that were profitable fruitfull, and commodious. I remember upon a time when I declaimed and read a lecture at Rome, that Oratour Rustius, whom afterwards Domitian put to death for envy that he bare to his glory, happened to be there to heare me: Now in the midst of my Lecture there came into the place a souldier with letters from the Emperour, which hedelivered to Ruftim aforefaid, whereupon there was great filence in the schoole, and I my selfe made some pause whiles he might read the letter, but he would not read it then, nor so much as breake it open before I had made an end of my discount, and dismissed the auditory: for which all the company there present highly praised and admired the gravity of theman. Now if one do feed and nourish all that he can, (be it but in lawfull and allowable things) this veine and humour of curiofity, so as thereby it becommeth in the end mighty and violent, it will not be an easie matter to restraine and hold it in when it shall breake out and run on end to such things as be unlawfull and forbidden, by reason that it is so used already to intermeddle and be doing. But such men as these break open and unseale letters (as Isaid) intrude themselves into the secret counsels of their friends; they will needs discover and see those sacred mysteries which it is not lawfull for to see; in place whereunto there is no lawfull accesse they love to be walking; enquire they do into the secret deeds and words of Kings and Princes; and notwithstanding there be nothing in the world that causeth tyrants, who must of necessity know all, so odious as this kind of people, who be called their eares; (promoters, I meane, and spies) who heare all and bring all unto their eares. The first that ever had about him these Oraconstes (as a man would say, Princes eares) was Daring the yonger; a Prince distrusting him else, suspecting also and searing all men. As for those which were called Profagogidæ, that is to fay, Courtiers, Spies, and Enformers, the Dionysis, tyrants of Sicily, intermingled, fuch among the Syracufians: whereupon, when the State was altered, those were the first that the Syracusians apprehended and massacred. Also those whom we call Sycophants are of the confraternity, house, and linage of these curious persons, save only this difference there is, that Sycophants enquire what evill any man hath either defigned or committed; whereas our Polypragmons hearken after and discover the very calamities and miladventures of their neighbours, which happen even against their will and purpose: and when they have so done, set them abroad to the view of the wholeworld. Furthermore, it is faid, that the name Aliterius came up first by occasion of this overmuch medling, called Curiofity. For when there was (by all likelihood) a great famine at Athens, they that had come kept it in and would not bring it abroad to the market, but privily and in the night ground the same into meale within their houses: Now these fellows, named Aliterii, would go up and down closely hearkening where the querne or mill went, and thereupon tooke the said name. Semblably as it is reported the name of Sycophants arose upon the like occasion: for when there was a law made, forbidding that any figs should be carried forth out of the land, such promoters as bewrayed the delinquents, and gave information against those that conveighed figgs away, were also thereupon called Sycophants. To conclude therefore, it were not unprofitable for these curious Polypragmons (of whom we have discoursed all this while) to know thus much ; That they might be ashamed in themselves to be noted for manners and profession to be like unto those who are accounted the most odious and hatefull perions in the world.

The Summary.

N this Treatife aman may fee the excellent discourses and most sound arguments of Morall Philosophy; Athe scope whereof is to make scholars and students therein resolute, and to keep them from wavering and tottering to and fro i notwithst anding that either the skie were ready to fall upon their heads, or the earth to chinke and open under their feet. True it is, that in this place Plutarch sheweth sufficiently what blindneffethere is in humane wisdome, when the question is to pronounce and peake precisely, Whenein consisteth true repose and assured felicity? For to teach a man whom he calleth vertuous, to search for contentment and quiet rest in his own reasons were as much as to setch light out of darknesse, and life out of death it selfe. and quiet the state of this time) needlesse it is to treat long upon this point, considering that we mind not to dispute or declare how in lusticent humane learning and Philosophy is in comparison of true Divinny and suppose to the prefent this may suffice, that seeing he was no better than a pigan who hath disputed of this theame, let us receive both this discourse and other such, wherein he endeavourest to within an me from vice and bring us unto vertue, as written and penned by a man, guided and conducted by a dim and darke light: in which notwithst a ding appeare certaine sparks of the truth, which as they are not alle to (hew the way sufficiently fother give them to understand, who be far remote from the true light, how miferable and wretched they are every way. Proved he kad before, that Flattery, Choler, and Euriosity are vices that overturne the foule np-side down, and transport it so far off, that it is not at home, nor mistris of her selfe: and after he kad taught how a man might reclaime and reduce her againe to her own house, he treateth now of those meanes whereby she may be kept quiet, peaceable, joyous, and contented within. For the effecting hereof, at the very entry of this Treatife, he proposeth one expedient meane to attaine thereto, requiring that a man should fortifie and defend his mind with reasons against the evils and dangers to some then he confuseth the Epicureans, who for to set a man in peace would make him blockish, senselesse, and good for nothing : he answereth likewise to those who are of opinion, that a man may find a certaine kind of vacation and impassibility without all trouble and molestation: which done, he showeth that reason well ruled and ordered is the foundation and ground of our tranquillity: and all in one and the same traines he teacheth how a man may be furnified and affifed with this reason. Having thus sufficiently in generall termet descoursed of these premises, he doth particularise and decipher the same point by point, giving sifteen severall counsels, whereby a man may attaine to this contentment and repose of Spirit; the which we have diffinguished particularly, and shewed in each one the substance of them, which thought not sold in first in this place, because the Summary should not extend our much. Furthermore, the said complete she enriched with notable examples, similitudes and sentences; which (no doubt) would have been much mind and sentences. forcible and effectuall, if the principle indeed had been joyned therewith, to wit, true piety and religion ! which hash been cleane omitted by the Author, who indeed never knew what was the only true and perfect tranquillity of the foule. Howbeit wonderfull it is, how he should proceed so far as he doth, having no other help and meanes but his own selfe: which may so much the better serve our turnes, considering that we have aids and guides far more excellent to bring us fo far, as to make entry, and take affured poffession of that soveraigne good and felicity, whereof he here speaketh.

Of the tranquillity and contentment of mind.

PLUTARCH to PACCIUS fendeth greeting:

Ver-late it was before I received your letter, wherein you requested me to write somewhat as touching the Tranquillity of the Soule, and withall of certaine places in Plate's Dixlogue Timeus, which feeme to require more exact exposition: but so it happened, that at the very same time, your friend and mine Eros, had occasion to saile with speed to Rome, upon the receir of certains letters from that right worshipfull Gentleman Fundania, by vertue whereof he was to depart suddenly and to repaire unto him with all expedition. By which obtain fion having not fufficient time and leifure to perform your requelt in such manner as I purpoled; and yet unwilling that the man comming from me should be seen of you empty-handed; I have collected certainenotes, chosen out of those commentaries, which for mine own memory and private use I had compiled long before, concerning this argument, to wit, The Tranquillity and contentment of spirit: supposing that you also demand this present discourse, not for any pleasure that you take to read a treatile penned curioufly, and affecting or hunting after fine phrases and exquinte words; but only inregard of fomedoctrine that may ferve your turne and help you to the framing of your life as you ough; knowing withall full well (forthewhich I do congratulate and rejoyce heartily and the state of the on your behalfe) that notwithstanding your inward acquaintance, friendship, and favour with the belt and principall persons of the City, and that for eloquence you come behind nonethat plead caules at the bar in open court, but are reputed a fingular Oratour, yet for all that you do not as that Tragicall Merops, fuffer your felle fooisfuly and beyond the course of nature to be carried away as he was with the vaine-glory and applause of the multirude, when they do admire and account you happy therefore; but still you keep in memory that which oftentime you have heard from us; That it is neither a rich Patricians shoot that cureth the gout in the feet, nor a collly and precious ring that healeth the whitslaw or selon in the singers; nor yet a princely diadem that easeth the headach. For what use is there at all of goods and riches to deliver the soule from griese and forrow, or to lead a life in rest and repose without cares and troubles? What good is there of great honours, promotions, and credit in court? Unlesse they that have them know how to use the same well and honefly; and likewise if they be without them, can skill how to find no misse of them, but be alwaies accompanied with contentment; never coveting that which is not? And what is this elle but reason accustomed and exercised before-hand, quickly to restraine, and estsoones to reprehend the passionate and unreasonable part of the soule, which is given oftentimes to breake out of her bounds: and not to suffer her to range and vague at her pleasure, and to be transported by the objects represented unto her? Like as therefore Xenophon giveth us good counsell: Alwaies to remember the gods, and most of all to worship and honour them when we are in prosperity, to the end that when oever westand in need we may more boldly invocate and call upon them, with full assurance that they will supply our necessities, being thus before-hand made propitious and gracious unto us; even to, wife men, and fuch as are of good conceit, ought alwaies to be furnished and well provided of reasons sufficient to serve their turne for to encounter their passions before they arise, to the end that being oncelaid up in store they may do most good when time serveth. For as curst and angry massives by nature, which at every noise that they heare keep an eager baying and barking as if they were affrighted, become quiet and appealed by one only voice which is familiar unto them. and wherewith they have been acquainted; so it is no small paine and trouble to still and compose the passions of the mind (skittish as they be and grown wild) unlesse a man have ready at hand proper and familiar reasons to represse the same so soone as ever they begin to stir and grow out of

Now as touching those who affirme that if a man would live in tranquillity and rest, he ought not to meddle nor deale in many affaires, either in publike or private: First and somnost thus I say, that they would make us pay deare for traquillity of mind, when they would have us buy it with idleness and doing nothing: which were as much as if they advised each one to do as Electra did to her sick brother Oreste, when she said unto him,

Lie still poore wretch and keep thy bed, Stir not from thence, and have no dread.

But surely as this were unroward Physick for the body, to prescribe for the allaying of paine a medicine that would benumme and supsife the sense; so verily he were no better Physican for the soule, who to deliver her from trouble and griefe, ordained that she should be made idle, suggists, soft, and tender, which in one word is as much, as to forger all duty, and to betray friends, kinsfolke, and country. Moreover a false position it is: That they enjoy tranquillity of life, who intermeddle not in much businesse; for if that were true, women would live inmore repose and quietnesse of mind than men, foras much as they keep home and sit still within doores for the most part, and seldome go abroad: but now although it cannot be denied but that the Poet Hessalus statch.

Cold Boreas a wind that blows From Northern pole full oft, Dath never pierce the tender skin Of damsell smooth and soft.

Yet many hearts-griefes, troubles, perturbations, discontentments, and cares arising upon jealoufie, superstition, pride, ambition, foolish and vaine opinions, (which are so many as hardly a man is able to number them) find way and entrance even to the secret chambers and cabinets of our fine and dainty dames: And Laertes who lived apart for the space of twenty yeares in the country.

With one old woman and no more, Who meat and drinke set him before, far from his native countrey, his own home, from court and kingdome; yet neverthelesse had alwaies dwelling with him ladnesse of heart, accompanied with languishing, idenesse, and heavy slence. And more than that, this non-imployment in affairs is that which many times hath cast fome men into a dumpish melancholy and heavinesse of spirit, like to him of whom Homer thus writeth.

Here sat Achilles swift of foot, by him descended right From Jupites, though some he were of Veleus worthy knight, And stirt and from his sleet in rode, but in an agry sit would neither sight in open sield, nor yet in counsell sit: Thus idle he aboud so long until his heart within Consum and he with the more, than battail to begin.

Where-

whereupon being in a passionate humor, and thinking it a great indignity thus to wear away and do nothing, he breaketh forth himself afterwards into this speech:

But here sit I close to my ships, from attion more and lesse And idle lush to load the earth, I cannot but confesse.

Infomuch as Epicarus himies! f that great patron and maintainer of pleafure, would not advise nor thinkert meet that those who by nature are of an ambitions and alpiting minde, or defirous of glory, should take their ease and fittists, but by the guidance and direction of their natural inclination, to manage the weighty affaires of State and govern the common weal: Jaying, that men born for action would be more troubled and discontented in minde with doing nothing, namely when they fee how they misse and fail of that which so greatly they defired. Howbeit I must note the abfurd folly of the man and his want of judgement, in that he seement to call and exhort unto the rule of weal-publishe nor those who are able and sufficient, but such onely as cannot away with a private life and string still: neither ought we to measure and determine either the tranquillity or trouble of the spirit, by the paucity or multitude of affairs, but rather by their honesty or dishonestytion as we have already said, no lesse discontentment and irouble, groweth to the minde by neglecting and omitting things honest, than by affecting and committing things dishenest. As forthose who have determinately steby one special kind of life, as void of all grief and trouble, to wit, some making choice to live as husbandmen in tillage of the groundsothers to lead a single and unmarried life, and some again have esteemed a Kings-life to be it: to such Menander answerth prettily in these veries:

I thought one whilethat rich and monied mes, O Phanias, who were not kard befled
To-par for use in every hundredten,
Do-either groun vor sigh all night in bed:
Nor as the sturn from top to toe
Essiones, wo is me, alsa, what shall I doe?
Breath out from heart full pensive and oppress,
But sweetstake repose and step in rest.

And coming more neerly unto the point, when he per veived that rich men were as reftles, and as much disquieted as the poor, he conclude that is

But now.I wor, that life and penfive pain
Are neer of kin and cousin germains twain,
Who live in wealth, I see, feel grief of hart,
And men in honour, of forrows have their pare
Notessie than those, whose want and penurie
Doth age with them, and keep them comparie,

And the cafe is all one as with those that be either timorous or flomack-fick at sea, when they be under fail to supposing that they shall be better at ease they go out of a bark into a brigandine, and out of it into a galley: but they sind ento good thereby, for that they carry about them still choler and a falle heart, which are the cause of this their diffemperature; even so efitioons to change from one course of life unto another, is not the means to deliver the mind from troubles and perturbations, which hinder the repose and quietness thereof. And what be their troubles' even want of experience in affairers inconsiderate rathnesse, and default of distretion; insufficiency and want of knowledge, how to use and accommodate things aright to the present o cassons. These be they that molets and vex as well the rich as the poor; these forment and burt single persons no self-than married folk. In regard hereof, some having bidden the court and civil affaires surewell yet soon after again could not away with a private and quiet life. And for no other cause but this many make all the means they can to be advanced to high places, and to infimate themselves into Princes courts; and when they have attained thereto, anon repent them and missilike of that course? But true it is the Poet 18th faith.

He that lieth fick is hard to please, He wants advise that should him case.

For his wife is a trouble unto him; the Physician he findeth fault with, and the bed is not to his minde; besides,

A Friend comes to visit, he welcomes him nought, Andwhen he departs, unkind heis thought.

But afterwards as the difeate beginneth to break away or decline, and the former temperature of the bodie to return-health comerhagain which maketh everything pleafant and agreeable infomuch as he who the day before was ready upon a peevifhneffe offtomack to cast up dainty egges, fine Amydam and marchpain, and the fairest cocked manchet that is, will be content the motrow after, yea, and glad with all his heart, to feed favourly and with a good stomack of down right houshold bread, of some Olives or Cresses. Such a contenuent and alteration worketh judgement of reason in every kind and course of list. It is reported that King Alexander the Great, hearing Anaxanchus the Philosopher discussing and maintaining this Position. That there were worlds innumerable, selfel a weeping: & when his strends and familiars about him asked what he ailed. Have I not (quoth he good cause to weep, that being as there are an infinite number of worlds, I am not yet the Lord of one? Whereas Crates having no more than a wallet at his neck, and a poor threadbare cloke upon his back, spent his whole life in mirth and joy, laughing alwayes full merrily as if it had been alwaies a feasilivall holiday. As for Agamemnon he complained in these words, and thought it an intolerable burden to be a King and Commander of fo great a People.

Wot well you fee Atreus his fonne, King Agamemnon hight:
Whom Jupiter clogs more with care, than any mortall weight.

Contrariwise Diogenes, when he was to be bought and sold among other slaves in open market. fe offed at the Crier who made fale; and lying along the ground, would not fo much as rife when he was bidden to (tand up, but cavilled with him after a mocking and jefting manner, what (quoth he)and if you fold a fifh would you bid it rife up Likewife Socrates discoursed familiarly with his fellowers and followers as touching Philosophie, even when he was inprison. Whereas Phaeton, notwithstanding he was mounted up into heaven, wept for anger and despight that no man would give him the rule and regiment over the chariot-steeds belonging to the sunne his stater. And as a shoe is wrested and turned according to the fashion of a crooked or splay-foot, but never doth the foot writhe to the form of a shoe; even so it is for all the world with the dispositions of mens minds; they frame their lives and make them like thereto. For it is not use and custome that causeth the best life to be pleasant also unto them that have made choice thereof, as some one haply is of opinion; but wisedome rather and discretion maketh that life which is best to be also sweetest and most pleasant. Since that therefore the source and sountain of all tranquillity and contentment of spirit is in our felves, let us cleanse and purifie the same spring, as clean as possibly we can, that all outward and casual occurrences what soever, may be made familiar and agreeable unto us, knowing once how to use them well.

If things go crosse, we ought not, iwis To feet; for why? fuch choler will not boot : But he that know's when ought is done amiffe, To fet all fraight , shall chieve full well, I wot.

Place therefore compared our life to a game of Tables; wherein the plaier is to wish for the luckiest cast of the dice, but whatsoever his chance is, he must be sure to play it well, and make the best of it: Now of these two points, the former, to wit a good throw, is not in our power and choice; but the other refleth in us, namely, whatfoever our lot is, to take in good worth, and to dispose every thing in that place where it may profit most if it fortuned well: and contrariwise, it it fell out crosse, where it may do least harm. This (I say) is our part and duty to perform, if we be as wile as we should be. As for brain-sick fooles, and such as know not to carry themselves in this life (like unto those that have crasse and diseased bodies, who neither can abide burning heat nor chilling colde) as in prosperity they spread and set up their sails too high, so in adversity they strike them as low. Troubled they are mightily with both extremities; or to speak more truely, with themselves, as much in the one as the other, and no lesse in that state which yeeldeth those things that we call and repute goods. Theodorne that infamous Philosopher, who for his profane opinion was furnamed Atheos, that is to fay, the Atheift, was wont to fay: That he delivered his speeches with the right hand to his auditors and scholars, but they took the same with their left; even so ignorant and untaught persons many times when sortune presenteth her self unto them on the right hard receive her aukly, turning to the left fide undecently, and by that means commit many untowardand lewd parts. But those that be wise do farre better: for as Thyme yeeldeth unto Bees the quickest and driest hony; even so they out of the most unfortunate accidents that be, can skill often-times to get tomewhat which is agreeable and commodious unto themselves. This is then the first and principall point, wherein a man ought to be trained and exercised, upon this must be study and meditate. And like as that fellow, when he stung a stone at a cust bitch, missed her, and chanced to hit his step-mother, saying withall: It makes no matter; for it hath not light amisse; even so we, may turn all our own fortune to our own purpole, and make the best use of it, in case things fall out otherwijethan we would or meant. Diogenes his hap was to be banished and driven out of his own Countey; yet this exile of his proved not ill to him; for by that means and thereupon he began to fludy and professe Philosophie. Zeno the Cittizan had but one Frigat or Flie-boat lest him, and hearing newes that both it and all therein was cast away, drowned and perished in the mids of the Sea,O Forume (quoth he)thou hast done well to drive us again to put on our poor and simplescholars habit, and to fend us to our gallerie and school of Philosophie. What should hinder us then, but that we may follow the examples of these men. Art thou deprived and put out of some publike office or magistracy which thou didst exercise? Go and live in the Countrey; there follow thine own businesse, and pliethy private affairs. Hast thou made sute and great means to be entertained in the Court, and to winde into speciall favour with some Prince and Potentate, and after all thy travell suffered repulse? Well, thou shalt live privately at home, without danger, without trouble. Again Are thou entred into action, and doft thou manage State-affaires, wherein thou hast cares enough, and no time to breathe thy lelf?

The whollome waters and hot baines Do not fo much alay our paines:

And if our limmes be dull or fick, Refresh the Same and make them quick: As when a man him felf doth fee Advanc't to honour and high degree His glory, care and pain dotheafe, No travell then will him displease.

as Pindarus faith very well: Art thou in some disgrace, and cast out of savour with reproch, by reafon offome flanderous calumniation or envie? Thou haft a gale offore-wind at the Poop, which wil foon bring thee directly to the Muses and to the Academie; that is to say, to follow thy book, and fludy Philosophies for this was Plato's help, when he was in disfavour with Denys the Tyrant. And therefore one means this is (of no small importance) to work contentment in a mans mind; namely, to look back unto the state of famous and renowned persons, and to see whether they (haply) have not fuffered the like at any time; as for example: Art thou discontented with thy childlesse estate, for that thy wife hath brought thee no children? Do but mark the Kings of Rome how there was not one of them that left the crown unto his fon. Is it poverty that pincheth thee, fo as thou not art able to endureit? Tell me which of all the Bootians wouldest thou chuseto resemble, fooner than Epamimendas? or what Romane wouldest thou belike unto, rather than Fabricius? But say thy wife hath plaied false by thee, and made thee wear horns? Didst thou never read that Epigram of King Agis at Delphos?

Υγεάς છું * τεμφεςάς βασιλεύς Αγίς μ' ανέθηκεν. Agis, of sea and land a crowned king,

Gave me sometime a facred offering . And yet as mighty a Prince as he was , you have heard (I am fure) that Alcibiades lay with his and accordwife I unea, and the would not bath to call the forme that the had by him in adultery, Alcibiades, which Bade. effectally amongst her women and waiting-maidens, whispering and speaking as much fostly unto them. But what of all that? This crooked crosse was no but unto K. Agas, but that he proved the made as one of the control greatest and most renowned personage of all the Greeks in his time. No more was it any hinderance to Stilpo, but that he lived all the dayes of his life most mertily, and no Philosopher like to him in Homershe in those dayes, notwithstanding he had a daughter that plaied the harlottand when Metrocles the Cyin those dayes, not with standing he had a daughter that plaied the harlott and when Metrocles the Cycles in k reproched him therewith; Is this (quoth he)my fault or hers? To which when Metrocles and used like g fwered again: The fault is indeed hers, but the infortunity and mishap is yours: What now (replyed it it' ifer-Stife again) how can that be? Are not (I pray you) all faults rightly n imed Slips or Falles? Yes truly, on the fail the other: And are not falles (quoth Stife) milchances or misfortunes? Metrocles Could not detected to the stife of the st mie it Whythen (inferred Stilpo at last) what are mischances or missortunes, other than infortunities and mishaps to them whose mischances they are. By this milde kind of Sorites and Philosophicall reasoning thus from point to point, he shewed that the reprochfull language of this Cynicall Metrocles, was nothing else, but a vain and foolish baying and barking of a cur-dogge. But on the contrary fide, themost parc of men are provoked and troub ed not onely for the vices of their friends, familiars, and kinsfolk, but also of their very enemies. For reprochful taunts anger envie, malice, and spightfull jealousies, are the miss hiefs and plagues (I must needs say) of such especially that have them howbeit they molest and vex those also that are witlesse and without dif retion no otherwise than the halty and cholerick fits of our neighbours, the peevifh and froward dispositions of our familiar acquaintance, and some shrewd demeanors of our servants in hat they go about which me thinks you also troubling and disquieting your telf as much as with any thing elle, like unto those Phylicians of whom Sophocles thus writeth do unseemly and not iwis for the credit of your person, thus to chase and fret at their passions and imperfections beyond all reason, and shew your self as passionate as they. For surely the affairs and negotiations wherewith you are put in trult, and which be managed by your direction, are not executed ordinarily by the ministery of such persons whose dealings be plain, simple and direct as instruments most meet and fit for such a purpose; but for the most part by crooked rough, and crabbed pieces. To reform and amend these enormities, I would not have you think that it is either your work and duty or an enterprise otherwise easily performed. But if you making use of these, being fuch by nature as the Chirurgians do of tooth-drawing pin ers and those instruments wherewith they do bring the edges of a wound together; will shew your self milde, moderate, and tra-Cable in every respect, according as the present occasion will give leave; surely you shall not receive so much discontentment and displeasure artheuntoward and unhappy dealings of others, as joy in the conscience of your owngood disposition, as making this account that such ministers of yours do but their kind, like as dogs when they bark: But if you feed and cherish this publicanimity and weaknelle of yours, you shall be sure to heap up many troubles and sollies of other men ere you be aware, which will be ready to fall and run as into some low ground and hollow trench, unto that weaknesse ofyours. For what should I say, that some Philosophers reprove the pirty and committeration which we have for them that are in diffresse and miserie, acknowledging that it is a good and charitable deed to help and succor such as bein calamity, but not commending that condolence and fellow feeling with our neighbours, as if we yeelded with them unto Fortune? And morethan fo, the same

Philosophers will not permit and give us leave, in case we be subject to some vice and ill disposed, for to be seen and known for to grieve and sorrow therefore; but rather to correct and amend what is amisse, without any shew at all of sad cheer and heavinesse; which being so, consider then how little reason and small cause we have, may, how absurd it were, that we should suffer our selves to be troubled, vexed and angry, incase of all those who commerce and converse with us, deal not so well and kindly as they should? But above all things my good friend Paccing, let us see to this, that our felf-love deceive and seduce us notiet us beware (I say) that we do not so much show an hatred and detestation of wickednesse and sinne in generallias bewray some private and particular regard of our own, in that we feem to abhorre and dread the naughtineffe of those that have to do with us. For to be exceeding much moved and beyond all measure affectionate at some time to such and such as fairs; to covet (I fay) and purise the same over-horly, and otherwise than is meet and beferming; or contrariwise to loth, despile, and abhor the same, must need breed discontentments, suspitions, and offences in those persons by whom we seem either to have been prevented and disappointed of some things, or to have run and fallen too soon upon other: But he that is used to carry himself cheerfully and with moderation in his affaires, (fall out as they will) and can frame to their events, he will foog learn to negotiate and converie with any man in all desterity and gentle behaviour. Well then lag-us fee in hand again to discourse of those matters which we have intermitted for a while for like as in afeaver all things that we taffe feem at the first bitter & unfavoury; but when we fee others take without any shew and agnification of dislike the same which we spir out, then we blame no more either meats or drinks. but lay the fault upon our difeafe; even to, when we perceive that other men have entred upon and gone through the same affairs with great alacrity, and without any pain at all, whereof we complained and made much ado; let us for shame cease to find fault and be offended so much at the things. And therefore if at any time there shall befall unto us some adverte and crooked accident against our wils, it wil be very good for the working of our contentment in mind, not to pair over but to regard such things as at other times have hapned to our minds and as we could wish them; but to conferre them together, and by a good medly of them both to darken and dor the work with laying the better to. But now, whereas we are wont when our eyes be dazzled and offended with beholding that which is too bright and glittering to refresh and comfort out fight again with looking upon pleasant colours of flowers, and green graffe; hereincontrariwise we direct our minds and cogitations upon heavy and dolorous objects, and violently force our thoughts to be amuzed upon the remembrance of calamities and adverle fortunes, plucking them perforce as it were from the consideration of better. And here in this place me thinks I may very firly apply that sentence to our present purpose, which was said to a busie and curious person,

Ab firefull minde and most envious hart Why other faults do st thouse quickly spie With eagles sight, but in thine own thou art Stark blinde, or esse do st wink with howlets eye?

Even so good sir, How is it that you regard and advise so willy your own miserie and calamitie, making it alwayes apparent and fresh in remembrance, but upon your present prosperity you set not minde? And like as ventoses, cupping glasses or boxes draw the most corrupt humors to them out of the flesh; even so you gather against your self the worst thing you have, being no better than the merchant of Chio, who when he fold to others a great quantity of the best wine, fought up and downtasting every vessel until he met with that of his own dinner, which began to sowr and was little better than ftark naught. This man had a servant who ranne away; who being demanded what his master had done unto him for which he should shew him a pair of heels? Because (quoth he) when he had plenty of that which was good, he would needs leek for naught. And most men verily are of the same nature, who passing by good and desiderable things, which be (as a man would fay) the pleasant and porable liquors that they have, betake themselves to those that be harsh, bad, and unfavoury. But Aristippus was of another humours for like a wife man and one that knew his owngood he was alwayes disposed to make the best of every occurrence, raising and lifting up himself to that end of the ballance which mounted aloft , and notto that which went downward. It fortuned one day that he lost a fair Mannor or Lordship of his own, & when one of his friends above the rest made most semblance to lament with him, and to be angry with fortune in his behalf; Hear you (quoth he) know you not that your felf have but one little farm in the whole world, and that I have yet three houses more left, with good lands lying to them? Yes mariedo I (quoth the other.) Why then (quoth Aristippu again) wherefore do we not rather pitty your case, and condole with you? For it is meer madnesse to grieve and forrow for those things that are lost and gone, and not to rejoyce for that which is faved. And like as little children, if a man chance to take from them but one of their gauds, among many other roies that they play withall, throw away the rest for very curst-heart, and then sall a puling, weeping and crying out aright stemblably, as much folly and the company of the sall of th diffineffe it were, if when fortune thwarteth us in one thing, we be so farre out of the way and difquieted therewith, that with our plaints and moans we make all her other favours unprofitable unto us. But will some one say, What is it that we have? Nay, What is it that we have not? might he rather fay: One man is inhonour, another hath a fair and goodly house; one hath a wife to his mind, and another a trufty friend.

Antipater of Tarfus the Philosopher, when he drew toward his end and the hour of his death, in recounting and reckoning up all the good and happy dayes that ever he saw in his life time, left not out of his roll io much as the Bon-voiage that he had when he failed from Cilicia to Athens. And yet we must not forget nor omit those blessings and comforts of this life which we enjoy in common with many more, but to make some reckoning and account of them and namely to joy in this, that we live: that we have our health; that we behold the light of the Sunne; that we have neither warre abroad nor civill sedicion and dissension at homesbut that the land yeeldeth it self arable and to be tilled, and the sea navigable to every one that will, without sear of danger; that it is lawfull for us to speak, and keep silence at our pleasure; that we have liberty to negotiate and deal in affairs, or to rest and be at our repose. And verily the enjoying of these good things present, will breed the greater contentment in our spirit, if we would but imagine within our selves that they were absent; namely, by calling to mind eftioons, what a miffe and defire those persons have of health, who be fick and difeased? How they wish for peace, who are afficied with warres? How acceptable it is either to a stranger or a mean person and unknown, for to be advanced unto honour, or to be friended in some samous and puissant City? And contrariwise, what a great grief is this to sorgo these things when a man once hath them? And furely a thing cannot be greater nor precious when we have lost th, and the same of no value and account all the while we have and enjoy it: for the not being thereof, addeth no price and worth thereto. Neither ought we to hold these things right great and excellent, whiles we stand alwayes in sear and trembling to think that we shall be deprived and bereft of them, as if they were some worthy things: and yet all the time that they be sure and fafe in our possession, neglect and little regard them, as if they were common and of no importance, But we ought to make use of them whiles they be ours, and that with joy in this respect especially, that the loffe of them, if it shall so fall out, we may bear more meekly and with greater patience. Howbeit, most men are of his opinion (as Arcestlans was wont to say) that they ought to follow diligently with their eye and cogitation the Poemes, Pictures, and Statues of others, and come cloie unto them for to behold and perule exactly each of them; yea, and confider every part and point therein from one end to the other: whiles in the mean time they neglect and let alone their own lives and manners; notwithstanding there be many unpleasant sights to be spied and observed therein:looking evermore without, and admiring the advancements, welfare and fortunes of others: much like as adulterers who have an eye after their neighbours wives, but loath and fet naught by their own. And verily this one point also is of great consequence, for the setling of a mans minde in sure repose; namely, to consider principally himself, his own estate and condition; or at least wise (if hedo not fo) yet to look back unto those that be his inferiours and under him; and not as the most fort do, who love alwayes to look forward and to compare themselves with their betters and superiors. As for example, flaves that are bound in prison and lie in irons, repute them happy who are abroad at liberty; such as be abroad, think their state blessed who be manumitted and made free; being once franchifed, they account themselves to be in very good case if they were Citizens; and being Citizens they effeem rich men most happy; the rich imagine it a gay matter to be Lords and Princes; Lords and Princes having a long defire to be Kings and Monarchs; Kings and Monarchs aspire still higher and would be Gods; and yet they rest not so, unlesse they may have the power toflash lightnings and shoot thunder-bolts, as well as Jupiter. Thus whiles they evermore come short of that which is above them, and covet still after it, they enjoy no pleasure at all of those things that they have, nor be thankfull therefore,

The Tree figure great I care not for of Gyges King for 1ch in gold i Suchavarice I do abbor, nor money will I touch untold, I never love, dwith Gods above, insheir high work; for to compare: Grand Seigniories I do not love, far from nine eyes all fuch things are,

A Thracian he was that protefled thus, But iome other, that were a Chian, a Galatian or a Bithymian (I dare warrant you) not contenting himself (with his part of honor), credit and authority in his own country and among his neighbours and fellow-citizens, would be ready to we and expossulate the matter with tears, if he might not also wear the habit and ornaments of a Partician or Senator of Rome. And say it were granted and allowed him to be a noble Senator, he would not be quiet until he were a Roman Lord Prator: Be he Lord Prator, he will aspire to a Consulhip's and when he is created Consull, whine he will and crie if he were not nominated and pronounced the former of the tovain, but elected in the fectond place. And I pray you what is all this? What doeth a man herein but gather pretended excuses of ingratitude to Fortune, in punishing and chastizing himself after this manner? But the man who is vuite and of a sound judgement, in case some

angell that guidenthis life, for that his lot is to live farre better, more at hearts eafe, and in greater reputation than many millions of millions of other men. For true it is , that in the folemn games at Olympia, no champion may choose his concurrents with whom he is to wrestle or enter into a combation a prize: but in this life, our state standeth so, and our affairs be in that manner composed, that every man hath means to match, yea, and excel many others, and io to bear himself aloft, that he be rather envied than envious; unlesse haply he be such an one as will presume to deal with Brianeus or Herculisfor the Mastric. Well, when thou shalt behold some great Lord or honorable perionage born aloft in a litter uponmens shoulders stand not wondring so much at him, but rather cast thine eyes down a little lower, and look upon the poor porters that carry him. Again, when thou shalt repute that great Monarch Xerxera right happy man, for that he made a bridge of ships over the Streights of Hellespons; consider withall, those painfull flaves who under the very whip and for fear of kourging, digged thorow the mountain Athos, and made passage that way for an arm of the Sea as also thole milerable wretches, who had their ears cropt and their noses cut off, for that the forciaid bridge by a mighty tempest was injoynted and broken; and therewith imagine by thy self what those filly soulsmight think, and how happy they would repute thy life and condition in comparison of their own. Socratesupon a time, when one of his familiar friends feemed to complain and say. What acottly place is this? How deer are things fold in this City? The wine of Chies will coft a pound; purple is foldfor three, and a pinte of hony is held at five drachmes: Took him by the hand and led him to the Meal-hall Lo (quoth he)you may buy here half a fextar of good meal for a half-penny. The market (God be thanked) is cheap: from thence he brought him to an Oil-tellar, and where they fold Olives: Here you shall have (quoth he) a measure called Chanix, for two brasen dodkins (agood market beleeve me.) He took him then with him to the Brokers shops that fold clothes, where a man might buy a fuir of apparell for ten drachmes, You fee (quoth he) that the pennyworths are reasonable, and things be bought and sold good cheap throughout the City: even so we, when we shall hear other men say; Our state is but mean we are exceeding bare, and our condition is passing base: For why? We cannot come to be Consuls, we shall never be rulers nor governors of Provinces, nor rice to the highest places of authority. We may very well aniwer in this wife; Nay mary, but our case is right good; welive gallantly, and lead a blessed and happy lie; we begnot we go not from door to door to crave folks alms; we are no porters; we bear no burdens; neither like parafites and smell-seafts, do we get our bread by flattery. But foralmuch as we are for the most part grown to this folly, that we are accustomed to live rather according to others than our selves, and our nature is so far corrupted with a kind of jealous affectation and envie, that it joyeth not fo much in her own proper goods, as grieveth at the welfare of another) I would advise you not onely to regard those things that be resplendent, glorious and renowned in those whom you admire and esteem to happy; but also to set open and lift up the vail a little, and to draw(as it were) that glittering curtain of outward flew, apparance and opinion that men have of them, which coverethall, and to to look in. Certes, you shall find that they have within them many matters of trouble, many grievances and discontenuments. That noble Pittaens, so famous for his valor and fortitude, and as much renowned also for wisedome and justice feated upon a time certain of his friends that were strangers: and his wife coming in at mids of the dinner, being angry at somewhat els overthrew the Table and there lay all under foot. Now when his guests and friends were wonderously dismayed and abashed hereat: Puracus made no more ado at the matter, but turning unto them, There is not one of us all (quoth he) but he hath his crosse, and one thing or other to exercise his patience: and for mine own part this is the only thing that checketh my felicity: for were it not for this shrow my wife, I vvere the happiest man in the world: So that of me may these verses be well veri-

Well my mafters, you have many occasions (I am time) that veryou: as for my self I grieve at nothing. Many such secret fores there be that put them to anguish and pain who are rich and in high authority, yea, and trouble Kings and Princes themselves; how soever the common people see no such matter; and why? their pomp and outward glory covereth and hideth all. By these and such like meditations, a man may by little and little spend and diminish that quarrelfome and complaining discontentment of the mind against Fortune in debating, and calling down his own condition with the wonderfull admiration of his neighbours state. But there is nothing that doth so much hurt unto our tranquissity of mind as this, when our affection and will to a thing is disproportioned unto our might and power; as if we set up greater sailes than our vessell will beare, building our hopes and defires as castles in the aire without a found foundation, and promifing our selves more than reason is; for afterwards when by proofe we see, that we cannot reach thereto, and find that the fuccesse is not answerable to our contest, we grumble by and by against fortune, and we blame our destiny; whereas we should accuse our own folly and rashnesse. For neither he that would feeme to shoot an arrow out of a plough; or ride upon an Oxe-back to hunt the Hare; can say that he is unlucky; nor he that goeth about to catch the Hart and Hind with fishers drag-nets, or with grins, mares and traps, may justly find fault with his fortune, and give our that some wicked angell doth crosse him, or malignant spirit haunt him, if he faile and mille of his purpose: but surely such are to condemne their own foolish nesse and incom derate temerity, in at, tempting things impossible. And what might be the cause of such errours and grosse overlight? Surely our fond and blind selfe-love. This is it that causeth men to affect ever to be foremost; this moveth them to firive and contend for the highest place; this maketh them opinionative in every thing, aiming and reaching at all things unfatiable, and never rest contented. For it sufficests them not to be both rich and learned; eloquent withall and mighty; good fellows at the table and pleasant companions; minions and savourites of Kings and Princes; Rulers of Cities, and Governors of Provinces; unlesse they may be masters also of the swiftest and hottest hounds for running the principall horses for service and stomack ; quailes and cocks of the best game for fight; If they faile in any of these, they be cast down, and their hearts are done. Denys the elder of that name, not being contented and fatisfied in mind that he was the most mighty and puissant tyrant in his time; but because he was not a better Poet than Philoxenus, nor able to discourse and dispute so learnedly as Plate; in great choler and indignation he cast the one into a dungeon within the Stone quarries, where malefactors, felons, and flaves were put to punishment; and confined the other as a caitife, and fent him away into the Isle Agine. Alexander the Great was not of that disposition, who when Brifon the famous runner in the race contended with him for the best game in foot-manship, and for the nonce to please the King Gemed to faint and lay behind, and so to yield the honour of the course unto him; being advertised thereof, was mightily offended and dipleased with him for it. Very wifely therefore and aprly to this purpose the Poet Homer when he had given this commendation of Achilles,

Like anto him there is not one in field,

Of all the Greeks that ferve with speare and shield

He inserted presently upon it,

In seats of armes: but for to speake and plead

Others there be who can him teach and lead.

Megabyzus the Persian, a great Lord wentup one day into the shop of Apelles, where he used to paint; and when he was about to speake (I wot not what) as touching painting-craft, Apolle, not enduring to heare him talke to foolithly, flaied him and stopped his mouth, faying prettily thus unto him: Solong fir as you held your tongue you were taken to be some great man by reason of your chaines, corquans, and brooches of gold; your purp'e robes also, which together with your silence commended your person: but now the very prentile boiles here, who grind oaker, and such like colours, are ready to laugh at you, hearing you to talke 10 foolifhly, you know not what. And yet fome therebe who thinke that the Stoicks do but mock and jell when they heare them hold this opinion. That the wife man (fuch as they imagine to themselves) is not only Prident, Just; and Valiant, but ought also to be called an Oratour, a Captaine, and a Poet, a rich and mighty man, yea, and a very King; whiles they themselves will needs be invested in these titles, and if they be not, then they are displeased and miscontent by and by; what reason they have so to be, let them answer. Sure I am, that among the gods themselves some have power one way, and some another; and thereupon took their fundry denominations accordingly, and rest contented therewith: as for example, one is furnamed Engalius, i. e. the god of war; another Mantous, i. e. the president of Propheses; and a third Cerdons, which is as much to fay, as the patron of those that gaine by traffick. And hereupon it is that Jupiter in Homer forbidding Venus to meddle in warlike and martiall affaires, as nothing pertinent unto herstendeth her to weddings and bride-chambers, and bids her attend them. Moreover, somequalities and things there be that we seem to affect and wish; the which are in nature contrary, and will not concur and fort well together: as for example, the profession of eloquence, and the fludy of Arts Mathematical require rest and quiettesse, neither have the students need to be employed in any affaires. Contrariwife, policy and managing of the State and weale-publike, the favours of Princes and Potentate's are not compaffed without much ado i neither can a man be idle at any time, who either is employed in the fervice of his country, or attendant in the Court, Muchfeeding upon flesh, and liberall drinking of wine, maketh (I must needs (ay) the body able and Brong, but the mind feeble and weake. Likewife, the continual and excessive care both in getting and keeping goods, may well augment riches and increase our substance: but surgely it is the contempt and despitement of worldly wealth, that is a great help and meanes to learning and Philosophy. And therefore we may well conclude: that every man is not fit for every thing: but herein each one must be ruled by the sige fentence of Pythins Apolles, and first learne, To know himselse; then marke and observe to what one thing he is most framed and exclined; and thereto both apply and employ his wits, and not to offer violence on ature, and draw her perforce, as it were, a result the haire, to this or that course of life which she liketh not.

Now if there be one that shall be angry with himselfe and displeased, that he is not at once both a savage lion of the forrest, bold and centurous of his own strength, and withall a dainty fine puppy of Mastas. therefined and follered in the lap and bosene of lone delicate dame and rich widdow; cominend me to him for a sentelesse toole of all sooles, and to say a sooth, I hold him also as very an afte and dolt silv soon, who will need be such a one as Empedets, Place, and Demecrius; manely, to write of the world of the nature and rute essence of all things therein, and withall, to keep a rich old trot and sleep with her every night, as Emphorius did; oresse the unto those who kept company with Alexander the great, in drinking and gaming (as one Madius, did) and yet thinke it a great abuse and indignity (fortooth) if he may not be as much admixed for his wealth as Ismenias, and estemed no lesse for his wearth as Ismenias, and estemed no lesse for his vertue than Espanmondus. We see that the runners in a sace benor discontented at all if they were not the garlands and corners of wrestlers, but rest pleased with their own rewards, and therein delight and rejoyce. It is an old saying, and a common proverbe:

Spatra is thy lot and Provine, look well to it, and adone the same. For it is a saying also of wise Solom.

And yet we will not change our boon With them for all their wealth and gold: Goods passe from manto man full soone, Ours vertue is a sure free-hold.

Strato the natural Philosopher, when he heard that Menedemus his Concurrent had many more scholars by far than he: What marvell is that (quoth he) if there be more that defire to be washed and bathed than are willing to be anointed and rubbed. Aristotle writing to Antipater: It is not meet (quoth he) that Alexarder alone should think highly of himselfe, in that he is able to command to many men; but they also have good cause to be as well conceited of themselves, who have the grace to believe of the gods as they ought. For furely, they that thus can make the best use of their own estate shall never be vexed, not at their neighbours welfare pine away for very en-Which of us now doth require or think it fit, that the vine-tree should beare figgs, or the olive grapes? And yet we our felves, if we may not have all at once, to wit, the superiority and preeminenceamong rich men among eloquent oratours and learned clerks, both at home and abroad, in the schooles among Philosophers, in the field among warriers; as well among flattering clawbacks as plaine-tpoken, and tell-troth friends; to conclude, unlesse we may go before all pinching penny-fathers in frugality; yea, and surpasse all spend-thrists in riotand prodigality; we are out of our little wits; we accuse our selves dayly like sycophants; we are unthankfull; we repine and grumble as if we lived in penury and want. Over and besides, do we not see that Nature her selfe doth teach us sufficiently in this point? For like as she hath provided for sundry kinds of bruit and wild beasts, divers forts of food: for all feed not upon flesh, all peck not upon feeds and grains of plants, neither do all live upon roots which they worke for under the ground; even so she hath bestowed upon mankind many means to get their living, while some live by grasing and feeding of cattell, others by tillage, some be Fowlers, others Fishers: and therefore ought every man to chuse that course of life which forteth best with his own nature, and wholly to apply and set his mind thereto; leaving unto others that which pertaineth to them, and not to reprove and convince Hefiedus when he thus speaketh, although not to the full and sufficiently to the point:

The Potter to Potter doth beare envy, One Carperter to another hath a fpightfull eye.

For jealous we are not only of those who exercise the same art, and follow that course of life which we do; but the rich also do envy the learned and eloquent nobe men the rich, advocates and lawyers captious and litigious sophisters; yea, and (that which more is) gentlemen free-borne, and defermed from noble and an ient houses, envy Comedians when they have acted well and with a good grace upon the stage in great Theaters; dancers also and jesters in the court, whom they see to be in favour and credit with Kings and Princes; and whiles they do admire these, and thinke them happy for their good speed and successe in comparison of their own doings they fret and grieve, and out of measure torment themselves. Now, that every one of us hath within himselfe treasures laid up of contentment and discontentment, and certaine tuns of good things and evill; not beflowed as Homer laid, Upon the doore-fill and entry of Jupiters house; but placed in each of our ownminds, the divers paffions whereunto we are subject do sufficiently prove and shew. For such as are foolish and unadvised, do neglect and let go the very good things that presently they have, and never care to enjoy them, to intentive and earnestly bent are their minds and spirits alwaies to that which is comming, and future expectation: whereas wife men on the contrary fide, call to their fresh remembrance those things that are past, so as they seem to enjoy the same as if they were present, yea, and to make that which is no more to be as beneficiallunto them, as if they were ready at hand. For furely that which is present, yeelding it selfe to be touched by us but the least moment of time that is, and immediately passing our tenses, seemeth unto fooles to be none of ours, nor any more to concern us. But like as the Roper which is painted in the Temple of Pluto or defcription of Hell, suffereth an asse behind him tognaw and cate as fast as he twisterh it of the Spart-broome; even so the unthankfull and senselesse oblivion of many ready to catch and devoure all good things as they pale by, yea, and to diffipate and cause to vanish away every honest and nota-ble action, all vertuous deeds, duries, delectable recreations and pleasant patimes, all good seilowthip and mutuall iociety, and all amiable convertation one with another, will not permit that the life be one and the same, linked (as it were) and chained by the copulation of things passed and pre-sent; but dividing yesterday from to day, and this day from the morrow, as if they were lundry parts of our life, bringeth in luch a forgettulnels, as if things once past had never been. As for those verily, who in their diputations and Philosophical discourses admit no augmentation of bodies, affirming that every substance continually fadeth and vanisheth, would make us beleeve in word, that each one of us every houre altereth from himselfe, and no man is the same to day that he was yesterday: but these for fault of memory not able to retaine and keep those things which are done and past, no not to apprehend and estioones call them agains to mind, but juster every thing to passe away and run as it were through a five, do not in word, but in deed and effect, make themselves void and empty every day more than other, depending only upon the morrow, as if those things which were done the yeare past, of late, and yesterday, nothing appertained unto them, nor ever were at all. This is therefore one thing that hindereth and troubleth that aquanimity and repose of ipirit which we seek for: and yet there is another that doth it more, and that is this; Like as flies creeping upon the imooth places of glaffes or mirrors, cannot hold their feet but must need sail down but contrariwise they take hold where they meet with any roughnesse, and slick fast to rugged slaws that they can find; even to these mengliding and glansing over all delectable and pleasant occurrences, take hold of any adverse and heavy calamities, those they cleave unto and remember very well; or rather as (by report) there is about the City Olynthus a certaine place, into which it any flies called Beetles enter in once, they cannot get forth againe, but after they have kept a turning about, and fetching compasses round to no purpose a long time, they die in the end. whereupon it tooke the name of Cantha olethron; femblably, men after they fall to the reckoning up and commemoration of their harmes and calamities pait, are not willing to retire back, north breath themselves and give over multiplying thereupon still. And yet contrariwise, they ought to do after the manner of Painters, who when they do paint a table, do lay upon the ground, or by a course of dead and duikish colours such as be fresh gay and gallant, for to palliate and in some fort to hide the unpleasantnesse of the other, they ought (I say) to smother and keep down the heavinesse of the heart occafioned by some crosse mishaps, with those that have fallen out to their mind; for, to obliterate and wipe them out of their mind quite, and to be freed from them cleane it is not possible: and urely the harmonie of this world is reciprocall and variable, compounded (as it were) of contraries, like as we do see in a harp or bow; neither is any earthly thing under the cope of heaven pure simple, and fincere without mixture. But as Musick doth confist of base and trebble sounds; and Grammer of letters, which be partly vocall, and partlie mute, to wit, vowels and confonants, and he is not to be counted a Grammarian and Mufician, who is offended and displeased with either of those contrarie elements of the Art, but he that affecteth the one as well as the other, and knoweth how to use and mixe both together with skill for to serve his purpose; even so considering that in the occurrences of mans life there be so many contraries, and one weigheth against another in manner of counterpoile; for (according to Euripides)

It cannot standwith our affaires,
That good from bad should parted be:
A medley then of mixed paires
Dothwell, and serves in each degree.

It is not meet that we should let our hearts fall and be discouraged with the one fort when soever it happen, but we ought according to the rules of harmony in Musick, to shop the point alwaies of the worst with strokes of better, and by overcasting misfortunes (as it were) with a vaile and curtaine of good haps, or by setting one to the other, to make a good composition and a pleasant accord in our life, fitting and sorting our own turnes, For it is not as Merander said,

Each man so soon as he is born, One spirit good or angell hath, Which him assists both even and morn, And guides his steps in every path.

But rather according to Empedacles: No looner are we come into the world, but each one of us hath two angels, called Damones: two Destinies (I say) are allotted unto us, for to take the charge, and government of our life, unto which he attributesh divers and fundry names,

Here Clithonic was, adomment dook that hath, Heliope eke, who twrneth to the lun, And Deris she, that loves in blood to bath, Harmonie smiles ever and anon, Calito faire, and Richte soule among, Thoola wift, Dinza show and strong, Nemertes who is lovely white and pure,

But Alaphie with fruit black and objects.

Infomuch, as our Nativity receiving the feeds of each of all these passions blended and consused to gether, and by reason thereof the colorie of our life not being uniforme, but full of disordered and unequal depositions, a man of good and sound judgement ought to wish and defire at Gods hand the better, to expect and looke for the worse, and to make an use of them both, namely, by abridging and cutting off that which is excessive and too much: For not he only (as Epicurus was wont to say) shall come with most delight and pleasure to see themorrow-sin, who made least account thereof on, the even; but riches also, gloty, authority, and rule doth most rejoyet their hearts who least search the contrary: for the vehement and ardent desire that a man hath to any of these things, doth imprint likewise an exceeding feare of forgoing and losing the same, and thereby maketh the delight of enjoying them to be teeble and nothing firme and constant; even as the blase and same of the fire which is blown and driven to and fro with the wind. But the man who is so much assisted with reafon, that he is able without seare and trembling to say unto Fortune:

ห้องเคงินชาว อุร์ตุเร, องโรวอง ช น้าอุร ติร นักกล่นตร. Welcome to messifgood thou bringsift ought, And if thou faile, I will take luttle thought. Or thus; Will ma sifthou take from me some joy of mind,

But little griefe; thou shalt me leave behind.

Hath this benefit by his confidence and resolution: that as he taketh most joy of his good fortunes. when they are present; so he never search the losse of them, as if it were a calamity insuportable. And herein we may as well imitate as admire the disposition and affection of Anaxagoras, who when he heard the news of his fors death, I knew full well (quoth he) when I begot him that die he mult: and after his example, when loever any infortunity hapneth to be ready with these and such like speeches: I know that riches were not permanent but transitory and for aday: I never thought other, but that they who conferred these dignities upon me both might and could deprive me of them: I wift, that I had a good wife and vertuous dame, but withall a weman and no more: I was not ignorant that my friend was a man (that is to fay) a living creature by nature mutable, as Plato wed to fay. And verily, such preparations and dispositions of our affections as these, if peradventure there shall be all unto us any thing against our intent and mind, but not contrary to our expectation, as they will never admit fuch palifonate words as these. (I never thought it would have fallen out so, I was in great hope of other matters, and little looked I for this) so they shall be able to rid us of all sudden pantings and leapings of the heart, of unquiet and disorderly beating of the pulies, and soon stay and lettle the furious and troublesome motions of impatience. Carneades was wont in time of greatest prosperity to put men inmind of a change; for that the thing which hapneth contrary to our hope and expectation is that which altogether and wholly doth breed forrow and griefe. The kingdome of the Macedonians was not an handfull to the Roman Empire and dominion; and yet King Perfess, when he had lost Macedon a, did not only himselfe lament his ownfortune most piteously, but in the eyes also of the whole world he was reputed a most unfortunate and milerable man. But behold Paulu Emylius, whose hap it was to vanquish the said Perseus, when he departed out of that Province, and made over into the hands of another his whole army, with so great command both of land and sea, was crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and so did sacrifice unto the gods with joy ard thankfgiving in the judgement of all men, worthily extolled and reputed as happy. For why? when here cived first that high Commission and mighty power withall, he knew full well, that he was to give it over and refigne it up when his time was expired; wheras Perfeus on the contrary fide. lost that which he never made account to lose. Certes even the Poet Homer hath given us very well to understand how for tible that is which hapnesh besides hope and unlooked for, when he bringeth in Unffer upon his returne, weeping for the death of his dogs but when he face by his own wife, who shed teares plentifully, wept not at all; for that he had long before at his leiture, against this comming home of his prevented and brought into subjection (as it were) by the rule of reason, that passion which otherwise he knew well enough would have broken out; whereas, looking for nothing leffe than the death of his dog, he fell suddenly into it, as having had no time before to represse the same. In sum, of all those accidents which light upon us contrarie to our will; some grieve and vexe us by the course and initing of nature; others (and those be the greater part) we are wont to be oftended and discontented with, upon a corrupt opinion and soolish custome that we have taken: and therefore we should do very well, against such temptations as these, to be ready with that sentence of Monander:

No harme nor losse thou dost sustaine: But that thou list so for to faine.

And how (quoth he) can it concerne thee?

For if no flesh without it wound; Nor soule within, then all is sound.

As for example, the base parentage and birth of thy father, the adultery of thy wife, the loss or repulse of any honour dignity, or preeminence: for what should let notwithstanding all these costies, but that thy body and mind both may be in right good plight and excellent estate? And against those accidents which seem naturally to grieve and trouble us, to wir, maladies, paines, and travels; death of dearefriends, and toward children, we may oppose another saying of Emiples the Alas, alas, and well-a-day; But why alas, and well away? Nought to ushathyet been dealt, But that which daily men have filt.

For no remonstrance nor reason is so effectuall to restraine and stay this passionate and sensual part of our mind, when it is ready to slip and be carried headlong away with our affections, as that which calleth to remembrance the common and natural lnecessity; by meanes whereof a man, in regard of his body, being mixed and compounded, doth expose and offerthis handle (asit were) and vantage whereby fortune is to take hold when she weedleth against him; for otherwise, in the greatest and most principall things he abideth fast and sure. King Demetrius having forced and won the city Megras, demanded of Stip bethe wise Philosopher, whether he had lost any goods in the sackage and pillage thereof? Six (quoth he) I aw not so much as one man carrying any thing of mine away; semblably, when fortune hath made what spoile she can, and taken from us all other things, yet somewhat there remainesh still within our selves,

Which Greeks do what they can or may, Shall neither drive nor beare away.

In which regard we ought altogether so to depresse, debase, and throw down our humane nature, as if it had nothing firme, stable and permanent, nothing above the reach and power of fortune: but contrariwife, knowing that it is the least and worst part of man, and the same traile, brittle, and subject to death, which maketh us to lie open unto fortune and her affaults; whereas in respect of the better part we are masters over her, and have her at command, when there being seated and founded most surely the best and greatest things that we have, to wit, sound and honest Opinions, Arts, and Sciences, good discourses tending to vertue, which be all of a substance incorruptible, and whereof we cannot be robbed: we (Isay) knowing thus much, ought in the confidence of our felves to carry a mind invincible and secure against whatsoever shall happen, and be able to say that to the face of Fortune, which Socrates, addressing his speech indeed covertly to the Judges, seemed to speake against his two accusers, Annus and Melius: Well may Annus and Melius bring me to my death, but hurt or harmemethey shall never be able. And even so Fortune hath power to bring a disease or sicknesse upon a man, his goods the can take away, raile the may a flander of him to tyrant, prince, or people, and bring him out of grace and favour; but him that is vertuous, honest, valiant, and magnanimous she cannot make wicked dishonest, base-minded, malicious, and envious : and in one word, the hath not power to take from him a good habitude, letled upon wisdome and discretion, which wherefoever it is alwaies prefent, doth more good unto a man for to guide him how to live, than the pilot at lea for to direct a fhip in her courle; for furely the pilot, be he never so skilfull, knoweth not how to still the rough and surging billows when he would, he cannot allay the violence of a tempefi, or bluffering wind, neither put into a fafe harbor and haven, or gaine a commodious bay to anchor in at all times, and in every coast, would be never so faine, nor resolutely without feare and trembling, when he is in a tempeth, abide the danger and undergo all; thus far forth only his art ferveth fo long as he is in no despaire, but that his skill may take place;

But the disposition and staied mind of a prudent man, over and besides that it bringest the body into a quiet and calme estate, by dissipating and dispatching for the most part the occasions and preparatives of diseases, and that by continent life, sober diet, moderate exercises, and travels in measure; if shappily there chance some little beginning or indisposition to a passion, upon which the mind is ready to run it selse, as a ship, upon some blind rock under the water, it can quickly

But lay there come upon us some great and extraordinary accident, such as neither we looked for, nor be able by all the power we have, either to overcome or endure; the haven is neare at hand, we may fivim fafely thither out of the body, (as it were) out of a veffell that leaketh and taketh water, and will no longer hold a paffenger: as for foolish folke, it is the feare of death, and not the love of life that cauleth them to cling and flick to close to the body, hanging and clasping thereanto no otherwise than Wyffes to the wild fig tree, when he feared with great horror the gulph Charbdes roaring under him;

Whereas the winds would not permit to stay,

Nor Suffer him to row or Saile away: Displeased infinitely in the one, and dreading searefully the other. But he that in some measure (be it never so little) knoweth the nature of the soule, and casteth this with himselfe: That by death there is a passage out of this life either to a better state, or at least wise not to a worse : Certes, he is furtisfied with no meane wayfaring provision to bring him to the security of mind in this life, I meane the searclesse contempt of death: for he that may (so long as vertue and the better part of the foule (which indeed is proper unto man) is predominant) live pleasantly; and when the contrary passions, which are enemies to nature do prevaile, depart resolutely and without seare, saying thus unto himselfe:

Godwill me fuffer to be gone, When that I will my felfe, anon.

What can we imagine to happen unto a man of this resolution, that should encumber, trouble, or terrifiehim? For wholoever he was that faid, I have prevented thee (O Fortune) I have stopped up all thy avenews, I have intercepted and choaked all the waies of accesse and entry; surely he fortified himselfe not with bars and barricadoes not with locks and keyes, ne yet with mures and walls, but with Philosophicall and sage lesions, with sententious saws, and with discourses of reason, whereof allmenthat are willing be capable. Neither ought a man to discredit the truth of these and such like things which are committed in writing, and give no believe unto them, but rather to admire, and with an affectionate ravishment of spirit embrace and imitate them; yea, and withall tomakea triall and experiment of himselse; first in smaller matters, proceeding afterwards to greater, untill he reach unto the highest, and in no wife to shake off such meditations, nor to shift off and feek to avoid the exercise of the mind in this kind, and in to doing he shall happily find no such difficulty as he thinketh. For as the effeminate delicacy and niceneffe of our mind, amused alwaies and loving to be occupied in the most easie objects, and retiring effloores from the cogitation of those things that fall out crosse, unto such as tend unto greatest pleasure, causeth it to be soft and tender, and imprinteth a certaine daintinesse not able to abide any exercise; so if the same mind would by custome learne and exercise it selfe in apprehending the imagination of a malady, of paine, travell, and of banishment, and enforce it selfe by reason to withstand and strive against each of these accidents, it will be found and seen by experience, that such things which through an erroneous opinion were thought painefull, grievous hard, and terrible, are for the most part but vaine. indeed, deceitfull, and contemptible: like as reason will shew the same if a man would consider: them each one in particular. Howbeit, the most part mightily feare and have in hortor that vericos Menander,

No man alive can safely say, This cafe shall never me affay.

As not knowing how material it is to the exempting and freeing of a man from all griefe and for-row, to meditate before-hand, and to be able to looke open-eyed full against fortune, and not to make those apprehensions and imaginations in himselfe soft and effeminate, as if he were softered. and nourished in the shadow under many foolish hopes which ever yeeld to the contrary, and be not able to relift to much as any one. But to come againe unto Menander, we have to answer unto him in this manner: True it is indeed, there is no man living able to fay. This or this shall never happen unto me; howbeit, thus much may a man that is alive fay and affirme: So long as I live I: will not dothis, to wit, I will not lie; I will never be a couzener nor circumvent any man; I will not. defraud any one of his own; neither will I fore-lay and furprise any man by a wile. This lieth in our power to promise and performe and this is no small matter, but a great meanes to procure tranquillity and contentment of mind. Whereas contrariwife, the remorfe of conscience when as a man is privy to himselfe, and must needs confesse and say: These and these wicked parts I have committed, sesserth in the soulelike an ulcer and sore in the flesh, and leaveth behind it repentance in the foule, which retteth galleth, gnaweth, and fetteth it a bleeding fresh continually. For whereas all other forrows, griefes, and anguishes, reason doth take away; repentance only it doth breed and engender, which together with shame biteth and punisheth it selfe; for like as they who quiver and shake in the seavers called Epioli; or contrariwise burne by occasion of other agues, are more afflicted and more at ease than those who suffer the same accidents by exterior causes, to wit, winters: cold or fummers heat; even so all mischances and casual calamities, bring with them lighter dolors; and paines as comming from without. But when a man is forced thus to confesse,

My felf I may well thank for this , None else for it I lame worthy is. which is an ordinary speech of them who lamentably bewail their sins from the bottom of their famy: whereupon it cometh to passe, that neither house richly and finely furnished, nor heaps of gold and filver; no parentage or nobility of birth, no dignity of effate and authority how high loever, no grace inspeech; no force and power of eloquence; can yeeld unto a mans life such a calm (as it were) and peaceable tranquillity; as a foul and conscience, clear from wicked deeds, simull cogitations and leand defignes, which having the fource and fountain of life (I mean the inward dipofition of the heart) not troubled and polluted, but clear and clenied; from whence all good and iaudable actions do flow and proceed, and the same do give a lively cheerfull, and effectuall operation, even by some divine instinct and heavenly inspiration, together with a bold courage and haughty mind, and withall yeeld the remembrance of a vertuous and well led life, more fweet, pleafant, firm mind, and withall yeeld the remembrance of a vertitions and well iconic, more tweet, picatain, man and permanent, than is that hope whereof Pindaw written, the nuric and foltefic of old age: for we mult not think, that (as Carmerdes was wont to lay) the "Ceniers or perfuming pannes wherein a configuration of the picatain of the pica watered, is ever green, buddeth and flourisheth still, despiting the shamefull error of those who with pound. their plaints moans and wailings, defame this life of ours; laying: Itisa very hell and place of tor-ments, or ellea region of confined and exited fouls, into which they were tent away and banished ments, of cited region of commed and extent tools, throw which they were tent, any and business of heaven. And here Loomnoc choose but highly commend that memorable faying of Diogeness, who feeing once a certain ftranger at Lacedesson deeling and trimming himilest very curiously against a feativall and high-day; What means all this (quoth he) my good iriend? to a good and honest main snot every day in the year a feast and holy daylyes verily, and it we be wife we should think all dayes double feasts, and most folemn gaudy-dayes: for furely this world is a right facred and holy temple, yea, and most divine, beseeming the Majesty of God into which man is inducted and admitred at his nativity, not to gaze and look at statues and images cut and made by mans hand, and such as have no motion of their own, but to behold those works and creatures which that divine spirit and almighty power in wonderfull wiledome and providence bath made and shewed unto us fensibles and yet (as Plato faith) reprefering and retembling intelligible powers, from whence proceed the beginnings of life and moving, namely, the Sunne, the Moon, the Starres; what should I speak of the Rivers which continually fend out fresh water still; and the earth which bringeth forth nourishment for all living creatures, and yeeldeth nutriment likewise to every plant? Now if our life be the imitation of facred mysteries, and (as it were) a protession and entrance into so holy a religion of all others most peried, we must needs esteem it to be full of contentment and continuall joy: neither ought we (as the common multitude doth) attend and wait for the feafts of Saturn, Bacchus, or Minerva and fuch other high dayes wherein they may folace themselves, make merry and laugh, buying their mirth and joy for money, giving unto players, jefters, dancers, and fuch like their hire and reward for to make them laugh. In which heafts and folemnities, we use to fit with great contentment of mind, arraied decently according to our degree and calling, (for no man with to mourn and lament, when he is prosessed in the mysteries of Ceres, and received into that confraternity; no man forroweth when he doth behold the goodly fights of the Pythian games; no man hungreth or fasteth during the Saturnals:) what an indignity and shame is it then that in those seasts which God himself hath instituted, and wherein (as a man would say) he leadeth the dance, or is personally himfelf to give inflitution and induction, men should contaminate, pollute and profaneas they do, dishonoring their life for the most part, with weeping, wailing, sighing and groaning; or at the least-wise in deep thoughts and pensive cares. But the greatest shame of all other is this that we take pleafure to hear the Organs and instruments of musick found pleasantly; we delight to hear birds singing sweetly: we behold with right good will, beasts-playing, sporting, dancing, and skipping seatly; and contrativitiewe are oftended when they howl, roar, sharle, and gnash their teeth, as also when they shew a fierce, stern, and hideous look; and all this while seeing our own lives heavy, sad, travailed and oppressed with most unpleasant passions, most intricate and inexplicable assairs, and overwhelmed with infinite and endlesse cares; yet we will not afford our selves some rest and breathing time;nay, (that which more is) we will not admit the speech and remonstrances of our friends and familiars, whom if we would give ear unto, we might without fault-finding receive the present, remember with joy and thanksgiving that which is past, and without distrust, suspition and lear, expect with joyfull lightfome hope that which is to come.

Of unseemly and naughty Bashfulnesse.

The Summary.

Lihough it be needlesse to stand curiously upon the concatenation and coherence of these matters Ahandled by Plucarch, how they be knit and linked together confidering that he penned these discourses of his at fundry times; and both they who have reduced them into one Volume; and those also who have translated them out of Greek into other languages, have not all followed one order; yet I think verify that this present Treatise, as concerning Nanghty Bastfulnes, is stilly joyned next to the former, as touching therepole and tranquillity of the spirit. For one of the greatest shaking cracks that our foul can receive in her pose anastrangament, of the property of the pr neverthelesse to trouble and confound after a strange fashion the contentment of our spirits, as appeareth plainly in this little book, which deserve the bewell perused and considered by all sorts of people. Now after he ha hishemed what this coillshamefastness is; he declareth that it is no lesse pernicious and hurrfull them imp dency; adding moreover that we ought to take good heed, left in avoiding it, we fall into contrary extremit es, as they down are envious hamelesse, obstinate, idle and disolute. Then he proceedeth to teach us, that the first and principall preservative against this possion is, to hold it for to be most dangerous and deadly, which he doth verific and prove by notable examples. Which done, he prescribes b patricularly, and som point to point, the incommod ties, perili, and misfortunes that come by naughty bashfulnesse, applying thereto good and proper remedies, giving with all many fage and wife counsels, drawn out of Philosophy tending to this scope and marke; that neither the regard of our friends, kinsfolke and familiars, nor yet the respect of any thing else besides, ought to draw from our thought, our mouth or hands, any thing contray to the duty of an honest man: which both for the present and elso all the rest of our life may leave in our foulsthe ciratrice or skar of repentance forrow and heaviness. In conclusion, to the end that we should not commit those deeds in kaste, which afterwards we may repent at leasure; he sheweth that we ought to have beforeour ejesthe hurts and inconveniences caused before by evill lashfulnesses, that the consideration thereof might keep us from falling into fresh and new faults.

Of unseemly and naughty Bashfulnesse.

Mong those plants which the earth bringeth forth, some there are which not onely by their own nature be wilde and favage, and withall bearing no fruit at all; but (that which worle is) (1) in their growth do hurt unto good feeds and fruitfull plants: and yet skilfull gardiners and hufbandmen, judge them to be arguments and fignes not of bad ground, but rather of a kinde and fat foil; semblably the pathons and affections of the mind, simply and in themselves are not good. howbeitthey fpring as buds and flowers from a towardly nature, and luch as gently can yeeld it felt to be wrought framed, and brought into order by reason. In this kinde I may range that which the Creeks cal Δυσασία, which is as much to suy, as a foolish and rustical shamefallness; no evilligne in it felf , howbeitthe cause of evill and naughtinesse. For they that begiven to bash and shame over-much and when they should not , commit many times the same fault that they do , who are shame lesse and impudent : here onely is the difference, that they, when they trelpasse and do amisse are displeased with themselves and grieve for the matter; whereas these take delight and pleafive therein: for he that is graceleffe and past shame, hath no sense or feeling of grief when he hath committed any foul or diffionelt acticontrariwite, who oever be apt to bash and be ashamed quickly, are soon moved and troubled anon even at those things which seem onely dishonest, although they be not indeed. Now, left the aquivocation of the word might breed any doubt, I meanby Djfep.a., immoderatebashsulnesse, whereby one blusheth for shame exceedingly and for every thing, whereupon such an one is called in Greek Difeptin, for that his vilage and countenance together with his mind changeth, falleth and is call down for like as Κατάρμα in Greek is defined to be a fad heavinesse, which cantetha down look; even so, that shame and dismaiednesse which maketh us that we dare not look a man in theface as we should and when we ought, they call Δυσωπία. And hereupon it was that the great Oratout Demesticeness laid of an impudent fellow, that he had in his eyes not zegas, but meers, i.e. harlots playing prettily upon the ambiguity of the word zega, which fignifieth both the round apple in the eyes, and also a maiden or virgin: but contrariwise the overbalhfull perion (whom we speak of the weth in his countenance a mind too soft delicate and effeminate. and yetheflattereth himself herein, and calleth that fault (wherein the impudent person furpasseth him) Shamefassnesse. Now Caso was wont to say, That he loved to see young folk rather to look built than to look pale; as having good reason to acquaint and teach youth to dread shame and reproch more than blame and reproof; yea, and inspition or obloquie, rather than perill

Howbeit, we mult abridge and cut off the excesse and over-much, which is in such timidity and fear of reproch; for that often-times it comerh to passe insome, who dreading no lesse to hear ill and be accused, than to be chastised or punished; for falle hearts are frighted from doing their duty, and in no wife can abide to have an hard word spoken of them. But as we are not to neglect their that are so tender, nor ought to feed them in their seeblenesse of heart; so again, we must not praise their disposition who arettiff and inflexible: such as the Poet describeth, when he saith:

Who fearlesse is, and basheth not all men fast 10 behold; In whom appears the dogged force of Anaxarchus bold:

but we ought to compound a good mixture and temperate medley of both extremities, which mat take away this excessive obstinacy which is impudence, and that immoderate modesty which is meer childishnesse and imbecillity. True it is that the cure of these two maladies is disticult; neither can this excesse both in the one and the other becur off without danger. For like as the skilfull husbandman when he would rid the ground of some wild bushes and fruitlesse plants, he layeth at them mainely with his grubbing hook or mattock, untill he have fet hed them up by the root; or elie let fire unto them and to burneth them; but when he comes to point or cut a vine an apple-tree, or an olive, he carrieth his hand lightly for fear of wounding any of the found wood, in fetching of the superfluous and rank branches, and to kil the heart thereof; even so the Philosopher, entending to pluck out the mind of a young man, either envie, an unkind and favage plant, which hardly or unneth at all may be made gentle and brought to any good nie; or the unleasonable and excessive greedinesse of gathering good or dissolute & disordinate lutt, he never feareth at al in the cutting therof, to draw blood, to presse and pierce hard to the bottom, yea, and make a large wound and deep scar. But when he fet cth to the keen-edge of remonstrance and speech, to the tender and delicate part of the foul, for to cut away that which is excellive or overmuch, to wir, wherein is leated this unmeaturable and theepith bathfulneffe, he hath agreat care and regard, left ere he be aware he cut away therewith that ingenuous and honest shamefaltnesse that is to good and commendable. For we fee that even nurses themselves when they think to wipe away the filth of their little infants, and to make them clean; if they rub any thing hard, other whiles fetch off the skin withall, make the flesh raw and put them to pain. And therefore we must take heed, that in teeking by all means to do out this excessive bashfulnesse utterly in young people, we make them not braien-faced, such as cerenot what is faid unto them, and blush thereat no more then a black dog, and in one word flanding fliff in any thing that they do; but rather we ought to do, as they, who demolifh and pull down the dwelling-houses that be neer unto the temples of the gods; who for fear of touching any thing that is holy or facred, fuffer those ends of the edifices and buildings to stand still, which are next and joyned close thereto; yea, and those they underprop and stay up, that they should not fall down of themselves; even so (Isay) beware & fear we must, whiles we be tempering about this immoderate shamefacednessefor to remove it, that we draw not away with it grace & modelly, gentleness and debonarity, which be adjacents and lie close unto it; under which qualities lyeth lurking and flicketh close to, the forefaid naughty bashfulnesse, flattering him that is possessed therewith, as if he were full of humanity, courtene, civility and common fense; not opinionative, severe, inflexible and untractable : which is the reason, that the Stoick Philosophers, when they dispute of this matter, have diffinguished by severall names, this aptness to blush or over-much bashfulnesse, from modesty and shame-facednesse indeed: for fear lest the aquivocation and ambiguity of one common word, might give some occasion and vantage to the vicious passion it self to do some hurt. As for us, they muligive us leave to ule the tearms without calumniation, or rather permit us to diffinguish according to Homer, when he faith,

Shame is a thing that do h not mickle harm, and profiteth as much.

neither without good cause is it, that in the former place he putteth down the harm and discommodity thereofsforfure'y it is not profitable but by the means of reason, which cutteth off that which is superfluous, and leaveth a mean behind,

To comethen unto the remedies thereofit behoveth them first & formost: who are given to b'uthing at every imalimatter, to believe and be perswaded, that he is possessed with such an hurtfull passion: (now there is nothing hurtfull, which is good and honest) neither ought he to take pleasure and delight when he shall be tickled in the ear with praises and commendations, when he shall hear himself called gentle jolly and courteous, in seed of grave, magnanimous and just; neither let him do as Pegafus the hericin Euripides, who

When mount his back Bellerophontes should,
With trembling stony'd more than his own self would,
that is to say, give place and yield after a base manner to the demands and requests of every man; or object limitest to their will and pleasure, for sear (torsooth) lest one should say of him Lo, what a hard man is this? See how inexorable he is. It is reported of Bacchorus a King of Egypt, that being rough, fel & austere, the goddesse Iss sent the serpent called Apis, for to wind and wreath about this head, & loto cast a shadow over him from above, to the end that he might be put in mind to judge aright: but this excessive shamefastnesse which alwayes overspreadeth and covereth them, who are not manly but faint-hearted and effeminate, not inflering them once to dare, to deny, or gain[ay any thing, urely, would avert and withdraw judges from doing justice, close up their mouths, that in counsels and consultations should deliver their opinion frankly; yea and caule them both to say and do many things inconfiderately against their mind, which other whiles they would not. For look whosoever is most unreasonable and importunate, he will ever tyrannize and domineer over fuch an one, forcing by his impudency the bashfulnesse of the other by which means, it comets to passe that this excellive shame like unto a low piece of soft ground which is ready to receive all the water that comes, and apt to be overslowed and drowned, having no power to withstand and repulse any encounter, norsay a word to the contrary what soever is proposed, yeeldeth accesse to lewdeft ceignes, afts and passions that be. An evill gardian and keeper of childhood and young age, is this excessive bashfulnesse, as Brutus well said, who was of this mind, that neither he nor she could well and honefly passe the flower of their fresh youth, who had not the heart and face to refuse and deny any thing: even so likewise, a bad governesse it is of the bride-bed and womens chamber, according to that which she said in Sophocles to the adulterer, who repented of the

Thy flattering words have me seduced, And so perswaded, I am abased

In such sort as this bashfulneis, over and besides, that it is vicious and faulty it self, spoileth and marreth clean the intemperate and incontinent person, by making no resistance to his appetites and demands, but letting all lie unfortified, unbarrd, and unlockt, yeelding easte accesse and entrance to thosethat will make assault and give the attempt, who may by great gifts and large offers catch and compasse the wickedest natures that be : but surely by perswasions and inductions, and by the means withall of this excessive bashfulnesse, they oftentimes conquer and get the mastry even of fuch as are of honest and gentle disposition. Here I passe-by the detriments and damages that this ballifulnesse hath been the cause of, in many matters, and that of profit and commodity: mamely, how many men having not the heart to say nay, have put forth and lent their mony even to those whose credit they distrust; have been sureries for such as otherwise they would have been loth and unwilling to engage themselves for, who can approve and commend this golden sentence (written upon the temple of Apollo) Be surety thou mailt, but make account then to pay: howbeit, they have not the power to do themselves good by that warning, when they come to deal in the world. And how many have come unto their end and died by the means of this foolish quality, it werehard to reckon. For Creon in Euripides when he spake thus unto Medea

For me Madame, it were much better now by flat denyall your mind: to discontent, Than having once thus yeeldedyon figh afterwards full fore, and ay repent.

gave a very good lefton for others to follow; but himfelf overcome at length through his foolish bashfulnesse, granting one day longer of delay at her request, overthrew his own state, and his whole house. Some there were also who doubting and suspecting that there were laid for, to be bloodily murdered, or made away by poison, yet upon a foolish modely not resusing to go into the place of danger, came to their death and were foon destroyed. Thus died Dion; who notwithstanding he knew well enough that Callippes laid wait for him to take away his life, yet (for footh) abashed he was to distrust his friend and host, and so to stand upon his gaid. Thus was Antipater the fon of Cassander massacred; who having first invited Demetries to supper, was bidden the morrowafter to his house likewise, and for that he was abashed to mistrust Demerrius, who the day before had trusted him, refused not to go, but after supper he was murdered for his labour. Moreover, when Polysperchon had undertaken and promised unto Cassander for the summe of one hundred talents to kil Hercules (a baseion of King Alexander by lady Barfine) he sent & requested the said Hercules to sup with him in his lodging, the young gentleman had no liking at all to such bidding, but mistrusting and searing his curtesse, alledged for his excuse that he was not well at ease: whereupon Polysperchon came himself in person unto him, and in this manner began to perswade: Above all things my good child (quoth he) findy and endeavour to imitate the humanity and lociable nature of your noble father, unlesse haply you have me in jealousie and suspicion, as if I went about to compasse your death. The youth was abashed to hear him say so, and went with him; well, supper was no iooner ended but they made an end of the young gentleman also, and strangled him outrights o that it is no ridiculous and foolish advertisement (as some let not to say) but a wise and sage advise of Hefiodus when he faith;

Thy friend and lover to supper do invite, Thy foe leave out, for he will thee requite.

Be not in any wife bashfull and ashamed to refuse his offer whom thou knowest to have thee: but never leave out and reject him once who seemeth to put his trust and confidence in thee: for if thou do invite thou shalt be invited again; and if thou be bidden to a supper & go, thou canst not choose but bid again; if thou abandon once thy distrust and distidence, which is the gard of thy satty, and so marre that good tincture and temperature by a foolish shame that thou hast, when thou darest not

Seeing then that this infirmity and malady of the mind, is the cause of many inconveniences, assay wemult to chase it away with all the might we have by exercise, beginning at the first like as men do in other exercises, with things that are not very difficult, nor such as a man may boldly have the face to deny : as for example, if at a dinner one chance to drink unto thee; when thou half drink lufficiently already; be not abashed to refuse for to pledge him, neither forcethy self, but take the sup at his hand and let it down again on the board again, there is another perchance that amids his cups thallengeth thee to hazzard of to play at dice ibe not ashamed to say him hay, neither fear thoual though thou receive a sout and coff at his hands for deniall; but rather do as Xenophines did, when one Lasus the some of Hermiones called him coward, because he wouldnot play at dice with him: I confesse (quoth he) I am a very dastard in those things that be lewed and naught, and I dare do nothing at allimoreover, say thou fall into the hands of a practing and talkative busie, body, who catcheth hold on thee, hangeth upon thee and will not let thee go?be not sheepish and bashfull; but interrupt and cut his tale (hort, shake him off I say, but go thou forward and make an end of thy busineffe whereabout thou wentest: for such refusals, such repulses, shifts and evalious insmall matters, for which men cannot greatly complain of us exercising us not to blush and be ashamed when there is no caule, do inure and frame us vvell before-hand unto other occasions of greater importance. And here in this place, it were not amisse to call unto remembrance a speech of Demosthenes: for when the Athenians being solicited and moved to fend aid unto Harpalus, were so forward in the action that they had put themselves in armes against King Alexander, all on a sodain they discovered upon their own coasts Philoxenus, the Lieuzenant-generall of the Kings forces, and chief Admirall of his Armado at Sea: now when the people were so associated upon this unexpected occurrent, that they had not a word to lay for very fear: What will these men do (quoth Demossbenes) when they shall lied the Sun who are so assaud that they dare not look against a little Lamp; even so I say to thee that art given much to blush and be abashed: What wilt thou be able to do in weighty affairs, namely, when thou shalt be encountred by a King; or if the body of some people or state be earnest with thee to obtain ought at thy hand that is unreasonable when thou half not the heart to refuse forto pledge a familiar friend if he chance to drink unto thee and offer thee a cup of wine? or if thou can't not find means to escape and wind thy self out of the company of a babling busie. body, that hath fastened and taken hold of thee, but infer such a vain prating fellow as this to walk and lead thee athis pleature up and down, having not so much power as to say thus upto him: I will see you again hereaster at some other time, now I have no leysure to talk with

Over and besides, the exercise and use-of breaking your selves of this bashfulnesse in prassing, others for small and light matters, will not be unprostable unto you; as for example say, that when, you are at a feast of your riends, the harper or ministell do either play or fing you of tunes; or judge, an Actor of a Comedie, dearly hired for a good piece of money, by his ill grace in acting, marke the play and digrace the Author himself Menander, Se yet neverthelesse, the vulgar for a papaland, chap. their hands, and highly commend and admire him for his deed : in mine advice it would be no great pain or difficulty for thee to give him the hearing with patience and filence, without praising him after a fervile and flattering manner, otherwise than you think it meet and reason; for it in such things as thele you be not malter of your felf, how will you be able to hold, when tome dearfriend of yours shall read unto you either some foolish rime or bad poelie that himself hath composed ? if. he shall shew unto you some oration of his own foolish and ridiculous penning? you will fall a praiting of him, will you'vou will keep a clapping of your hands with other flattening is ke? I would not be a clapping of your hands with other flattening is ke? I would not be the last commit fome group fault in great ter marrers? how shall you be able to admonish him, if he chance to forget himself in the administration of some magistracy, or in his carriage in wedlock, or in politick government? And verily, for mine own part. I do not greatly allow and like of that aniwer of Periolei, who being requested by, a friend to bear falle witnesse in his behalf, and to binde the same with an oath, whereby he should, be fortworn: I am your friend (quoth he) as far as the altar; as if he should have faid: Saving my conscience and duty to the gods: for furely he was come too neer already unto him. But he who hath accustomed himself long before, neither to praise against his own mind, one who hath made an oration, nor to applaud unto him who hath fung, nor to laugh heartily at him who came out with some stale or poor jest which had no grace; he will ('I trow) never suffer his friend and familiar to proceed to farre, as to demand such a request of him; or once he to bold as, to move him (who before had resulted in smaller trifles to satisfie his desire) in this manner Be perjured for me ; bear falle widhelle for my lake; or pronounce an unjust sentence for the love

After the same manner we ought to be prepared and provided before-hand against those shat be instant to borrow mony of us, namely, if we have been used to deny them in matters that neither be of great moment nor hard to be refused. There was one upon a time, who being of this mind, that, there was nothing to honest as to crave and receive, begged of Archelaus the King of Macedonis (as he late at tupper) the cup of gold whereout he drunk himself: the King caled unto his page that, wasted at his trencher; and commanded him to give the faid cup into Europears, who late, the hoard and withall, casting his eye wiltly upon the party who craved it. As for you in the country of the cup in the party who craved it. As for you are for your asking to go without; but Europades deferves to have, though he do not care.

crave. A worthy speech, importing thus much, that the judgement of reason ought to be the best matter and guide to direct us in our gifts and free liberality, and not bashfulnesseand shameto demy. But we contratiwife neglecting and delpiting many times those that be honest and modest per-sons, yea, our very samiliar friends, who have need of our help, and seem to request the same, are ready to bestow our bounty upon such as incessantly importune us with their impudent craving, not for any affection that we have to pleasure them, but because we can not finde in our heart to say them nay. Thus did King Antigonus the elder to Bins, after he had been a long time an importunate begger: Give this Bins (quoth he) a talent, for me thinks he will have it perforce and yet this Autigoma, of all Princes and Kings that ever were, had the best grace and most descrity to put by, and shift off such unreasonable beggers: for when a beggerly Cynicall Philosopher craved once at his hands a drachmist is not for a King (quoth he) to give a drachmist why then (quoth the other again) give me a talent: Neither is it meet (quoth the King) for a Cynick to receive a talent. Diogenes as he walked other whiles along the Ceranicum (that is, a ffreet in Athens, where flooderected the startes of worthy personages) would ask alms of those images; & when some marvelled at him therfore:I do it (quoth he) to learn how to take a repulse & denial, Semblably, we ought first to be trained in small matters, and to exercise our selves in denying slight requests unto such as would seem to demand and have at our hands that which is not fit and requifite, to the end that we may not be to feek for an answer when we would deny them in matters of greater importance : for as Demost 'enes was wont to fay: He who hath spent and bestowed that which he had otherwise than he should, will neveremploy those things which he hath, nor as he ought, if peradventure he should be surnished again therewith. And look how often we do sail, and be wanting in honest things, and yet abound in superfluities, it is a signe that we are in great fault, and many wayes shame grovveth to

Moreover, lo it is, that this excellive ballfulnelle is not onely a bad and undiffreet fleward to difpense and disperse our money, but also to dispose of our serious affairs and those of great consequence, wherein it will not admit the advice and counfell that reason giverh; for oftentimes it falleth out, that when we be fick, we fend not for the best and most expert Physicians, in respect of some friend, whom we favour and reverence to, as we are loth to do otherwise than he would advise us: likewife we chuse for masters and teachers of our children, not those alwayes who are best and meetelf, but such as make sute and means unto us for to be enterteined; yea, and many times, when we have a cause to be tried in the law, we choose not alwayes the most sufficient and expert Advocates or Barristers for our counsel to plead for us; but for to gratifie a sonne of some familiar triend or kindfild of our own, we commit the cause to him for to practice and learn to plead in Court to our great cost and losse. To conclude we may see many of those that make protession of Philo-sophyto wir, Epicureaus, Stock is and others, how they follow this or that seet, not upon their own judgement and election; but for that they were importuned by some of their kinssolk, or triends thereto whom they were loth to denie. Come on then, let us long before be exercised against such große faults in vulgar, imall and common occasions of this life; as for example, let us break our selves from ulting either a barberto trim us, or a painter to draw our picture, for to fatisfie the appetite of our foolish shamefacednesses most lodging also in some bad Inne or Hosteline where there is a better neer at hand, because haply our hoast the goodman of the house hath often times salved us kindely; but rather make we a cultome of it, (although there be but small difference and ods between one and another) diwayes to thuse the better and like as the Pythagoreans observed evermore precisely not to croffe the right legge with the left, neither to take an odde number for an even, though otherwise all things else were equal and indifferent; even so are we to draw this into an ordinary practife, that when we celebrate any folemn facrifice, or make a wedding dinner, or fome great feath, we invite not him, who is wont with reverence to give us the gentle greeting and good morrow, or who leeing us a great way offuleth to runne unto us, rather than him whom we know to be an honest man and a well-willer of outs; for wholoever is thus inured and exercised long before, shall be hardly caught and surprised; nay rather he shall never be once assailed and set upon in weighty matters. And thus much may suffice as conching exercise and cu-

Moreover to come unto other profitable inflructions which we have gathered for this purpole, the pilincipall in mine advice is this, which sheweth and teacheth us, that all the passions and mala-dies of the milide be ordinarily accompanied with those inconveniences which we would seem to avoid by their means: as for example, ambitton and define of honor hack commonly, attending upon it difficults pain utually followern the love of pleafures; labour and travell enfueth upon eate and delicacy; repulle, overthrows, and condemnations are the ends that enfue daily upon those that are given to be little in the content of the condemnation and conquer others, semblably it hapneth utile excellence behaviored by the condemnation and then the moke of blanne, callent it self-into the very fire and flame of infante. For those who be abashed to gain-lay and denie them, who importune them unrealouably and will take no nay in things unjust, are confirmed afterwards to bear belt hame and blame at their hands, who justiveall them to their answer and accuse them worthings the street of th ney, as being loth to fay they have none; within a while after (with shame enough) they blush, when they shall be convinced to have had none; and having promised to assist and stand to some who have fuit in law, by that meanes are forced to contend with others, and afterwards being ashamed thereof, are driven to hide their heads and flie out of the way. Also there be many whom this foolish modelty hath caused to enter into some disadvantagious promise as touching the marage either of daughter or fifter, and being entangled therewith have been confirmined afterwards upon change of mind to breake their word and faile in their promise; as for him who said in old time; that all the inhabitants of Asia served as slaves unto one man; for that they knew not how to pronounce one only negative syllable, that is, No; he spake not in earness, but by, way of bourd, and was disposed to jest: but surely these bashfull persons may if they list without one word spoken, By kritting and bending their brows only, or nodding downward to the ground, avoid and escape many offices and abiturd inconveniences, which oftentimes they do unwillingly and only upon importunity. For as Euripides faid very well,

Of naughty Bashfulnesse.

Wife men do know how things to take: And of silence an answer to make.

And happily we have more cause to take that course with such as be senselessed unreasonable: for to those who be honest, sensible, and of more humanity, we need not seare to make excuse and satisfie them by word of mouth. And for this purpose it were not amisse to be furnished with anlivers and notable apophthegmes of great and famous persons in times past; and to have them ready at hand to alledge against such importunate and impudent fellows. Such was that saying of Pho-tion to Antipater: You cannot have me to be your friend and a flatterer too; likewise the answer which he made unto the Athenians, who were earnest with him to contribute and give somewhat toward the charges of folemnizing a great feast, and withall applauded and clapped their hands: It were a shame (quoth he) that I should give any thing over and above unto you, and not to pay that which I owe to him yonder, pointing therewith to Callicles the uturer: for as Thucydides faid; It is tio shame to confesse and acknowledge poverty; but more shamefull it is indeed not to avoid and esthew it. But he who by reason of a saint seeble, and delicate heart dare not for foolish shame anfiver thus unto one that demandeth to borrow money,

My friend, I have in house or purse

No filver white for to dishirfe.

And their sufferest to passe out of his mouth a promise (as it were) an earnest penny or pawne of affurance.

Is tied by foot with fetters not of braffe Nor iron wrought; but shame, and cannot passe.

But Perfess, when he lent forth a summe of money to one of his familiar friends and acquaintance, went into the open market place to passe the contract at the very banke or table of exchangers and usurers; being mindfull of that rule and precept of the Poet Hefodus, which teacheth us in these words,

> However thou laugh with brother more or leffe, With him make no contrast without witnesse.

Now when his friend marvelled hereat and faid, How now Perfeus, to formally and according to law ? Yea, (quoth he)because I would receive my money againe of you friendly, and not require it by course and suit of law. For many there be, who at the first upon a kind of foolish modesty are abaffied to call for affurance and security, but afterward be forced to proceed by order of law, and so make their friends their enemies. Againe, Caro fending commendatory letters unto Denis the Tyrant in the behalfe and favour of one Helicona Cyzicene, as of a kind, modelt, and courteous perion subscribed in manner of a post-date under his letter thus: That which you read above, take it as written in the commendation of a man, that is to fay, of a living creature by nature mutable, Confrance in the Confrance i and yeelding to a kind of foolish modesty of his own, recommended in his letters unto Polysperchon, a man of no worth or quality, asit proved afterwards by the sequell: Now when as that Macedoman Lord bade the party welcome, and friendly gave him his hand, and withall used some words of course and complement, demanding whether he had need of ought, and bidding him call for what he would : he made no more adoe but craved a whole talent of filver at his hand; which Polyferohon caused presently indeed to be weighed out unto him; but he dispatched his letters withall unto Nender des to this effect: That from thenceforth he should be more circumspect, and consider better whom he recommended antohim: and verily, herein only was the errour of Xenocrates, for that he knew not the man for whom he wrote: but we oftentimes knowing well enough that they be lewed and naughty persons, yet are very forward with our commendatory letters; yea; and that which more is, our parie is open unto them; we are ready to put money into their hands to our own Hinderance and damage; not with any pleafare that we take not upon affection unto them, as they do; who beltow their fiver upon currezans pleafants, and flatterers to gratifie them; but as displeased and discontented with their impudency, which over-turneth our reason uplide down, and forceth us to de against our own judgement, in luch fort, that if ever these were cause besides, we stay with good reason say unto these bold and shamelessebergers, that thus take vantage of our bathfulneffe:

I see that I must for your sake, Lewd courses ever undertake.

Namely, in bearing falle witnesse, in pronouncing wrong judgement; in giving my voice at any elestion for an unworthy and unmeet person; or in putting my money into his hands, whom I know uninflicient, and who willnever repay it. And therefore of all passions, this leud and excessive modelty is that which is accompanied prejently with repentance, and hath it not following afterwards as the relt: for at the very instant when we give away our money, we grieve; when we beare such witnesse, we blush; when we assist them and setto our helping hand, we incur infamy; and if we furnish them not with that which they require, we are convinced as though we were not able And foraimuch as our weakenesse is such, that we cannot deny them simply that which they would have; we undertake and promise many times unto those who do importune and lye upon us unceflantly, even those things that we are not able to compaffe and makegood; as namely, our commendatory letters for to find favour in Princes courts; to be mediators for them unto great rulers and governors, and to talke with them about their causes; as being neither willing, nor io hardy as thus to fay, The King knoweth not us, he regardeth others more, and you were better go to luch and luch. After this manner, when Lyfander had offended King Agefilans, and incurred his heavy displeature, and yet was thought worthy to be chiefe incredit above all those that were about him, in regard of the great opinion and reputation that men had of him for his noble acts, he never bashed to repel and put back those suters that came unto him, making excuse, and bidding them to goe unto others, and affay them, who were in greater credit with the King than himfelfe. For it is no shame not to be able to effect all things, but for a man to be driven upon a foolish modely to enterprise such matters as he is neither able to compasse nor meet to mannage; besides that it is shamefull, I hold also a right great corrosive to the heart.

But now to go unto another principle, we ought willingly and with a ready heart to do pleasure unto those that request at our hands such things as be meet and reasonable; not as stored thereto by a rusticall teare of shame, but as yeelding unto reason and equity. Contrativitie, if their demands be hurtfull absurd, and without all reason, we ought evermore to have the saying of Zeno in readinesse, who meeting with a young man one of his acquaintance, walking close under the towner wall see retly as if he would not be seen; asked of him the cause of his being there, and understanding by him that it was because he would avoid one of his friends, who had been earnest with him to bearefalse witnesse in his behalfe: What saiest thou (quoth Zeno) for that thou art? Was thy friend to bold and shamelesse to require that of thee which is unreasionable, unjust, and hurtfull funto thee? And darest thou not stand against him in that which is just and honest? For whose-ver he was that faid,

A crooked wedge is fit to cleape

Teacheth us an ill leffon, to learne to be naught our felves when we would be revenged of naughtineffe. But fuch as repulfe those who impudently and with a fhameleffeface do moleft and trouble them, not fuffering themfelves to be overcome with shamefacednesse, but rather shame to grant unto shameleffe beggers those things that be shamefull are wisemen and well advised, doing herein that which is right and just. Now as touching those importunate and shamelesse persons, who other wise are but obscure, base and of no worth, it is of no great matter to resist them when they be trouble-ione unto us. And some there be who make no more ado but shift them off with laughter or a scotle: like as Theorism ierved twaine who would seeme to borrow of him his rubber or currying combe in the very baine: of which two, the one was a meere stranger unto him, the other he knew well enough for a notorious theese: I know not you (quoth he light, the ones and to the other, I know what you are wellenough; and so he seuthen both away with a meere strump. Lysmache the Prickets of Mintrova in Athens, surnamed Polias, that is, the Patronesse of the City; when certaine Muletters who brought acrifices unto the temple, called unto her for to powerthem out drinke iteely: No (quoth she) my good friends, I may not do so, for feare you will make a cutome of it.

Antigona had under him in his retinue a young gendeman, whose father in times past had been a good warriour, and led a band or company of fouldiers, but himselfe was a very coward, and of no fest ice, and when he fired unto him (in regard of his birth) to be advanced unto the place of his tarber late decealed: Young man (quoth he) my manner is to recompence and honour, the prowers and manhood of my fouldiers, and not their good parentage. But if the parry who assaileth our modelly be not a nobleman of might and authority (and fuch kind of persons of all other will most haddly endure a repulse and be put off wich a deniall or excuse, and namely, in the case of giving sentence or award in matter of judgement, or in a voice at the election of Magistraces) peradvenue it may be thought neither easie nor necessary to do, that which Care sometimes did, being then but of young yeares, unto Caristus: Now this Carulus was a man of exceeding great authority among the Romans, and for that time bare the Censureship, who came unto Caro, then Lord high Treasurer of Romethat yeare) as a mediatour and intercession from ewho had been condemned before by Care in a round sine, pressing and importuning him so hard with earnest prayer and entreaty. that in the end Caro feeing how urgent and unreasonable he was, and not able to endure him any longer, was forced to tay thus unto him: You would thinke it a foule disgrace and shame for you Candin, Centour as you are, fince you will not receive an answer and begone, if myser jeants and officers here should take you by the head and shoulders and send you away: with that (a ulie, being abashed and ashamed, departed in great anger and discontentment. But consider rather and see, whether the aniwer of Agefilians and that which Themsfooles made were not more modest, and favoured of greater humanity: for Agefilau, when his own father willed him to give lenten e in a certaine cause that was brought beforehim, against all right, and directly contrary to the laws: Father (quoth he) your felle have taught me from my very child-hood to obey the laws; I will be therefore obedient full to your good precepts, and paffe no judgement against law. As for Themisfoeles, when as Somenides feemed to requelt of him fomewhat that was unjust and unlawfull: Neither were you Simonides (quoth he) a good Poet, if you should keep time and number in your long, nor I a good Magiftrate if I should judge against the law. And yet (as Platowas wort to say it is not for want of the proportion between the neckand body of the Lute, that one City is at variance with another City, and friends fall out and be at difference, doing what mischiefe they can one to another, and fuffering the like againe; but for this rather, that they offend and faile in that which concerneth law and justice. Howbeit, you shall have some, who themselves observing the precise rules most exactly according to art in Musick, in Grammaticall Orthography, and in the poeticall quantity of fyllables and measures of feet, can be in hand with others, and request them to neglect and forget that which they ought to do in the administration of government, in passing of judgements, and in their other actions. And therefore with such as these be, I would have you take this course which I will now tell you: Is there an Advocate or Rhetorician that doth importune you fitting as judge upon the bench? Or is there an Oratour that troubleth you with an unreasonable sute as you st in counsell? Grant them both that which they request, upon condition that the one in the entry of his plea will commit a folectime or incongruity, and the other in the beginning of his narration come out with some barbarisme: but it is all to nothing, that they will never do so, it would be thought such a shame; and in very truth, we see that some of them are so fine eared that they cannot abide in a speech or sentence that two vowels should come together: againe, Is he one of the nobility, or a man of honour and authority, that troubleth you with some unhonest sute? Will him likewise for your fake to passe thorow the market place hopping and dancing, making mowes, and writhing his mouth; but if he deny to to do, then have you good occasion and fit opportunity to come upon him with this revy, and demand of him, whether of the twaine bemore dishonelt? To make incongruity in speech, and to make mows, and fetthe mouth away, or to breake the laws, commit perjury, and beside all right, equity, and conscience, to award and adjudgemore note bewed and wicked, than to good and honest persons. Moreover, like as Nicostratus the Argive answered unto Archidamus, who follicited him with a good sum of money (promising him besides in marriage what Lady he would himielse chuse in all Lacedamon) to betray and render up by treaton the Town Cromnum: I fee well (quoth he)O Archidamsu, that you are not descended from the race of Hercules, for that he travelled thorow the world, killing wicked persons whom he had ranquified, but your fludy is to make them wicked who are good and honeft; even so we ought to lay unto him who would be thought a man of worth and good marke, and yet commeth to presse and force us to commit those deeds which are not befitting, that he doth that which beleemeth not his nobility or opinion of vertue,

Now if they be meane and base persons to account, who shall thus tempt you go thus to worke withduch: If he be a coverous miler, and one that loveth his money too well; fee and try whether you can induce and perfeyade him by all importunity to credit you with a talent of filver upon your bare word without ichedule, obligation, or specialty for his security; or if he be an ambitious and vain-glorious person, try if you can prevaile with him so much, as to give you the upper-hand or higher feat in publike place; or if he be one that defireth to beare rule and office, affay him, whether he will give over his possibility that he hath to such a Magistracy, especially when he is in the ready way to obtaine it? Certes, we may well thinke it a very strange and about thing, that such as they in their vices and passions should stand and continue so stiffe, so resolute, and so hard to be removed; and we who professe and would be reputed honest men, lovers of vertue, justice, and egnity, cannot be malters of our felves, but fuffer vertue to be subverted, and cast it at our heeles. For if they, who by their impunity urge our modesty, do it either for their oven reputation or their authority, it were abfund and beside the purpose for us to augment the honour, credit, and authority of another, and to dishonour, discredit, and disgrace our selves; like unto those who be in an ill name, and incur the obloquie of the world, who either in publike and solemne games defraud those of the prizes and revvards who have archieved victory, or who at the election of Magistrates deprive those of their right of suffrages and voices to vyhom it doth belong, for to gratific others that deferve it not, thereby to procure to the one fort the honour of fitting in high places, and to the other the glory of vveating coronets, and so by doing pleasure unto others, falshe their oven faith, defame themselves, and lose the opinion and reputation they had of honesty and good conscience. Novy if vvesee that it is for his oven lucre and gaine that any one urge us beyond all reaton to do a thing; how is it that we do not prefently confider, that it is about and without all fense to hazard and purto comprimite (as it yvere) our oven reputation and vertue for another man to the end that the purie of fome one (I know not who) should thereby be more weighty

But certainly many there be unto whom such considerations as these are presented, and who are not ignorant that they tread afide and do amifle; much like to them, who being challenged to drink off great bowls full of wine take pains to pledge them with much ado even folong till their eyes he ready to flart out of their heads, changing their countenance, and panting for want of wind, and all to pleasure those that put them to it. But surely this feeblenesse of mind and faint heart of theirs relembleth the weake conflictution and temperature of the body, which cannot away either with fcorching heat, or chilling cold. For be they praised by those who set upon them thus impudently, they are ready to leape ut of their skins for joy; and lay, they doubt for to be accused, checked, rebuked, or suspected, if happily they deny, then they are ready to die for woe and feare. Bur we ought to be well defended and fortified against the one and the other that we yeeld neither to them that terrifie is, nor to those that flatter us. Thurydides verily supposing it impossible for one to be greator in high place and not envied, faith, That themans well advited and led by good counsell who shooteth at the greatest and highest affairs, it he must be subject unto envy. For mine own part, thinking as I do, that it is no hard matter to escape envy, but to avoid all complaints, and to keep our selves from being molested by some one or other that converse with us and keep our company, a thing impossible: I suppose it good counsell for us, and the best thing we can do for our ownistery, to incur rather the ill-will and dispeasure of lewd, importunate, and unreasonable people, than of those who have just cause to blame and accuse us, it against all right and justice we satishe their minds, and be ready to do them service and pleasure: as for the praises and commendations which proceed from such lewd and shamelesse persons, being as they are in every respect counterfeit and tophisticall, we ought to beware and take heed of; neither must we fuffer our selves as fivine to be rubbed, icratched or tickled, and all the vihiles stand still and gently, letting them do with us what they will, untill they may with ease lay us all along, when we have once yeelded to be to handled at their pleature : for furely they that give eare to flatterers, differ in no respect from those who ict out their legs of purpose to be supplanted and to have their heeles tripped up from under them; lave only in this, that those are worse foiled and catch the more shamefull fall, Imeane as well such as remit punishment to naughty persons, because for sooth they love to be called mercifull, mild, and gentle; as those onthe contrary side, who being perswaded by such as praise them, do submit themselves to enmities and acculations needlesse, but yet perilous; as being born in hand and made beleeve that they were the only men, and such alone as stood invincible against all flattery, yea, and those whom they link not to terme their very mouths and voices; and therefore Bion likened them most aprly to vessels that had two eares, for that they might be carried so easily by the eares which way a man wou'd : like as it is reported of one Alexinus a Sophister, who upon a time as he walked with others in the gallery Peripatos, spake all that naught was of Stilpo the Megarcan: and when one of the company said into him, what meane, you by this, considering that of late, and no longer fince than the other day, he gave out of you all the good that may be: I wot well (quoth he) for he is a right honest gentleman, and the most curious person in the world. Contrariwise, Menedemus when he heard that Alexinus had praised him many a time; But I (quoth he) do never speake well of Alexinus; and therefore a bad man he must needs be, that either praiseth a naughty perfon or is dispraised of an honest man: So hard it was to turne or catch him by any such meanes; as making use and practifing that precept which Hercules Antifthenens taught his children, when he admonified and warned them that they should never con those thanke who praised them and this was nothing elfe, but not to fuffer a mans felie to be overcome by foolish modefly, nor to flatter them againe who praised him. For this may suffice, in my opinion, which Pindarus answered upon a time to one who faid unto him: That in every place, and to all men he never ceased to commend him: Grand mercy (quoth he) and I will do this favourunto you againe that you may be a true man of your word and be thought to have spoken nothing but the truth

To conclude, that which is good and expedient against all other affections and passions, they oright furely to remember who are easily overcome by this hurtfull modelty, whensever they giving place so one to the violence of this passions of commina fault and tread away against their mind in their mind, and to remembrance the markes and prints of remorfe and repentance skicking fast in their mind, and to repeat elisoones and keep the same a long time. For like as wais faring men, after they have once stumbled upon a stone: or pilots at lea when they have once split their ship upon a rolk and suffered shipwracks they call those accidents to remembrance, for ever after do feare and take heed not only of the same, but of in this like; even to they that see before their eyes continually the dishonours and damages which they have received by this shurtfull and excessive modely, and represent the same to their mind once wounded and bitten with remorfe and repentance, will in the like afterwards reclaime themselves.

Of Brotherly Love or Amity.

The Summary.

Manshould have profited but badly in the schoole of vertue, if endeavouring to carry himselfe ho-Aneftly toward his friends and familiars, yea, and his very enemies, he continue still in evilldemeanour with his own brethren, unto whom he is joyned naturally by the streightest line and linke that can be devised. But for that ever since the beginning of the world, this proverbiall sentence from time to time hath been currant and found true : that the Unity of Brethren is a rare thing: Plutarch after he had complainedin the very entrance of this little book, that such a malady as this reigned mightily in his time, goeth about afterwards to apply a remedy thereto. And to this effest he sheweth, that since brotherly amity is taught and prescribed by nature, those who love not their brethren be blockish, unnaturall, enemies to their own selves; yea, and the greatest Atheists that may be found. And albeit the obligation wherein we are bound to our parents amountesh to so high a sum as we are never able fully to discharge; he proveth notwithflanding, that brotherly love may stand for one very good paintent toward that debt: whereupon he cancludeth, that hatred between brethren ought to be banifoed; for that if it once creepe in and get between, it will be a very hard matter to rejoyne and reconcile them againe. Afterwards he teacheth a ready and compendious way, how a man ought to mannage and use a brother ill-disposed. In what manner brethren Bould carry themselves one to another, both during the life of their father, and also after his decease; discoursing at large upon the duty of those who are the elder, or higher advanced in other respects; as alfo, what they should do who are the younger; namely, that as they are not equal to their other brethren in yeares, fother be their inferiours in place of honour and in wealth's likewise what meanes as well the one as the other are to follow for to avoid envy and jealousie. Which done, he teacheth brethren who in age come very neare, their naturall duty and kindnessethat they ought to shew one unto another; to which purpose he produceth proper examples of brotherly anity among the Pagans: In the end, since he cannot possibly effect thus much, that brethren should evermore accordwest together, he setteth down what course they are to take in their differences and disagreements; and how their friends ought to be common between them; and for a finall conclusion, he treateth of the honest care and respective regard one of another that they ought to have, and especially of their kinsfolke, which he enricheth with two other notable examples;

Of Brotherly Love and Amity.

Hose ancient statues representing the two brethren Cassor and Pollux, the inhabitants of the City Sparta, were wont in their language to call Disasta. And two paralell pieces of timber they are of an equal stituance alunder, united and joyned together by other peeces overthwart: now it should seeme, that this was a device fitting very well and agreeable to the brotherly amity of the said two gods, for to shew that undivisible union which was between them is and even so, I also do ofter and dedicate unto you, O Nigrimus and Quimus; this little treaties as tonching the amity of brethern, a gift common unto you both as those who are worthy of the same is for seeing, that of your own accord you practice that already, which it teacheth and esh ortest unto, you shall be thought not so much to be admonished thereby, as by your example to consist each estimate the same which therein is delivered; and the joy which you shall concive to see that approved and commended which your seleves do, shall give unto your judgement a farther assurance to continue therein; as if your actions were allowed and praised by vertuous and honest beholders of the same.

Arifarchus verily, the father of Theodelles, fooffing at the great number of those Sophistes of of counterfeit fages in his daies, faid: That in old time hardly could be found ie: en wise men throughout the world; but in our daies (quoth he) much ado there is to find fo many foose or ignorant persons. But I may very well and truly say: That I see, in this age wherein we live, the amitty of Brethren to be as rare, as their hatred was in times pass. The examples whereof, being so sew streywere among our ancients, were thought, by men in those daies living, notable arguments to sumish Tragedies and Theaters with, as matters very strange, and in a minner sabulous. But contrariwis, all they that live in this age, it happily they meet with two brethren that be good and kind one to another, wonder and marvell thereat as muth as if they saw those Messons of whom Messons have succeeded by the same of the same succeeded by the same succeeded would fay, brethren-like and twins, which be necessary, to wit, two hands, two feet, two eyes, two ears, and two nostrils: shewing thereby, that she hath thus distinguished them all, not only for their naturall health and fafety, but alto for a mutuall and reciprocall help, and not for to quarrell and fight one with another. As for the hands, when she parted them into many fingers, and those of unequall length and bigneffe, she hath made them of all other organicall parts, the most proper, artificious, and workman-like inflruments; infomuch as that ancient Philosopher Anaxagoras ascribed the very cause of mans wildome and understanding unto the hands. Howbeit, the contrary unto this should seem rather to be true; for man was not the wisest of all other living creatures in regard of his hands, but because by nature being endued with reason, given to be witty, and capable of Arts & Sciences, he was likewife naturally furnished with such instruments as these. Morover, this is well known unto every man, that Nature hath formed of one and the lameleed, as of one principle of life, twosthree, and more brethren; not to the end that they should be at debate and variance, but that being apart and alunder they might the better and more commodiously help one another. For those men with three bodies and a hundred armes apeece, which the Poets describe unto us (if ever there were any such) being joyned and grown together in all their parts, were not able to do any thing at all when they were parted afunder, or, as it were, without themselves: which brethren can do well enough, namely, dwell and keep within house and go abroad together, meddle in affaires of State, exercise bushandry and tillage one with another, incale they preferve and keep well that principle of amity and benevo ence which nature hath given them. For otherwise they should [1 support of the content of pole) nothing differ from those seet which are ready to trip or supplant one another, and cause them to catch a fall: or they should resemble those hands and fingers which enfolded and claspe one another untowardly against the course of nature. But rather according as in one and the same body, the cold, the hot, the dry, and the moilt, participating likewile in one and the same nature and nourifhment if they do a cord and agree welltogether, engender an excellent temperature and most plealant harmony, to wir, the health of body, without which, neither all the wealth of the world, as meniay,

Nor power of royall Majesty, Which equal is to deity, have any pleafure, grace, or profit: but in cafe these principal elements of our life, cover to have more than their just proportion, and thereupon breake out into a kind of civilifedition, seeking one to surrense and over-grow another, soone there ensured a finite proposition which overthroweth the state of the body and the creature it selfs: semblably, by the concord of brethren, the whole race and house is in good case and flourisheth, the friends and similars belonging to them (like a melodious quire of musicians) makea sivest consent and harmony: for neither they do, nor say, nor thinke any thing that jarreth or is contrary one to the other,

Whereas in descord such, and taking part, The worst est soones do speed, whiles better smart.

To wir, some ill-tongued varlet, and pick-thanke carry-tale within the house, or some flattering clawback comming between, and entring into the houle, or else some envious and malicious neighbour in the City. For like as discases do ingender in those bodies which neither receive nor stand well affected to their proper and familiar nourithment, many appetites of firange and hurtfull meats; even so, a slanderous calumniation of jealousie being gotten once among those of a bloud and kindred, doth draw and bring withall evill words and naughty speeches, which from without are alwaies ready enough to run thither, whereas a breach lieth open, and where there is some fault already. That divine Master and toothsayer of Arcadie, of whom Herodotus writeth, when he had lost one of his own naturall feet, was forced upon necessity to make himselse another of wood: but a brother being fallen out and at war with a brother, and constrained toget some strangerto behis companion, either out of the market place and common hall of the Cityas he walketh there, or from the publike place of exercise, where he useth to behold the wrestlers and others; in my conceit doth nothing else but willingly cut off a part or limbe of his own body made of flesh, & engralfed fast unto him, for to set another in the place, which is of another kind and altogether astranger. For even necessity it selse which doth entertaine, approve, and seeke for friendship and mutuall as quaintance, teacheth us to honour, cherish, and preserve that which is of the same nature and kind; for that without friends, lociety, and fellow ship we are not able to live solitary and alone as most savage beasts, neither will our nature endure it : and therefore in Menander he saith very welland wifely:

By jolly cheer and lawket day by day,
This we to finde (O futher) trying friends,
To whom our felves and life commit we may?
No speciall thing for cest to make amends,
I found he hath, who by that means hath mee
With spade of friends for such I count no bet,

For to fay a truth, most of our friendships be but shadowes, semblances and images of that fift amity which nature hath imprinted and engraffed the children toward their parents, in brethren toward their brethren: and he who doth not reverence not honor it, how can he persuade and make strangers believe that he beareth sound and shithfull good will unto strangers. Or what man is be within the strangers who will be sound and shithfull good will unto strangers.

who in his familiar greetings and falutations, or in his letters will call his friend and companion Brother, and cannot find in his heart fo much as to go with his brother in the same way? For as it were a point of great folly and madnefle, to adorn the statue of a brother, and in the mean time to bear and main his body; even to, to reverence and honor the name of a brother in others. & withal to thun, hate and disdain a brother indeed, were the case of one that were out of his wits, and who never conteived in hisheart and minde that Nature is the most facred and holy thing, in the world. And here in this place, I cannot choose but call to minde, how at Rome upon a time I took upon me to be umpire between two Lethren, of whom the one seemed to make prosession of Philosophie; but he was (as after it appeared) not only untruly entituled by the name of a Brother; but also as falsely called aPhilosopherstor when I requested of him that he should carry himself as aPhilosopher toward his Brother and such a Brother as a together was unlettered and ignorant: In that you say (ignorant (queth he)I hold well with you, and I avow it a truth; but as for Brother, I take it for no such great and venerable matter, to have forung from the same loins, or to have come forth of one womb. Well (said Lagain) It appears that you make no great account to iffue out of the same natural members; but altimen elle befides you, it they do not think and imagine fo in their hearts; yet I am fure they do both fing and fay that Nature first, and then Law (which doth preferve and maintain Nature) have given the chief place of reverence and honor next after the gods, unto father and mother; neither can men perform any service more acceptable unto the gods than to pay willingly, readily and affectionately unto parents who begat and brought them forth, unto nuries and follers that reared them up the interest and usury for the o'd thanks, besides the new which are due unto them. And on the other fide again, there is not a more certain figurand mark of a very Atheilt; than either to neglect parents, or to be any wayes ungracious or defective in duty unto them; and therefore whereas we are forbidden in expresse terms by the Law to do wrong or hurt unto other men: if one do not bebave himself to father and mother both in word and deed, so as they may have (I do not say no discontentment and displeasure, but) joy & comfort hereby men eseem him to be profune, godlesse and irreligious. Tell me now, what action, what grace, what disposition of children towards their parents, can be more agreeable and yeeld them greater contentment than to fee good will kinde affections aft and affured love between brethrene the which a man may easily gather by the contrarie in other smaller matters. For seeing that fathers and mothers be displeated otherwhiles with their fonnes, if they missife or hardly intreat some home-born slave whom they set much store by : if I fay, they be vexed and angry, when they see them to make no reckoning and care of their woods and grounds wherein they took some joy and delight; considering also that the good kind-hearted old tolk of a gentle and loving affection that they have be offended if some hound or dog bred up within house, or an horse be not well tended and looked unto; last of all, if they grieve when they perceive their children to mock, find fault with, or despile the lectures, narrations, sports fights, wrestlers, and others that exercise feats of activity, which themselves sometime highly essemed: Is these any likelishood that they in any measure can indure to see their children hate one another? to entertain braules and quarrels continually? to be ever fnarling, railing and reviling one another? and in all enterprises and actions alwayes crossing, thwarting and supplanting one another? I suppose there is no man will so say. Then on the contrary side, if brethren love together and be ready one to do for another; if they draw in one line and carry the like affection with them; follow the same studies and take the same courses; and how much nature hath divided & separated them in body, so much to joyn for it again in mind; lending one another their helping hands in all their negotiations and affairs; following the same exercises; repairing to the same disputations, and frequenting the same plaies, games and passimes, so as they agree and communicate in all things: certainly this great love and amity among breshren, must needs yeeld sweet joy and happy comfort to their father and mother in their old age: and therefore parents take nothing to much pleasure, when their children prove eloquent orators, wealthy men, or advanced to promotions and high places of dignitie; as loving and kind one to another; like as a man shall never see a father so desirous of eloquence, of riches, or of honor, as he is loving to his own children. It is reported of Queen Apollonis the Cyzicen, mother to King Eumenes, and to three other Princes, ro wit, Attalus, Philesarus and Atheraise, that she reputed and reported her self to be right happy, and rendred thanks unto the immortall gods, norfor her riches, nor royall port and majefty; but that it was her good fortune to see those three younger sonnes of hers serving as Pensioners and Esquires of the body to Eumenes their. elder brother , and himself living fearlesse and in se urity in the midst of them, standing about his person with their pollaxes, halberds, and partisanes in their hands, and girded with swords by their ide. On the other fide, King Newset perceiving, that his fonne Ochsus fer an ambush and laid trains to murder his brethren, died for very forrow and anguish of heart. Terrible and grievous are the warres, faid Euripides, between brethren; but unto their parents above all others most grievous; for that who over hateth his own brother, and may not you chiafe him a good eye and kind look, cannot choose but in hisheart blame the father that begat him, and the mother that bare him. We read that Pififtra: us married his second wife, when his sons whom he had by the former were now men growen, faying. That fince he faw them prove fo good and towardly, he gladly would be the father of many more that might grow up like them; even to, good and loyall children will not onely affect and love one another for their parents fakes, but also love their parents so much the more, in regard of their mutuall kindnesse, as making this account, thinking also and saying thus,

to themselves; That they are obliged and bounden unto them in many respects, but principally for their brethren, as being the most precious heritage, the sweetest and most pleasant possession that they inherit by them. And therefore Homer did very well, when he brought in Telemachus among other calamities of his, reckoning this for one, that he had no brother at all; and saying

For Jupiter my fathers race in me alone, Now ended lath, and given me brother none.

As for Hesiodus he did not well to wish and give advice to have an only begotten sonne, to be the full heir and univerfall inheritor of a patrimonie; even that Heftodus who was the disciple of those Muses, whom men have named usous, as it were our sous, for that by reason of their mutual affection and fister-likelove they keep alwayes together. Certes, the amity of brethren is fo respethe to parents, that it is both a certain demonstration that they love father and mother, and also fuch an example and Icsion unto their children to love together, as there is none other like unto it, but contrariwise, they take an ill president to hate their own brethren from the first originall of their father; for he that liveth continually and waxeth old in fuits of law, in quarrels and diffensions with his own brethren, and afterward shall seem to preach unto his children for to live friendly and lovingly together, doth as much as he, who according to the common pro-

Banish therefore we mult, and rid away clean, all harred from among brethren, as a thing which is a bad nurie to parents in their old age. and a worfe foltreffe to children in their youth: besides, it giveth occasion of slander, calumniation and obioquie among their fellow-citizens and neighbours, for thus do men conceive and deem of it: That brethren having been nourished and brought up together so familiarly from their very cradle it cannot be that they should fall out and grow to such terms of enmity and hostility, unlesse they were privy one to another of some wicked plots and most mischievous practises. For great causes they must be, that are able to undo great friendship and amity, by means whereof hardly or unneth afterwards they can be reconciled and furely knit again. For like as fundry pieces which have been once artificially joined together by the means ofglue or foder, if the joynt be loofe or open, may be rejoined or fodered again; but if an entire body that naturally is united and grown in one, chance to be broken or cut and flit afunder, it will be an hard piece of work to find any glew or foder fo ftrong as to reunite the fame and make it whole and found, even so those mutual amities which either for profit or upon some need were first knit between men happen to cleave and part in twain it is an easie matter to reduce them close together; but brethren if they be once alienated and estranged, to as that the naturall bond of love cannot hold them together, hardly will they piece again or agree ever after and fay they be made friends and brought to attonement, certainly such reconcilation maketh in the former rent or breach an ill-favoured and filthy scar, as being alwayes full of jealousie, distrust, and suspicion. True it is that all jars and enmities between man and man, entring into the heart, together with those passions which be most troublesome and dangerous of all others, to wit a pee ish humor of contention, choler, envie and remembrance of injuries done and patt, do breed grief, pain, and vexation; but surely that which is fallen between brother and brother, who of necessity are to communicate together in all facrifices & religious ceremonies belonging to their fathers house, who are to be interred another day in one and the same sepulchre, and live in the mean time otherwhiles under one roof, and dwell in the same house, and enjoy possessions, lands, and tenements confining one upon another, doth continually present unto the eye that which tormenteth the heart, ir putteth them in mind daily and howerly of their folly and madnefles for by means thereof that face and countenance which should be most sweet, best known, and of all other likest, is become most strange, hideous, and umpleasant to the eye; that you e which was wont to be even from the cradlefriendly and familiar is now become most fearful and terrible to the ear; and whereas they see many other brethren cohabit together in one house, fit at one tab e to take their repast, occupie the lame lands, and use contain together the first the families and guests, and in one word, make all things, that be common among other brethren private and what love or should be families and acceptable, to be common among other brethren private and what love or should be families and acceptable, to be come contrarie and odious? Over and befides, here is another inconvenience and mil hiel, which there is no man fo fimple, but he must needs conceive and understand. That ordinary friends and table companions may begotten and stollen (as it were) from others; alliante and acquaintante there may be had new if the former be lott, even as armour, we apons and tools may be repaired, if they be worn, or new made, if the first begone i but to recover a brother that is lost; it is not possible; no more than to make a new hand, if one be cut away, or to let another eye in the place of that which, is plucked out of the head and therefore well faid that Persan Lady, when the choice tather to swetche life of her brethren than of her children: For children (quoth the) I may have more, but his emy father and mother be both dead, brother shall I never have.

But what is to be done, will some man fay, in case one be matched with a badbrother First, this we ought evermore to remember, that in all forts of amities there is to be found, fome baddeffer, and most true is that saying of Sophocles;

No kinted there is, no fo lety, no fellowship, no amity and love, that can be found in ere, found, pure and clear from al faults. at the naughty emulation, heart-burning and jealoufy which arifeth between them during the life of their parents. Agefilau King of Lacedamon was wont alwayes to fend as a prefent unto each one of the ancients of the City, even as they were created Senators, a good oxe, intestimony that he honored their vertue: at length the lords called Ephori, who were the censurers and overseers of each mans behaviour, condemned him for this in a fine to be paid unto the State, subscribing and adding a reason withall; for that by these gifts and largesses he went about to steal away their hearts and favors to himself alone, which ought indifferently to regard the whole body of the City; even so a man may do well to give this counsel unto a sonne, in such wiseto respect and honour his sather andmother, that he seek not thereby togain their wholelove, nor seem to turn away their favour and affection from other children wholy unto himfelf; by which practife many do prevent, undermine and supplant their brethren, and thus under a colourable and honest pretense in shew, but indeed unjust and unequall, cloke and cover their avarice and covetous defires for after a cautelous and subtill manner they infinuate themselves and get between them and home, and so destraud and couseh them ungentlemanly of their parents love, which is the greatest and fairest portion of their inheritance, who efpying their time, and taking the opportunity and vantage when their brethren be otherwife employed, and least doubt of their practifes, then they bestir them most, and shew themselves in best order oblequious, double-diligent, sober and modest, and namely, in such things as their other brethren do either fail or feem to be flack and forgetfull. But brethren ought to do clean contrary, for if they perceive their father to be angry and dipleased with one of them, they should interpose themselves and undergo some part of the heavy load, they ought to ease their brother, and by bearing a part, help to make the burden lighter; then (I (ay) must they by their service and ministery gratifie their brother so much, asto bring him in some fort in grace and savour again with their father, and when he hath failed fo far forth in neglecting the opportunity of time, or omitting some other bufinelle which hardly will afford excuse, they lay the fault and blame upon his very nature and difposition, as being more meet and fitted for other matters. And hereto accordeth well that speech xon yet for want of wit,

But look on me, and did expelt my motive unto it.

even so enegood brother may excuse another and say; He thought I should have done it, and left this duty for me to do:neither are fathers themselves strait laced, but willingly enough to admit such translations and gentle invertions of names as these; they can be content to beleeve their children, when they term the supine negligence of their brethren plain simplicity, their stupidity and block shneffe, upright dealing and a good conscience; their quarrelous and litigious nature, a mind loth to be troden under-foot and utterly despited. In this manner he that will proceed with an intent only to appeale his fathers wrath. Shall gain thus much moreover; That not only his fathers choler wil thereby be much diminished toward his brother, but his love also much more encreased unto himself howbeit, afterwards when he hath thus made all well, and fatisfied his father to his good contentment: then must he turn and addresse himself to his brother apart, touch him to the quick, spare him. never a whit, but with all liberty of language tell him roundly of his fault, and rebuke him for this trespasse, for surely it is not good to use induspency and connivency to a brother, no more than to in-fult over him too much, and tread him under soot is he have done amisse, (for as this bewreich a nut over nun too much; and treat nun milieth a guiltinesse with him in the same transferession but in joy that one taketh at his falls to that impliest a guiltinesse with him in the same transferession but in joy that one taketh at his falls to that implies a care to do him good, and this rebuke and reproof, such measure would be kept, that it may reflife a care to do him good, and yet a displeasure for his fault; for commonly he that hath been a most earnest advocate and affectionat intercessor for him to his father and mother, will be his sharpest accuser afterwards when he hath him alone by himself. But put the case, that a brother having not all offended, be blamed notwithstanding and accused to father and mother, howsoever in other things, it is the part of humanity and dutifull kindnesse to sustain and bear all anger and forward displeasure of parents; yet in this cale, the allegations and defences of one brother in the justification of an other, when he is innocent, unjustly traduced, or hardly used or wronged by his parents, are not to be blamed, but allowable and grounded upon honesty: neither need a brother lear to hear that reproch in Sophocles:

Thou gracelesse imp, so farre grown out of kind, As with thy Sire, a counter plea to find.

when stankly and freely he speaketh in the behalf of his brother, seeming to be unjustly con-demned and oppressed. For surely by this manner of processe and pleading, they that are convicted take more joy in being overthrown, than if they had gathered the victory and better

Now after that a father is deceased, it is well beseeming and fit, that brethren should more affectionally love than before, and stick more close together: for then presently their natural love unto their father which is common to them all, ought to appear indifferently in mourning together and lamenting for his death: then are they to reject and calt behind them all inspicions surmized or buzzed into their heads by variets and fervants, all flanderous calumniations and false reports, brought unto them by pick-thanks and carry-tales on both fides, who would gladly fow fomediffenfion between them: then are they to give car unto that which fables do report of the reciprocall love of Caffor and Pollax; and namely, how it is faid, That Pollax killed one with his fiftfor rounding him in the ear, and whilpering a tale against his brother (after. Afterwards, when they shall come to the parting of their patrimonie and fathers goods among them, they ought not (as it were) to give defrance and denounce war one against another, as many there be who come prepared for that purpose ready to encounter, finging this note,

O Alal Alala, now hearken and come fight, Who art of warre fo fell, the daughter right.

But that very day of all others they ough to regard and observe most, as being the time which to them is the beginning either of mortall warre and enmity irreconcileable, or ene of perfect friendthip and amity perdurable: at which instant they ought among themselves alone, to divide their porsions if it be possible; if not, then to do it in the presence of one indifferent and common friend between them, who may be a witnes to their who e order and proceeding; and so when after a loving and kind manner, and as becometh honest and well disposed persons, they have by casting lots gorten each one that which is his rightiby which courie (as Flate faid) they ought to think that there is given and received that which is meet and agreeable for every one, and fo to hold themselves therewith contented : this done, I say they are to make account that the ordering, managing, and administration onely of the goods and heritage is parted and divided; but the enjoying . use and possession of all remaineth yet whole in common between them. Burtholethat in this partition and distribution of goods, pluck one from another the nurses that gave them luck, or such youths as were foflered and brought up together with them of infants, and with whom alwayes they had lived and loved familiarly; well may they prevail to farre forth with eager pursuing their wilfulnesse, astogo away with the gain of a flave perhaps of greater price but in itead thereo, they lose the greatest and most precious things in all their patrimonic and inheritante, and utterly betray the love of a brother, and the confidence that otherwise they might have had in him. Some also we have known, who upon a peevish willialnesse onely, and a quatrelous humour, and without any gain at all, have in the partition of their sathers goods, carried themselves no better nor with greater modesty and respects than if it had been some boory or pillage gotten in war. Such were Charlets and Johnshir of the City Opun, two brethren, who ever as they met with a piece of silver plate, made no more ado, but cut it quite thorough the mids, and is there came a garment into their hands, in two pieces it went, flit as neer (as they could aim) just in the middle, and to they went either of them away with his part dividing (as it were) upon some tragical curse and execration.

Their house and all the goods therein By edge of fivord fo sharp and keen,

Others there be who make their boalt and report with joy unto others, how in the partition of their patrimony they have by cunning castsconny-catched their brethren, and over-wrought them so by their cautelous circumvention fine wit and flie policies, as that they have gone away with the better part by odds: whereas indeed they should rejoyce rather and please themselves, it in modesty, courtelie kindnesse, and yeelding of their own right they had surpassed and gone beyond their brethren. In which regard Athenodorus deserveth to be remembred in this place; and indeed there is not one here in these parts but remembreth him well enough. This Athenodorus had one brother elder than himself named Zenon, who having taken upon him the management of the patrimonie, left nnto them both by their father, had imbezeld and made away a good part of it; and in the end for that by foate he had carried away a woman and married her, was condemned for a rape, and loft all his own and his brothers goods, which by order of law was forfeit and conflicate to the Exchequer of the Emperor: now was Athenodorus abovelaid, a very beardlesse-boy stil, without any hair on his face; and when by equity and the Court of conscience, his portion out of his fathers goods was awarded and restored unto him, he for sook nothis brother, but brought all abroad and parted the one half thereof with him again; and notwithstanding that he knew well enough that his brother had used no fair play, but cunning y descauded him of much in the division thereof, yet was hencyet angry with him nor repented of his kindnesse but mildly, cheerfully, and patiently endured that unthankfulness and folly of his brother so much divulged and talked of throughout all Greece. As so: Solon when he pronounced sentence and determined in this manner as touching the government of the weal-publick; That equality never bred fedition; feemed very confused y to bring in the proportion Arithmeticall which is popular, in place of that other fair and good proportion called Geometricall. But he that in an house or family would advise brethren (as Plan did the Citizens of his Common-wealth) above all if possible it were to take away these words; Mine and Thine; Mine and not Minesor at least wife (if that may not be) to stand contented with an egall potion, and to maintain and preferve equality certes, he should lay a notable and singular foundation of amity concord and peace, and alwayes build thereupon the famous examples of most noble and renowned personages, fuch as Pitta: was, who when the King of Lid ademanded of him whether he had money and goods enough? I may have (quoth he) more by one half if I would, by occasion or my brothers death whose heir I am.

But for a fmuch as not onely in the possession augmentation and diminishing of goods, the lesse is evermore fet as an adverte and crosse enemy to the more, but also (as Place faid) simply and univerfally there is alwayes motion and stirring in equality unbut rest and repose in equality; and so all uneven dealing and unequall partition is dangerous for breeding diffension among brethrem and un-possible it is, that in all respects they should be even and equall; for that either Nature at first from their very nativity, or Fortune afterwards, hath not divided with even hand their severall graces and favours among them, whereupon proceed envie and jealousie, which are pernicious maladies and deadly plagues, aiwel to houses & samilies, as also to states and Cities in these regards (Isay) therfore, a great regard and heed would be taken, both to prevent and also to remedie such mischiefs with all speed, when they begin first to ingender. As for him who is indued with better gitts, and hath the vantage over his other brethren, it were not amisse to give him counsell, first to communicate unto them those gifts wherein he seemeth to excell and go beyond them; namely, in grating and honouring them as well as himself by his credit and reputation, in advancing them by the means of his great friends, and drawing them unto their acquaintance; and in case he be more eloquent than they, to offer them the use thereof, which although it be employed (as it were) in common, is yet nevertheless his ownfill: then let him not shew any figne of pride and arrogancy, as though he disdained them, but ratherin some measure by abasing, submitting and yeelding a little to them in his behaviour, to preserve himself from envie, unto which his excellent parts do lie open; and in one word, to reduce that inequality which fortune bath made, unto some equality, as farre forth as possible it is to do, by the moderate carriage of his mind. Lucullus verily would never dain to accept of any dignity or place of rule before his brother, notwithstanding he was his elder; but letting his own time slip, expecting the turn & course of his brother. Neither would Pollan take upon him to be a god alone by himself, but chole rather with his brother Caffor to be a demy-god, and for to communicate unto him his own immortality, thought it no difference to participate with his mortal condition; and even for may a man fay unto one whom he would admonish: My good friend, it lies in you without diminishing one whir of thosegood things which you have at this present, to make your brother equal unto your felf, and to joyn him in honour with you, giving him leave to enjoy (as it were) your greatnesse, your glory, your vertue, and your fortune; like as Place did in times past, who by putting down in writings the names of his brethren, and bringing them in as persons speaking in his most noble and excellent Treatifes, caused them by that means to be famous and renowned in the World. Thus he graced Glassess and Adamantss in his books of Policy: thus he honoured Antiphon the youngest of them all, in his Dialogue named Parmenides.

Moreover, as it is an ordinary thing to observe great difference and oddes in the natures and fortunes of brethren; so it is in manner impossible, that in all things and in every respect any one of them should excell the rest. For true it is, that the four elements, which they say were created of one and the same matter, have powers and qualities altogether contrary; but surely it was never yet seen, that of two brethren by one sather and mother, the one should be like unto that wise man, whom the Stoicks do tain and imagine, to wit, tait, shoely, bountfull, honour able, rich, eloquent, studious, civill and courceous; and the other, foul, ill-favoured, contemptible, illiberall, needy, not able to speak and deliver his mind, unraught, ignorant, ungivill and unsociable. But even in those that are more obscure, base and abject than others; there is after a fort some park of grace, of valour, of appendix and inclination to one good thing or other: for as the common proverb goeth;

With Calthrap thiftles, rough and keen, with Prickyrest-harow,

Close Sions fair and foft yea. White-walflowers are feen to grow. These good parts therefore, be they more or lesse in others, if he that ieemeth to have them infarre better and ingreater measure, do not debase, smother hide and hinder them, nor deject his brother (as in some solemnity of games for the prize) from all the principall honours, but rather yeeld reciprocally unto him in some points, and acknowledge openly that in many things he is more excellent, and bath a greater dexterity than himself, withdrawing alwayes closely all occasions and matter of envie, as it were fewell from the fire, shall either quench all debate, or rather not suffer it at all to breed or grow to any head and substance. Now he that alwayes taketh his brother as a colleague, counseller and coadjutor with him, in those causes wherein himself is taken to be his superiour: as for example; If he be a professed Rhetorician & Oratour, using his brother to plead causes; if he be a Politician, asking his advice in government; if a man greatly friended, imploying him in actions and affairs abroad; and in one word, in no matter of confequence and which may win credit and reputation, leaving not his brother out, but making him his fellow and companion in all great and honorable occasions, and so giving out of him, taking his countell if he be prelent, and expecting his presence if he beabsent; and generally, making it known that he is a man not of lesse execution than himself, but one rather that loveth not much to put himself forth, nor stands so much upon winning reputation in the world, and feeking to be advanced in credit; by this means he shall lose nothing of his own, but gain much unto his brother. These be the precepts and advertisements that a man may give unto him that is the better and superiour.

To come now to him who is the inferiour he ought thus to think in his mind; That his brother is not alone that hath no fellow, nor the onely man in the world who is richer, better learned, or more renowned and glorious than himself, but that often-times he also is inferiour to a great number yea, and to many millions of us men,

Who on the earth so large do breed, Upon her fruits who live and feed.

but if he be such an one as either goeth up and down, bearing envie unto all the world; or if he be of foill a nature, as that among fo many men that are fortunate, he alone and none but he troubleth him, who ought of all other to be deareft, and is most neerly joyned unto him by the obligation of blood, a man may well say of him. That he is unhappy in the highest degree, and hath nor left unto another man living, any means to go beyond him in wretchednesse. As Merellin therefore thought that the Romans were bound to render thanks unto the gods in heaven, for that Scipio fo noble and brave a man was born in Rome, & not in any other City; so every man is to with and prayunto the gods, that himself may surmount all in prosperity, if not, yet that he might have a brother at leastwife to attain unto that power and authority to much defired; but some there begin unfortunate and unlucky by nature, in relpect of any goodnesse in them, that they can rejoyce and take a great glory in this, to have their friends advanced unto high places of honor, or to fee their hoafts and enests abroad, princes, rulers, rich and mighty men, but the reiplendent glory of their brethren they think doth eclyple and darkentheir own renown; they delight and joy to hear the fortunate exploits of their fathers recounted, or how their great grandines long ago had the conduct of armies, and were lord pratours and generals in the fields, wherein they themselves had never any part, nor received thereby either honor or profit; but if there have fallen unto their brethren any great heritages or possessions, if they haverilen unto high estate and archieved honorable dignities, if they are advanced by rich and noble marriages, then they are call down and their hearts bedone. And yet it had behoved and right meet it were in the first place, to be envious to no man at all; but if that may not be, the next way were to turn their envie outward, and eye-bite frangers, and to flew our spite unto aliens who are abroad, after the manner of thole who to rid themtelues from civilliedidions at home, turn the lame upon their enemics without, and fet them together by the ears, and like as Diomedes in Homer faid unto Glaucus,

Of Trojans and their allies both,
Who aide them for goodwill
Right many are befide your felfe
For me in fight to kill:
And you likewife bave Greeks enough
With whom in bloudy field
Tou may your proweffe try, and not Meet me with speare and spield.

Even so it may be said unto them; There be a number besides of concurrents upon whom they may exercise their envy and jealousie, and not with their naturall brethren i for a brother ought not to be like unto one of the ballance-scales, which doth alwaies contrary unto his fellow, for as one rijeth the other falleth; but as small numbers do multiply the greater, and serve to make both them bigger, and their selves too; even so an inferiour brother by multiplying the state of his brother who is his superior, shall both augment him and also increase and grow himselfe together with him in all good things: marke the fingers of your hand, that which holdeth not the pen in writing, or striketh the string of a lute in playing (for that it is not able so to do, nor disposed & made naturally for those uses) is never a whit the worse for all that, nor serveth lesse otherwise, but they all stir & move together, yea, and in some fort they help one another in their actions, as being framed for the nonce, unequall and one bigger and longer than another, that by their opposition and meeting (as it were) round together, they might comprehend, claipe, and hold any thing more fire, firong, and fast. Thus Craterus being the naturall brother of King Anigonus who reigned and swaid the icepter: Thus Perilaus also the brother of Caffander who wore the Crown, gave their minds to be brave warriers, and to lead armies under their brethren, or else applied themselves to governe their houses at home in their absence; whereas on the contrary side the Antiochi and Scienci, as also certaine Grypt and Ciziceni, and such others, having not learned to beare a lower faile than their brethen, and who could not content themselves to sing a lower note, nor to rest in a second place, but aspiring to the ensigns and ornaments of royall dignitie, to wit, the purple mantle of eftate with Crowne, Diadem, and Scepter, filled themselves and one another with many calamities, yea, and heaped as many troubles upon all $A_{f,a}$ throughout. Now for a finite those especially who by nature are ambitious and disposed to thirst after glory, be for the most part envious and jealous toward those who are more honoured and renowned than they; it were very expedient for brethren, if they would avoid this inconvenience, not to feeke for to attained ther honour, or authority, and credit, all by the same meanes, but some by one thing, and some by another: for we see by daily experience it is an ordinary matter that wild beasts do fight and war one With another, namely, when they feed in one and the same pasture; and among Champions, and such as strive for the mastery in feats of activity, we count those for their advertises and concurrents only, who professe and practise the same kind of game or exercise; for those that go to it with fifts and buffers are commonly friends good enough to fuch fivord-fencers as fight at sharpe to the utterance, and well-willers to the champions called Pancratiasta: likewile the runners in a race agree full-well with wrefflers: these I say, are ready to aid, affift, and savour one another, which is the reason, that of the two fons of Tyndarus, Pollux wan the prize alwaies at buffets, but Caltor his brother went away with the victory in the race. And Honer very well in his Poem feigned that Teucer was an excellent archer, and became famous thereby, but his brother Ajax was best arclose fight and handfirokes, standing to it heavily armed at all peeces,

And with his shield so bright and wide,

His brother Teucer he did hide. And thus it is with them that governea State and Common-weale; those that be men of armes, and mannage martiall affaires, never lightly do envy them much who deale in civill causes and use to make speeches unto the people; likewise among those that professe Rhetoricke and eloquence, advocates who plead at bar, never fall out with those Sophisters that read lectures of oratory; among professors of Physick, they that cure by diet envy not the Chirurgions who worke by hand; whereas they who endeavour and feek to win credit and estimation by the same art, or by their faculty and sufficiency in any one thing, do as much (especially if they be badly minded withall) as those rivals who loving one mistris, would be better welcome, and find more grace and favour at her hands one than another. True it is I must needs confesse, that they who go divers waies do no good one to another; but furely such as choose sundry courses of life do not only avoid the occasions of envy, but also by that meanes the rather have mutuall help one by the other: thus Demosthenes and Chares forced well together; Aschines likewise and Eubulus accorded; Hyperides also and Leosthenes were lovers and friends; in every which couple the former imployed themselves in pleading and speaking before the people, and were writers and pen-men, whereas the other conducted armies, were warriers and men of action. Brethren therefore who cannot communicate in glory and credit together without envy, ought to fet their defires and ambitious minds as far remote one from another, and turne them full as contrary as they can, if they would find comfort, and not receive difpleasure by the prosperity and happy successe one of another: but above all, a principall care and regard they mult have of their kindred and alliance yea, and otherwhiles of their very wives, and namely, when they be ready with their perillous speeches many times to blow more coales, and thereby enkind etheir ambitious humour, Your brother (quoth one) doth wonders; he carriethall before him; he beareth the sway; no talke there is but of him; he is admired, and every man maketh court to him: whereas, there is no refort to you; no man commeth toward you; nothing is there in you that menregard or fet by. When these suggestions shall be thus whispered a brother that is wife and well minded may well fay thus againe: I have a brother indeed whole name is up and catrieth agreat side; and verily the greatest part of his credit and authority is mine, and at my commandement. For Socrae s was wont to fay that he would choose rather to have Darus his friend than his *Dari ks. And a brother who is of found and good judgement will thinke that he hath piece of coin no leffe benefit when his brother is placed in great effate of government, bleffed with riches, or adwith his image, worth all the credit and reputation by his gift of eloquence, than it himselfe were ruler, weathin learning and loquent. Thus you may fee the best and readiest meanes that are to qualifie and mixing the reputation and the results of the reputation by his gift of eloquence, than it himselfe were ruler, weathin learning and an eloquent. Thus you may fee the best and readiest meanes that are to qualifie and mixing a this unequality between brethren. Now there be other diagreements besides, that grow quickly between, especially if they want good bringing up, and are not well stands. ly, in regard of their age. For commonly the elder, who thinke that by good right they ought to have the command, rule, and government of their younger brethren in every thing, and who hold it great reason that they should be honoured, and have power and authority alwaies above them, commonly do use them hardly, and are nothing kind and lightsome unto them: the younger againe being stubborne, wilfull, and unruly ready also to shake off the bridle, are wont to make no reckoning of their elder brethrens prerogative, but fet them at naught and despite them; whereby it cometh to paffe, that as the younger of one fide envied are held down with envy, and kept under alwaies by their elder brethren, and io fhun their rebukes, and ico:ne their admonitions; io these on the other fide defirous to hold their own, and maintaine their preeminence and foveraignty over them, stand alwaies in dread lest their younger brethren should grow too much, as if the rising of them weretheir fall. But like as the cale standeth in a benefit or good turne that is done, men fay it is meet that the receiver should esteeme the thing greater than it is, and the giver make the least of it; even to he that can pertwade the elder, that the time whereby he hath the vantage of his other brethren is no great thing: and likewise the younger, that he should reckon the same birthright for no small matter, he shall do a good deed between them, in delivering the one from didaine, contempt, and sufpition, and the other from irreverence and negligence. Now for asmuch as it is meet that the elder should take care and charge, teach and instruct, admonish and reprove the younger; and as fit likewise the younger should honour, imitate, and follow the elder: I could wish that the follicitude and care of the elder favoured rather of a companion and fellow, than of a father; that himself also would seem not so much to command as to perswade, and to be more prompt and ready to joy for his younger brothers well doing, and to praise himfor it, than in any wise take pleasure in reprehending and blaming him if happily he have forgotten his duty; and in one word, to do the one not only more willingly, but also with greater humanity than the other. Moreover, the zeale and emulation in the younger ought rather to be of the nature of an imitation than either of jealouse or contention; for that imitation prelupposeth an opinion of admiration, whereas jealousie and contention implieth envy, which is the reason that they affect and love those who endeavour to rejemble, and be like unto them; but contrariwile, they are offended at those and keep them down who strive to be their equals. Now among many honours, which it befeemeth the younger to render unto his elder, obedience is that which deserveth most commendation, and worketh a more affored and hearty affection, accompanied with a certaine reverence, which causeth the elder reciprocally, and by way of requirall to yeeld the like and to give place unto him. Thus Cato, having from his infancy honoured and reverenced his elder brother Capion, by all manner of obeifance and filence before him, in the end gained thus much by it, that when they were both men grown, he had to won him and filled him (as it were) with fo great a respect and reverence of him, that he would neither fay nor do ought without his privity and knowledge. For it is reported, that when Capion had one day figned and fealed with his own figner a certaine letter reftimoniall, Case his brother comming afterwards would not let to his feale; which when Capson understood, he called for the foretaid testimonial; and pluckt away his own feale, before he had once demanded for what occasion his brother would not believe the deed, but suspected his retimony. It feemeth likewiie, that the brethren of Epicarus shewed great respect and reverence unto him, in regard of the love and carefull good-will that he bare unto them; which appeared in this, that as to all other things elie of his, to to his Phitosophy e pecially they were to wedded, as it they had been infpired therewith. For albeit they were ieduced and deceived in their opinion, giving our, and holding alwaies (as they did) from their infancy that never was any man so deep a clarke, nor so great a Philofopher as their brother Epicarus: yet it was wonderul, to consider as well him that could fo frame and dispose them, as themselves allo for being to disposed and affectionate unto him. And verily, evenamong the more moderne Philosophers of latter time, Apollmin the Peripitetick, had convinced him of untruth (whotoever he was) that taid Lordship and glory could like no fellowship, for he made his brother Sotion more famous and renowned than himfeife. For mine own part, to fay somewhat of my selfe; albeit toat fortune bath done me many favours, in regard whereof I am bound to render unto her much thankes; there is not any one for which I take my felfe fo much ohiged and beholding unto her, as for the love that my brother Timon hath alwaies shewed and dothyet shewunto mes a thing that no man is able to deny, who hath never so little been in our company, and you least of all others doubt who have on eried to familiarly with us,

Now there be other occasions of trouble which ought to be taken heed of among those brethren which are of like age or fomewhat neare in years; imali passions (I wot well) they be, but many they are, and those ordinary and continuall; by meanes whereof they bring with them anevill cuflome of vexing, fretting and angering one another ever and anon for small things, which in the end turne into harred and enmity irreconcileable; for when they have begun to quarrel, one with another at their games and pastimes, about the feeding and fighting of some little creatures that they keep, to wit, quailes or cocks, and afterwards about the wrefling or their boies and pages at the schoole, or the hunting of their hounds in the chase, or the capacition of their horses; they cannot more hold and refraine (when as they be men) their contentious veine and ambition in matters of more importance: thus the greatest and mightiest men among the Greeks in our time, banding at the fift one against another in taking parts witheir dancers, and then in fiding with their minstrels, afterwards by comparing one with another who had the better ponds or bathing pooles in the territory of Eaeplus, who had the fairer galleries and walking places, the latelier halls and places of piesture, everimere changing and exchanging, and fighting (as it were) for the vantage of a place, ttri ing fill by way of odious comparison. Cutting and diverting another way the conduct pipes of fountaines, are become so much exa perate one against mother, that in the meanetime they are utterly undone; for the tyrant is come, and hath taken all from them; banished they are out of their own native country; they wander as poote vagabonds thorow the world, and I may be bold (well neare) to fay, they are fofar changed from that they were before, that they be others quite, this only excepted that they be the same still in hatred one to another. Thus it appearesh evidently, that brethren ought not a little to resift the jealousse and contentions which breed among them upon small trifles, even in the very beginnig, and that by accustoming themselves to yeeld and give place reciprocally one to another, furfering themselves to be over one and take the folic and joying rather to pleasure and content one another, than to win the better hand one of another; for the victory which in old time they called the Cadmian victory, was nothing elfe but that if Cory between brethren about the City of Thebes, which is of all other the most wicked and mitchievous.

What shall we say moreover? Do not the affaires of this life minister many occasions of disagreement and debate even among those brethren which are most kind and loving of all other? Yes verily. But even thereinalfo, we must be carefull to let the faid affaires to combate alone by themfelves and not to put thereto any passion of contention or anger, as an anchor or hook to cat. h ho. of the parties and pull them together for to quarrell and enter into debate; but as it were in aballance to look joyntly together on whether fide right and equity doth encline and bend, and fo foon as ever we can, to put matters in question to the arbitrement and judgement of some good and indifferent persons, to purge and make cleare all, before they are grown for ar, as that they have gotten a staine or tineture of ankered maiice, which afterwards will never be washed of sourced out: which done we are to imitate the Pythagoreans, who being neither joyned inkindred or confanguinity nor yet allied by affinity, but the (chollers in one (choole, and the fellows of one and the fame dit ip ine if peradrenture at any time they were to far carried away with choler, that they fell to enterchange reproachfuil and reviling taunts, yet before the fun was gone down they would shake hands kiffe, and embrace one another, be recon iled, and become good friends againe. For like as it there be a feaver, occasioned by a botch or rising in the share there is no danger thereof. but if when the faid botch is gone the feaver still continue, then it feemeth to be a malady proces154 ding from some more inward, secret, and deeper cause; even so the variance between two brethren. when it ceaseth together with the deciding of a businesse, we must thinke dependent upon the same butinefle and upon nothing elfe, but if the difference remaine still when the controversie is ended. furely then it was but a colourable pretence thereof, and there was within some root of secret malice which caused it. And here in this place it would serve our purpose very well to heare the manner of proceeding in the decision of a controversie between two brethren of a barbarous nation, and the same not for some little parce! of land, nor about poore slaves or filly sheep, but for no lesse than the kingdome of Persia: for after the death of Darius some of the Persians would have had Ariamenes to succeed and weare the Crown, as being the eldest son of the King late deceased; others againe stood earnessly for Xerxes, as well for that he had to his mother Atoffa the daughter of that great Cyrus, as because he was begotten by Darius when he was a crowned King; Ariamenes then came down of out of Media to claime his right, not in armes, as one that minded to make war, but timply and peaceably attended only with his ordinary traine and retinue, minding to enter upon the Kingdome by justice and order of law. Xernes in the meane while, and before his brother came, being present in place, ruled as King,, and exercised all those functions that appertained thereto: his brother was no sooner arrived, but he took willingly the diadem or royall frontlet from his head, and the Princely chapler or coronet which the Perhan Kings are wont to weare upright, he laid down, and went toward his brother to meet him upon the way, and with kind greeting embraced him: he tent also certaine presents unto him, with commandement unto those that carried them to say thus: Xerxes, thy brother honoureth thee now with these presents here, but if by thesentence and judgement of the Pecres and Lords of Persia he shall be declared King, his will and pleature is, that thou shalt be the second person in the Realme, and next unto him. Arramenes answered the message in this wile: These presents I receive kindly from my brother, but I am perswaded that the Kingdome of Persia by right belongethunto me; as for my brethren, I will refer e that honour which is meet and due unto them next after my icife, and Kernes shall bethe first & chiefe of them all, Now when the great day of judgment was at hand, when this weighty, matter should be determined, the Persians by onegenerall and common consent declared Artabaing the brother of Darins lare departed to bethe impire and competent judge: for to decide and end this cause. Xerxes was unwilling to stand to his award, being but one man, as who reposed more trust and confidence in the number of the Princes and Nobles of the Realme; but his mother Atoff : reproving him for it: Tell me (quoth she) my son, wherefore refused thou Artabanus to be thy judge who is your uncle, and beffdes, the best man of all the Pernans? And why dost thou feare formuch the iffue of his judgement, confidering that if thou miffe, yet the fecord place is most honourable, namely, to be called the Kings brother of Persia? Then Kernes, perswaded by his mother, yeelded; and after many allegations brought and pleaded on both fides judicially, Artabanus at length p onounced definitely that the Kingdome of Perfix appertained unto Xerxes: with that Ariamenes incontinently leapt from his feat, went and did homage unto his brother, and taking him by the right hand enthronized and enstalled him King: from which time forward he was alwaies the greatest person next unto his brother, and shewed himselfe for loving and affectionate unto him, that in his quarrel he fought most valiantly in the navall battell before Salaminas, where, in his service, and for his honour, he loft his life. This example may ferve for an original patterne of true benevolence and magninimity, so pure and uncorrupt; as it cannot in any one point be blamed or stained. As for Agricehus, as a man may reprehend in him his ambitious mind and exceffive defire of rule, fo he may as well wonder that, confidering his vaine-glorious spirit, all brotherly love was not in him urter, y extinct; for being himselse the younger he waged war with Selencus for the crowns and kept his mother sure enough for to side with him and take his part: now it happened that during this war and when it was at the hortest, Seleucustiruck a battell with the Galatians, lost the field, and was him elfe not to be found, but supposed certainly to have been flaine and cur in peeces, together with his whole army, which by the Barbarians were put to the fword and maffacred; when news came unto A worker of this defeature, he laid away his purple robes, put on black, cauled the court gates to be thut and mourned heavily for his brother, as it he had been dead: but being afterwards advertised that he was alive, safe, and found, and that he went about to gather new forces and make head againe, he came abroad, facrificed with thankefgiving unto the gods, and commanded all those cities and states which were under his dominion to keep holiday, to facrifice and weare chaplets of flowers upon their heads in token of publike joy. The Athenians when they had devited an abfurd and ridiculous fable as touching the quarrel between Neptune and Minerva, intermedled withall another invention which founded to some reason, tending to the correction of the same, and as it were to make amends for that ablurdity, for they suppresse alwaies the second of August, upon which day happened (by their faying) that debate aforesaid between Neptune and Minerva. What should let and hinder us likewise, if it chance that we enterinto any quarrel or debate with our allies and kinstolke in bloud, to condemne that day to perpetuall oblivion, and to repute and reckon it among the curied and dismall daies: but in no wife by occasion of one such unhappy day to forget fo many other good and joyfulldaies wherein we have lived and been brought up together. for either it is for nothing and in vaine that nature hath endued us with meeknelle, and harmbefle long. fufferance or patience the daughter of modely and mediocrity, or elle furely sve ought to ule the vertues and good gifts of her principally to her allies and kinsfolke ; and verily to crave and receive pardon of them when we our felves have offended and done amiffe, declareth no leffe love and napartion of them when to forgive them if they have trespassed against us. And therefore we ought not to neglect them if they be angry and displeased; nor to be straight laced and stiffely stand against them when they come to justifie or excuse themselves; but rather both when our selves have faulted, oftentimes to prevent their anger by excule, making or asking forgivenesse, and also by pardoning them before they come to excuse if we have been wronged by them. And therefore Euclides that great Scholar of Socrates is much renowned and famous in all schooles of Philolophy, for that when he heard his brother breake out into thele beattly and wicked words against him, The foule ill take meif 1 be not revenged and meet with thee; and a mithiefe come to me also (quoth he againe) if I appeale not thine anger, and periwade thee to love me well as ever thou didit. But King Eumenes not in word, but indeed and effect fur passed all others in meeknesse and patience: for Persens King of the Macedonians being his mortallenemy, had secretly addressed an ambush, and sec certainemen of purpole to murder him about Delphos, effying their time when they faw him going from the leafide to the faid town for to confult with the oracle of Apollo: now when he was gone a little put the ambush, they began to assaile him from behind tumbling down and throwing mighty stones upon his head and neck, wherewith he was to altonished that his fight tailed, and he fell with all, in that manner as he was taken for dead: now the rumour hereof ran into all parts, infomuch as certaine of his servitours and friends made speed to the city Pergamus, reporting the tidings of this occurrent, as if they had been present and seen all done; whereupon Analus the eldest brother next unto himfelfe, an honest and kind hearted man, one also who alwaies had carried himfelfe most faithfully and loyally unto Eumenes, was not only declared King, and crowned with the royall diadem; but that which more is elpoused and matried Queen Stratonice his said brothers wise, and lay with her. But afterwards when counter-news came that Eumeres was alive and comming homeward againe, Attalus laid aside his diadem, and taking a partisin or javelin in his hand (as his manner before time was) with other pensioners and squires of the body he went to meet his brother: King Eumenes received him right gracioully, tooke him lovingly by the hand, embraced the Queen with all honour, and of a princely and magnanimous spirit put up all; yea, and when he had lived a long time after without any complaint, inspition, and jealouse at all, in the end at his death made over and affigned both the Crown and the Queen his wife unto his brother the aforefaid Atta'u: and what did Atta'us now after his brothers decease? He would not foster and bring up(as heire apparant) so much as one childthat he had by Stratonice his wife, although she bare unto him many i but henourished and carefully cherished the son of his brother departed, untill he was come to full age, and then himle'fe in his life-time with his own hands let the imperial! Diadem and royall Crown upon his head, and proclaimed him King, But Cambyfes contrariwise frighted upon a vaine dreame which he had, that his brother was come to usurpe the Kingdome of Asia, without expecting any proofe or prefumption thereof, put him to death for it; by o casion where of the succession in the Empire went out of the race of Cyrus upon his decease, and was devolved upon the line of Darius who raigned after him; a Prince who knew how to communicate the government of his affairs, and his regall authority, not only with his brethren, but also with his friends.

Moreover, this one point more is to be remembred and observed diligently in all variances and debates that are rifen between brethren: namely, then especially, and more than at any time else, to converseand keep company with their friends; and on the other side to avoid their enemies and evill-willers, and not to be willing so much as to vouchsafe them any speech or entertainment. Following herein the fashion of the Candiors, who being oftentimes fallen out and in civill diffension among themselves, yea, and warring hor one with another, no sooner heare news of forreine enemies comming against them, but they tanke themselves, banding joyntly together against them; and this combination is that which thereupon is called Syncretifmos. For some there be that, (like as water runneth alwaies to the lower ground, and to places that chinke or cleave a funder) are ready to fide with thosebrethren or friends that be fallen out, and by their suggestions buzzed into their eares ruinateand overthrow all acquaintance, kindred and amity, hating indeed both parties, but feeming to beare rather upon the weaker side, and to settle upon him, who of imbecillity soone yeeldeth and giveth place. And verily those that be simple and harmelesse friends, such as commonly young folke are, apply themselves commonly to him that affecteth a brother, helping and increafing that love what he may; but the most malicious enemies are they, who espying when one brother is angry or fallen out with another, seeme to be angry and offended together with him for company; and these do most hurt of all others. Like as the hen therefore in Asope answered unto the cat, making semblance as though he heard her say she was lick, and therefore in kindnesse and love asking how shedid? I am well enough (quoth shee) I thanke you, so that you were sarther off; even so, unto such a man as is inquisitive and entreth into talke as touching the debate of brethren to sound and fearch into some secrets between them, one ought to answer thus: Surely there would be no quarrell between my brother and me, if neither I nor he would give eare to carry-tales and pickthanks between us. But now it commeth to passe (I wot not how) that when our eyes be sore and in paine, we turne away our fight unto those bodies and colours which make no reverberation or repercussion back againe upon it; but when we have some complaint and quarrell, or conceive anger or sulpition against our brethren, we take pleasure to heare those that make all worse, and are apt enough to take any colour and infection, presented to us by them where it were more needfull and expedient at such time to avoid their enemies and ill-willers, and to keep our selves out of the way from them; and contrariwise to converse with their allies, familiars, and riends; and with them to bear company especially, yea, and to enter into their own houses for to complain and blame them before their very wives frankly and with liberty of speech. And yet it is a common saying, That brethren when they walke together should not so much as let a stone to be betwist them; nay, they are discontented and displeased in mind in case a dog chance to run overthwart them; and a number of such other things they leare, whereof there is not one able to make any breach or division between brethren; but in the mean while, they perceive not how they receive into the midft of them, and suffer to traverse and crossethem men of a currish and dogged nature, who can do nothing else but bark between and fow talle rumors and calumniations between one and another for to provoke them to jar and fall together by the eares; and therefore to great reason and very well to this purpose said Theophrastus, That if all things (according to the old proverb) should be common among friends, then most of all they ought to entertain friends in common; for private familiarities and acquaintances apart one from another are great means to disjoyn and turn away their hearts; for if they fail to love others, and make choice of other familiar friends, it must needs follow by consequence to take pleasure and delight in other companies, to effeem and affect others, yea, and to fuffer themselves to be ruled and led by others. For friendthips and amicies frame the natures and dispositions of men neither is there a more certain and affured fign of different humors and divers natures than the choice and election of different friends, in 11th lort as neither to eate and drink, nor to play, nor to país and ípend whole daies together in good fellowihip and company is to effectuall to hold and maintaine the concord and good will of brethren, as to hate and love the same persons; to joy in the same acquaintance; and contrariwile to abhor and thun the same company; for when brethren have friends common between them, the laid friends will never inffer any furmiles, calumniations and quarrels to grow between; and fay that peradventure there do arifefome judden heat of choler or grudging fit of complaint, preferriy it is cooled, quenched, and suppressed by the mediation of common friends, for ready they will be to take up the quarrell and scatter it so as it shall vanish away to nothing if they be indifferently affectionate to them both and that their love incline no more to the one fide than to the other for like as tin-fodder doth knit and rejoyne a crackt peece of braffe, in touching and taking hold of both tides and edges of the broken peeces, for that it agreeth and forteth as well to the one as to the other, and infereth from them both alike; even to ought a friend to be fitted and fitable indifferently unto both brethren, if he would knit furely, and confirme strongly their musuall bener olence and good will. But such as are unequal, and cannot intermeddle and go between the one as well as the other make a separation and disjunction. and not a found joynt, like as certaine notes or discords in musick. And therefore it may well be doubted and question made whether Hefiodes did well or no when he faid,

Make not a feere I thee advise Thy brothers peere in any wife.

For a different and lober companion common to both (as I faid) before, or rather incorporate (asit were) into them, shall ever be a sure knot to fasten brotherly love. But Hesiodus (as it should feem) meant and feared this in the ordinary and vulgar fort of men, who are many of them naught, by reaton that so customably they be given to jealouse and suspition, yea, and to selfe-love, which it we confider and objective it is well; but with this regard alwaies, that although a man yeeld equal goodwill unto a friend as unto a brother; yet neverthelesse in case of concurrence, he ought to reserve ever the preeminence and first place for his brother, whether it be in preferring him in any election of Magistrates or to the mannaging of State-affaires; or in bidding and inviting him to a solemne feaft, or publike affembly to contult and debate of weighty causes; or in recommending him to Princes and great Lords. For in such cases which in the common opinion of the world are reputed matters of honour and credit, a man ought to render the dignity, honour, and reward, which is beteeming and due to bloud by the course of nature. For in these things the advantage and prerogative will not purchase so much glory and reputation to a friend, as the repulse and putting by bring diffrace discredit and dishonour unto a brother. Well, as touching this old saying and sentence of Hesiodus, I have treated more at large elsewhere; but the tententious saying of Menander full wisely fet down in these words:

No man who loves a cother shall you fee Well pleas'd, himfelfe neglected for to be,

putteth us in mind and teacheth us to have good regard and care of our brethren, and not to preimme for much upon the obligation of nature, as to despise them. For the horse is a beast by nature loving to a man, and the dog loves his master; but in case you never thinke upon them, nor see unto them(as you ought) they will forgo that kind affection, eltrange themselves and take no knowledge of you. The body also is more neerly knit and united to the soule by the greatest bond of nature that can be; but in case it be neglected and contemned by her, or not cherished so tenderly as it looketh to be unwilling shall you see it to help and assist her, nay, full untowardly will it execute, or rather : give over it will altogether every action. Now to come more neere and to particularife upon this point honest and good is that care and diligence which is employed and shewed to thy brethren themselves alone; but better it would be far, if thy love and kind affections be extended as far as to their wives fathers and daughters husbands, by carrying a friendly mind and ready will to pleafure them likewile, and to do for them in all their occasions; if they be courteous and affable in saluting their fervants, such especially as they love and favour; thankfull and beholding to their Phyficians who had them in cureduring ficknesse and were diligent about them; acknowledging themfelves bound unto their faithfull and trufty friends, or to fuch as were willing and forward to take fuch part as they did in any long voyage and expedition, or to bear them company in wariare. And as for the wedded wife of a brother whom he is to reverence, repute and honor no lesse than a most facred and holy relique or monument, if at any time he happen to see her, it will become him to speak all honour and good of her husband beforeher; or to be offended and complain (as well as the) of her husband, if he fee northar store by her as he ought, and when she is angred to appeale and still her, Say also that she have done some light fault, and offended her husband, to reconcile him again unto her and entreat him to be content and to pardon her; and likewife if there be some particular and private caule of difference between him and his brother, to acquaint the wife therewith, and by her means to complain thereof, that the may take up the matter by composition and end the quarrell.

Lives thy brother a batcheler and hath no children? thou oughtest in good earnest to be angry with him for ir, to follicite him to marriage, yea with chiding, rating, and by all means urge him to leave this single life, and by entring into wedlock to be linked in lawful ailiance and affinity: hath he children? then you are to shew your good will and affection more manifestly, as well toward him as his wife, in honouring him more than ever before, in loving his children as it they were your own, yea, and the wing your felf more indulgent, kinde, and affable unto them; that it it chance they do faults and shrewd turns, (as little ones are wont) they run not away, nor retire into some blind and solitary corner for fear of father and mother, or by that means light into some light, unhappy and ungracious company, but may have recourse and rejuge unto their un le, where they may be admoniffied lovingly, and find an interceffor to make their excuse and get their pardon. Thus Platoreclaimed his prothers fon or nephew Spenfippm, from his loofe life and dissolute riot, without doing any harm or giving him foul words, but by winning him with hir and gentle language (whereas his father and mother did nothing but rate and crie out upon him continually, which caused him to runne way and keep out of their fight) he imprinted in his heart a great reverence of him, and a fervent zeal to imitate him, and to fet his mind to the study of Philosophie, not with standing many of his friends thought hardly of him and blamed him not a little, for that he took not a course with the untoward youth namely to rebuke, check, and chaftice him sharply; but this was evermore his anfwer unto them: That he reproved and took him down sufficiently, by shewing unto him by his own life and carriage; what difference there was between vice and vertue, between things honest and dishonest. Alenas sometime King of The falie, was hardly used and overawed by his father, for that he was infolent proud, and violent withall but contrariwile, his uncle by the fathers side, would give him entertainment, bear him out and makemuch of him; Now when upon a time the Theffalians fent unto Delpkos certain lots, to know by the oracle of god Apollo who should be their King? The foresid uncle of Alenas unwitting to his brother put in one for him: Then Pythia the Propheteffe gave answer from Apollo and pronounced, That Alenas should be King: The father of Alenas denied, and faid that he had cast in no lot for him; and it seemed unto every man that there was fome error in writing of those billes or names for the lottery, whereupon new messengers were disparched to the oracle for to cleer this doubt; and then Pythia in confirmation of the former choise answered:

I meanth at youth with reddish hair Whom dame Archedice in womb did bear.

Thus Alenas declared and elected King of Theffalie, by the oracle of Apollo, and by the means withall of his fathers brother, both proved himself afterward a most noble prince, excelling all his progenitours and predecessours, and also raised the whole Nation and his Countrey a great name and mighty puissance.

Furthermore, it is feemly and convenient by joying and taking a glory in the advancement, prof-perity, honours and dignities of brothers children to augment the lame, and to encourage and animate them to vertue, and when they do well to praise them to the full. Haply it might be thought an odious and unfeemly thing for a man to commend much his own fonne, but furely to praise a brothers some is an honourable thing, and since it proceedeth not from the love of a mans self, it cannot be thought but right, honest and (in truth) *divine: for surely me thinks the very name it telf (of Uncle) is tufficient to draw brethren to affect and love deerly one another, and to confequently their nephewes: and thus we ought to propose unto our selves, for to imitate the better divine and fort, and fuch as have been immortalised and deified in times past: for so Hercules notwithstanding an uncle. he had 70 formes within twain of his own, yet he loved Iolans his brothers forme no leffe then any of them; infomuch as even at this day in most place: there is but one alter crecked for him and his faid nephew together, and men pray joyntly unto Hercules and Iol.: ... Also when his brother Iphi-thu was slain in that famous battel which was fought neer Lacedamon, he was so exceedingly displeafed, and took such indignation thereat that he departed out of Pelopoins Junge left the whole Country. As for Lencothen, when her fifter was dead the nourified and brought up her child and together with her, ranged it among the Heavenly Saints: whereupon the Romane dames even at this day, when they celebrate the feath of Leucothea (wom they name Matura) carry in their arms and cherith terderly their fifters children, and not their own,

The Summary.

"Hat which is commonly faid, All extremities be naught, requireth otherwhiles an exposition, and namely, in that vertue which we call Temperance, one of the kinds or branches whereof consisteth in the right ne of the tongue, which is as much to far, as the skill and knowledge how to speak as it becometh: one the modera von of freech hash for the two extreams, Silence (a thing more often praje-worthy than reprochable) and Babbles against which, this Discourse is an afreprocuate jana naoves agung monostinis Disconte is many from the confusion of the same for the first fresh that the mids, we call not flence a vice, but fay, That a man never findesh harm by holdinghis peace. But as touching Garrulity or intemperate Speech, the Author showth in the very beginning of his Treatise, that it is amalady incurable and against nature; for it doth frustrate the talkative person of his greatest desire; to wit for to have audience and credit given him; also that it maketh a man inconsiderate, importune and malepart, ridiculous, mocked and hated, plunging him ordinarily into danger, as many events have proved by experience. For to discover this matter the better, he faith consequently: That the nature of vertuous men and those who have noble bringing up, is directly opposite unto that of long-tongued persons; and joyning ann ung mou the man ought not bewrap his secret together with those evils and inconvenientes which curiosity and much babble do bring, and confirming all by fine similitudes and no able examples: afterwards, taking in hand again his former freech and argument, he compareth a traitor and busiet alker together, to the end that all men hould so much the rather det. Of intemperate Speech or Garrulity.

Very hard and troublesome cure it is that Philosophie hath undertaken, namely, To heal the dileale of much prating; for that the medicine and remedie which the uleth, be words that must be received by hearing; and these great talkers will abide to hear no man, for that they have all the words themselves, and talk continually; so that the first mischief of those who can not hold their tongue and keep filence, is this; That they neither can nor will give ear to another, infomuch as it is a wilfull kind of deafnesse in men, who seem thereby to controll nature, and complain of her, in that where she hath allowed them two ears, she hath given them but one tongue. If then Euripides said very well unto a foolish auditour of his,

Pour I wife words, and counfell what I can With all my skill, into a fottish man, Unneth (hall I be able him to fill, If hold and keep the same he never will. a man may more truely and justly say unto (or rather of) a prating fellow, Pewr I wife words, and counsell what I can With all my skill unto a fottilh man, Unneth I shall be able him to fill, In case receive the same he never will.

and in truth, more properly it may be faid : That one powreth good advertisements about such an one and befide him rather, than into him, so long as he either speaketh unto him that listnesh not, or giveth no ear unto them that speak : for if a practing fellow chance to hear someshort and little tale such in the nature of this disease called Garrulity, that his hearing, is but a kind of taking his windenew, to babble it forth again immediatly, much more then it was, or like a whirlpool which whatfoever it taketh once, the fame it fendeth up again very often with the vantage. Within the City Olympia there was a porch orgallery called Heptaphonos, for that from one voice by fundry reflections and reverberations it rendred seven ecchoes: but if some speech come to the ears f a babler, and enter never so little in, by and by it resoundeth again on every And stirres the strings of secret heart within, which should lie still, and not be mooved therein.

infomuch, as a man may well fay, That the conducts and passages of their hearing reach not to the brainwhere their foul and mind is feated, but onely to their tongue: by reason whereof, whereas in pramymere then in the heard do reft in their understanding, in prasters they avoid away and others, the words that be heard do reft in their understanding, in prasters they avoid away and runne ont presently, and afterwards they go up and down like empty vessels, void of sense and full offound. Well, as incurable as fuch feem to be, yet if it may be thought availeable to leave no experiment untried for to do fuch good, we may begin our cure, and fay thus unto a busine prat-

Peace my good sonie, for Taciturnity

But among the rest, these be the two chief and principall, namely: To hear and to be heard; of which Brings ay with it much commodity. twain, our importunate talkers can attain neither the one nor the other, to unhappy they are as to be frustrate of that which they to much defire. As for other passions and maladies of the foul namely, Avarice, Ambition, Love, and Voluptuouiness, they do all of them in some fort enjoy their delires but the thing that troubleth and tormenteth these babbling bellows most, is this: That leeking for audience to much as they do, and nothing more, they can never meet with it, but every man shunneth their company, and flieth away as faft as his legs will carry him; or whether men be fet together in a knot, fadly talking in their round chaires, or walking in company, let them espic one of thefe praters comming toward them, away they go every one, that a man would jay the retreat were founded to quickly, they retire, And like as when in some assembly if all be hullit on a sudden To as there is not a word, we nie to by that Mercurie is come among them; even to when a practing fool entreth into a place where friends either are fet at the board to make merry, or otherwise met together in countell, every man straightwayes is filent and holdeth his peace, as being unwilling to minifer occasion unto him of talk; but if himself beginfirst to open his lips, up they rife all and are foon gone, as mariners suspecting, and doubting by the whistling northern wind from the top of craggyro.ks, and promontories some rough sea, and tearing to be from ack-sick, retire betimes into a bay for harbor: whereby it cometh to passe also, that neither at supper can he meet with euest willing to eat and drink with him, nor yet companions to lodge with him, either in journey by land, or voiage by sea, unlesse to by constreint. For so importunate he is alwayes, that onewhile he is ready to hang upon a mans cloak wherefoever he goes; another while he takes hold on the fide of his beard; as if he knocked at the door with his hand to force him to fpeak; in which case well fare a good pair of legs, for they are worth much mony at such a time; as Archilochus was wont to fay, yea, 8. Ariforle also that wise Philosopher for when upon a time he was much troubled with one of these busing pracers, who haunted and weated him out of measure with cavilling rales and many foolifh and abfurd discourses, iterating efficions these words: And is not this a wonderfull thing Arifforte? No iwis (quoth he again) but this were a wonder rather, if a man that hath feet of his own should stand still and abide to hear you thus prate. Unto another also of the same stamp, who after much pride pratle and a long discourse, said thus unto him: I doubt I have bid tedious unto you Philosopher with my many words: No in good sooth (quoth Ariffatle unto him) for I gave no ear at all unto you. For if other whiles men cannot shake such pracers off, but miltt of necessity let their congnes walk, this benefit he hath by the foul, that the retireth inwardly all the while lending the outward ears onely for them to beat upon , and dash as it were all about with their jangling bibble babble; for the in the mean time is otherwise occupied, and discourseth to her felf of divers matters within; by which means such fellowes can meet with no hearers that take heed what they say, or beleeve their words. For as it is generally held, that the natural seed of fuch as are lecherous and much given to the company of women is unfruitful and of no force to engendelseven fo the talk of these great praters is vain, barren, and altogether fruitlesse. And yet there is no part or member of our body that nature hath to furely defended (as it were) with a ftrong rampart, as the tongues for before it she hath set a pallatiado of sharp teeth, to the end that it peradventure it will not obey reason, which within holdeth it hard as with a strair bridle, but it will blarter out and not tarry within, we might bite it until it bleed again, and to restrain the intemperance thereof. For Euripides said not, that houses unbolted;

But tongues and mouth's unbrid'led if they be

Shall find in th'end missay and misery.

And those in my conceir who say that houses without dores, and purses without drings, serve their mafters in no flead and yet in the mean time, neither fet harch nor lock unto their mouths, but inferthem to run out & overflow continually, like unto the mouth of the sea Pontus, these I say in mine opinion feem to make no other account of words than of the bafeft thing in the world; whereby they are never beleeved ((ay what they will) and yet this is the proper end and (cope that all speech tendeth to, namely, to winne credit with the hearers; and no man will ever believe these great talkers, nonot when they speak the truth. For like as wheat if it be enclosed within some dank or moult vessell, doth swell and yeeld more in measure, but foruse is found to be worse; even so it is with the talk of a practing perfon; well may hemultiply and augment it with lying, bur by that means it leefeth all the force of perswasson. Moreover, what modest, civil, and honest manis there, who would not very carefully take heed of drunkenhessers ranger, (as some say) may well be sanged

* Ira fuer with rage and madnefle; and drunkennesse doth lodge and dwell with her, or rather is *madnevu is it selfs, onely in circumstance of time it may be counted lesse, for that it continues here with the but used in the country in regard of cause it is greater; for that it is voluntary, and we run wissely into it, and without any constraint. Now there is no one thing for which drunkennesse is so much blamed and accused as for intemperate speech and talk without end: for as the Poet shift,

Wine makes a man who is lothwife and grave To fing and chant, to laugh full wantonly, It caufath him to dance, and eke to rave, And many thing to do undecently.

for the greatest and worst matter that ensueth thereupon is not finging, laughing and dancing; three is another inconvenience in comparison whereof all these are nothing, and that is,

To blast abroad, and those words to reveal,

Which letter were within for to conceal. This is (1say) the misher most dangerous of all the reft: and it may be that the Poet coverly would affoil that question which the Philosophers have propounded and disputed upon: namely, what difference there might be between liberal, drinking of wine, and flark drunkennesse? in attributing unto the former mirth and jocundnesse extraordinary, and to the latter much babling and foolish prattles for according to the common proverb that which is seated in the heart and thoughtof atober person, lieth aloit in the mouth and tongue of a drunkard. And therefore wisely answered the Philosopher Bias unto one of these jangling and prating companions; for when he seemed to mock him for fitting (till, and faying nothing at a featt, infomuch as he gave him the lob and fool for it: And how is it possible (quoth he) thetasool should hold his peace at the table? There was upon a time a Citizen of Atjens who featied the Embassadors of the King of Persia, and for thathe per eived that these great Lords would take delight in the company of learned men and Philosophers, upon a brave mind that he carried invited they were all and met there together: now when all the reli began to discourse in general, and every man seemed to put in some vie for himself, andto hold and maintain one theam or other, Zene who late among them was onely filent and spake not a word; whereupon the faid Embassadors and Strangers of Persia began to be merry with him and to drink unto him round, saying in the end: And what shall we report of you Sir Zeno unto the King our mafter? Marie (quoth he) no more but this, that there is an ancient man at Athen; who can lit at the board and say nothing. Thus you see that silence argueth deep and profound wise-dome; it implies his briefly, and is a mystical server and divine vertues whereas drunkennesse is talkative, full of words, void of icule and reason; and indeed thereupon multiplieth to many words, and is ever jangling. And in truth the Philosophers themselves when they define drunkennesse say: That it is a kind of raving and speaking idlely at the table upon drinking too much wine; whereby it is evident, that they do not simply condemn drinking, so that a mankeep himself within the bounds of modesty and silence; but it is excessive and foolish talk, that of drinking wine maketh drunkeanesse. Thus the drunkard raveth and talketh idlely when he is cup-shotten at the board; but the pratter and man of many words doth it alwayes and in every place, in the market and common hal, at the theatre, in the publick galleries and walking places by day and by night. If he be a Physician and visit his patient, certes he is more grievous, and doth more hurt in his cure than the maladieit felf: if he be a passenger with others in a ship, all the company had rather be sea-sick than hear him prateis he set to praise thee, thou went better to be dispraised by another; and in a word, a man shall have more pleasure and delight to converse and commune with lewd persons, so they be discreeting their speech than with others that be buse-talkers though otherwise they be good honest men. True it is indeed that old N stor in a Tragedy of Sophocles speaking unto Ajax (who overshot himself in tome hot and hasty words) for to appeale and pacific him, faith thus after a mild and gracious man-

Illime not you fir Ajax for your speech, Naughtthough it be, your deeds are nothing leech.

But furely we are not so well affected unto a vain-prixing sellows for his importunate and unseasonable words, matreall his good works, and make them to lose their grace. Lysias upon a time, at the request of one who had a vailet oplead unto at the barre, penihed an oration for his purpose and gave it him. The party after he had read and read it over again; came unto Lysias heavy and ill-appayed, saying: The first time that I pertused your oration, me thought it was excellently well written, and I wondred at its but when I took it a second and third time in hand; it seemed very samply endired and carried no forcible and effectuals so that it why (quoth Lysias, and imited withals) know you not that you are to pronounce it but on e before the judges? and yet see and mark withals the persussive eloquence and sweet grace that is in the writing of Lysias, for I may be bold to say and affirm of him, that

And among those fingular commendations that are given out of any Poetimost true it is that Homer is he alone of all that ever were, who over ameall fatiety of the reader; seeming evermore new and fresh, flourishing alwayes in the prime of lovely grace, and appearing young still and amiable to win favour; howbeit in speaking and professing thus much of himself; from the still still are the still stil

It greeves me much for to rehearse again A tale that once delivered hath been plain.

He sheweth sufficiently that he avoideth what he can, and searcth that tedious satiety which solloweth hard at heels, and layeth wait (as it were)unto all long trains of speech; in which regard he leaderh the reader and hearer of his Poemes from one discourse and parration to another, and evermore with novelties doth fo refresh and recreate him, that he thinketh he hath never enough; whereas our long-tongued charterers do after a fort wound and weary the ears of their hearers by their tautologies and vain repetitions of the same things, as they that soil and slurry writing tables when they be fair scoured and clented : and therefore let us set this first and formost before their eyes, that like as they who force men to drink wine out of measure and undelaied with water, are the cause that the good blessing which was given us to rejoyce our hearts and make us pleasant and merry driveth some into sadnesse, and others into drunkennesse and violence; even so they that beyond all reason and to no purpose use their speech (which is a thing otherwise counted the most delightiome and amiable means of conference and fociety that men have together) cauled to be inhumane and unfociable, displeasing those whom they thought to please making them to be mocked at their hands, of whom they looked to be well esteemed, and to have their evil will and di pleafure, whose love and amity they make reckoning of. And even as he be by good right may be efteemed uncourreous and altogether uncivil. who with the girdle and tiffue of Venus, wherein are all forts of kind and amiable allurements, should repell and drive from him as many as defire his company; so he that with his speech maketh others heavy and himself hatefull, may well be held and reputed for a graceless man and of no bringing up in the world. As for other passions and maladies of the mind, some are dangerous, others odious, and some again ridiculous and exposed to mockery; but Garrulity is subject unto al these in conveniences at once. For such folk as are noted for their lavish tongue, are a meer laughing stock, and in every common and ordinary report of theirs, they minister occasion of laughter; hated they befor their relation of ill newes, and in danger they are because they cannot conceal and keep close their own secrets; hereupon Anacl arsis being invited one day and featled by Solon, was reputed wife, for that being afleep he was found and feen holding his right hand to his mouth, and his left upon his privies and natural parts : for good reason he had to think, that the tongue required and needed the stronger bridle and bit to restrain it: and in very truth it were a hard matter to reckon so many persons undone & overthrown by their intemperate & looselife, as there have been Cities and mighty States ruinated and subverted utterly, by the revealing and opening of some secrets. It fortuned that whiles Sylla did in leaguer before the City of Athens, and had not leafure to stay there long and continue the siege, by reason of other affairs and troubles pressed him sore, for of one side King Mithridates invaded and harried Asia, and on the other side the faction of Marius gathered firength; & having gotten head, prevailed much within Rome certain old fellowes being met in a Barbars shop within the City of Athens, who were blabs of their tongues, clattered it out in their talk together, that a certain quarter of the City named Heptacalchon was not infliciently guarded, and therefore the Town in danger to be surprised by that part; which talk of theirs was over-heard by certain espies, who advertised Syllas io much; whereupon immediately he brought all his forces to that side, and about midnight gave an hot assault, made entry & went within a very little of forcing the City, and being master of it all, for he filled the whole fireet called Ceramicum with flaughter and dead carcasses, infomuch as the channels run down with blood. Now was he cruelly bent against the Athenians more for their hard language which they gave him, than for any offence or injury otherwise that they did unto him, for they had flouted and mocked Sylla, together with his wife Metella; and for that purpose they would get upon the walles and fay; Sylla, is a Sycamoor or Mulbery, bestrewed all over with dusty-meal; besides many other such foolish jibes and raunts; and so for the lightest thing in the world (as Plate slith) to wit, words which are but wind, they brought upon their heads a most heavy and grievous penalty. The garrulity and over-much talk of one man, was the only hinderance that the City of Rome was not set free and delivered from the tyranny of Nero. For there was but one night between the time that Nero should have been murthered on the morrow, and all things were ready and prepared for the purpose but he who had undertaken the execution of that feat, as he went toward the Theatre, espied one of those persons who were condemned to die, bound and pinnioned at the prison door, and ready to be led and brought before Nero; who hearing him to make piteous moan and lamenting his miserable fortune, steps to him and rounding him softly in the ear: Pray to God poor man (quoth he) that this one day may passe over thy head, and that thou die not to day, for to morrow thou shalt commethanks. The poor prisoner taking hold presently of this ænigmaticall and dirk speech, andthinking (as I suppose) that one bird in hand is better than two in bush, and according to the common faying, that made choice of faving his life by the furer way, rather than by the juster means for he discovered unto Nero that which the man had whispered secretly unto him: whereupon presently the party was apprehended and carried away to the place of torture, where by tacking, scorching and scorring. hewas urged miterable wretch, to conteste and speak out that perforce, which of himself he had revealed without any traint at all. Zeno the Philotopher fearing that when his body was put to dolorous and horrible torments, he should be forced even against his will to bewray and disclose tome fecret plot; bit-off his tongue with his own teeth and tout it in the Tyrants face, Notable is the example of Lean, and the reward which the had for containing and ruling her tongue is finguhr, An her of the was and very familiar with Harmedius and Ariftogiton; by means of which inward acquaintance privy the was, and party as farre forth as a woman might be to that compiracy which they had complotted against the uturping Tyrants of Athem, and the hopes that they builded upon (Drunk the hadout of that fair cup of Love, and thereby vowed never to reveal the fecrets of god Cupid.) Now after that their two paramours and lovers of her had failed of their enterprise and were put to death; the was called into quellion and put to torture, and therewith commanded to de here the relt of the complices in that conspiracy, who as yet were unknown and not brought to light-but to constant and resolute she was that she would not detect so much as one, but endures all pains and extremities whaticever; whereby the shewed that those two younggentlemen had done nothing unfitting their persons, and nobility inmaking choise to be enamoured of her. In regard of which rare ferrery of hers, the Athenians caused a Lionesse to be made of brasle without a tongue, and the same in memorial of her to be erected and set up at the very gate and entry of their Citadelli gi.ing posterity to understand by the generosity of that beast, what an undaunted and invincible heart the had; and likewise of what taciturnity and trust in keeping secrets, by taking it tonguelesse: and to faf a truth, never any word spoken served to so good stead as many conceased and held in, have profited. For why? A man may one time or other utter that which he once kept in; but being fpoken, it cannot possibly be recalled and unsaid, for out it is gone already and spread abroad sundry wayes. And hereuponit is (I luppose) that we have men to teach us for to speak, but we learn of the gods to hold our peace. For in acrinces religious mysteries and ceremonies of divine service we receive by tradition, a custome to keep filence, And even to the Poet Homer feigned Ulyffes (whose eloquence otherwife was to tweet) to be of all men most filent and of fewest words his son likewise, his wife and nurse, whom you may hear thus speaking:

A fool is he who leaving that which ready is and fure, Doth follow after things that be unready and unfure.

As foon hall flock of flurdy oak it tell, Or iron fo ferong, as I will it reveal.

And Ulyfeshimlest fitting by Feneloge, before he would be known unto her who he was,

Gricu'd in his mind, and pitied to belold His wift by tears to flew what heart did feel, But all the while his eyes he ftiff did hold, Which ftird no more than korn or fturdy fteel;

fo full was his tongue of patience, and his lips of continence. For why? reason had all the parts of his body so obetant and ready at command, that it gave order to the eyes not to shed tears; to the tongue not to utter a word; to heart not to pant or tremble, nor so much as to sob or some yea his reason had gotten the maftery of those inward and secret motions which are void and incapable of reason, as having under her hand the very blood and vital spirits in all obessance his people as on drain about him were for the most part of that disposition; for that wanted this of confiancy and loyaley to their lord in the highest degree, to suffer themselves to be pulled and haled, to be tugged and tosses, and adalted against the hard ground under soot by the gyant Cyclops, tather than to atter one word against suffer to be every that lodg of wood which was burnt at the one end and an instrument made ready for to put out his onely eye that he had? bay, they endured rather to be eaten and devoured raw by him, than to disclose any of suffer his secrets. Pittaens therefore did not amilte, who when the King of Egypt had sentunto him a beast for factifiee, and willed him with it to take out and lay apart the best and worst piece thereof, placked out the tongue and sent it unto him, as being the organ of many good things, and no lesse instrument of the worst that be in the world. And Lady Ino in Euriphdes speaking freely of her self, faith that she knew the store.

Whenth at the ought her tongne to held, And when to flock the neight be bold.

For certainly those who have had noble and printely bringing up indeed, learn first to keep slence, and afterwards how to speak. And therefore king Antigoma the Great, when his some upona time asked him. When they should dislodge and break up the campi what sonned quoth he) art thou alone attaid, that when the time comes should had not hear the Trumper sound the remove? Lo, how he would not trult him with a word of secrecy, unto whom he was to leave his Kingdomin succession! teaching him thereby, that he also another day should in such cases be wary and starting forward of some expeditionals! I with (quoth he) that my shirt which is next to my skinner, knew this my inward intent and secret purpose! I would put to off and flings it into the fire. King Esments being advertised that Crateria was coming agains! him with his for es keptit to himself, and would not acquaint any of his neerest friends therewish, but made semblance and gave it out

(though untruly) that it was N. oprotomus who had the leading of that power; for him did his folediers contemne and make no reckoning of, whereas the glory and renown of Craterin they had in admiration, and loved his vertue and valour: now when no man else but himselfe knew of Crassrus his being in the field, they gave him battell, vanquished him, slew him before they were aware, neither tooke they knowledge of him before they found him dead on the ground. See how by a fleatagem of fe, recy and f.len. othe victory was archieved, only by concealing to hardy and terrible an enemy; infomuch, as his very friends about him admired more his wildome in keeping this fecret from them, than complained of his diffidence and diffruit of them. And tay that amon should complaine of thee in such a case, better it were yet to be challenged and blamed for diffrufling, all the while thou remainest sate and obtaine a victory by that meanes, than to be justly acculed after an overthrow, for being to open and trulling fo early. Moreover, how excell thou confidently and boldly blane and reprove another for not keeping that fearet, which thou thy telle halt revealed? For if it was behoovefull and expedient that it mould not be known, why halt thou told it to another? But in case when thou hast let flie a secret from thy seife unto aman, thou wouldst have him to hold it in, and not blurt it out, furely it cannot be but thou half better confidence in another than thy selfe: now if he be like thy selfe, who will pitty thee is thou come by a mischiefe? Is he better, and so by that means tweth thee harmelesse beyond all reason and ordinary course; then hast thou met with one more faithfull to thee than thou art thy seife: but haply thou wilt fay, He is my very good friend; so hath he another friend (be sure) whom he will do as much for, and disclose the same secret unto, and that friend (no doubt) hath another. Thus one word will get more till, it will grow and multiply by a fute and fequen e linked and hanging to an intemperate tongue: for like as unity to long as the paffeth not her bounds, but continueth and remaineth fillin her felfe is one and no more, in which respect she is called in Greek, Monas, that isto say, Alone; whereas the number of twaine is the beginning of a diversity (asit were) and difference, and therefore indefinite; for ftraightwaies is Unity passed forth of it felse by doubling, and so turneth to a plurality; evento a word or speech, all the while it abideth enclosed in him who first knew it, is truly and properly called a Secret, but after it is once gotten forth, and fet a going, so that it is come unto another it beginneth to take the name of a common brute and rumour: for as the Poet very well faith, Words lave wings. A bird, if the be let flie once out of our hands, it is much ado to catch againe, and even fo, when a word hath passed out of a mans mouth, hardly or unneth may we with-hold or recover; for it flieth amaine, it flappeth her light wings, fetching many a round compasse, and spreadeth every way from one quarter to another: wellmay marriners thay a ship with cables and anchors when the violence of the wind is ready to drive and carry her an end, or at leaftwifethey may moderate her swift and flight course; but if a word be issued out of the mouth, as out of her haven, and have gotten lea-roome, there is no bay nor harbour to ride in, there is no casting of anchor will serve the turne, away she goes with a mighty noise and hurry, untill in the end The runs upon some rock and is split, or else into a great and deep gulph, to the present danger of him who let her forth;

Altownwill heare, a word to one let sall,

The Senate of Rome upon a time fate in fad and ferious countell many daies together, about a matter of great ferrecy: now the thing being fo much the more suspected and hearkened after as it was lefte apparant and known abroad; a certaine Romane dame, otherwise a good icher and wife matron (howbeit a woman) importuned her husband and instantly befought him, of all loves to tell her what this lecret matter might be upon which they did fix to close in confutation? protefling with many an oath and execrable curse to keep silence, and not to utter it to any creature in the world; you must thinke also, that site had teares accommand, lamenting and complaining withall, what an unhappy woman she was in case her husband would not trust her so much as with a word: the Roman Senatour her husband minding to try and reprove her folly: Thou hast overcome me (fweet heart, quoth he) and through thine importunity, thou shalt heare of a strange and terrible occurrent that troubleth us all So it is, that we are advertised by our Priests that there hath been a larke of late feen flying in the aire with a golden cope or creft on her head in manner of an helmer, and withall bearing a javelin: hereupon we do confer and confult with our Soothfayers and Diviners, defirous to be certified out of their learning whether this prodigious token portend good or hurt to the Common-weale? But keep it to thy selfe (as thou lovest me) and tell it no body. When he had thus faid, he went forth toward the Common Hall and Market-place: his wife incontinently had no tooner pied one of her waiting maids comming into the roome, but the drew her apair, began to beat and knock her own breft, to rent and teare the haire off her head, and therewith: Ah, we eisme (quoth she) for my poore husband, my (weet native country; alas and welladay, what shall we do, and what will become of usall; as if she taught her maid and were desirous that she should say thus unto her againe: Why, what is the matter Mistris? Now when the maiden thereupon asked her, What news? The tettale an end and told all mary the forgate not the common and ordinary burden or clause, that all blabs of their tongue use to come in with: But in any case (quoth she) say nothing, but keep it to thy selfe. Scarce was she gone out of her Miltris sight, but focus one of her fellows whom the found most at leifure, and doing little or nothing, to her she imparted all. That wen hagaine made no more ado, but to her lover she goes, who haply then was come to visit her, and telleth him as much. By this meanes the tale was bruted abroad, and passed roundly from one to another; infomuch as the rumour thereof was run into the market place, and the e went current beforethe first author and deviser thereof himselfe was gotten thither. For there meets with him one of his familiars and friends: How now (quoth he) are you come but now directly from your house to the market place: No (quoth he againe) I am but newly come: Why then beinke (faith the other) you have heard no news? News (quoth he) what news should I heare And what tidings can you tell me of? Why man (answered he againe) there hath been of late a Larke teen with a golden cop or creft on her head, and carrying beside a javelin; and the Consuls with other Magistrates are ready to call a Senate house for to sit upon this strange occurrent. With that the Senatour beforelaid, turning afide and smiling, thus said to himselie: Well done wife, I con thee thanke for thy quicknesse and celerity, thou hast quitthy selfe well indeed, that the word which erewhile Intered unto thee is gotten before me into the market-place. Well, the first thing that he did was this, To the Magistrates he went fraightwaies, fignified unto them the occasion of this speech, and freed them from all feare and trouble: but when he was come home to his own house he sell in hand to chastise his wife: How now Dame (quoth he) how is this come to passe? You have undoneme for ever; for it is found and known for a truth, that this secret and matter of countell which I imparted to you is divulged and published abroad, and that out of my house: and thus your unbrid ed tongue is the cause that I must abandon and flie my countrey, and forthwith depart into exile. Now when at the first she would have denied the thing stourly, and alledged for her excuse and defence saying, Are not there three hundred Senatours besides your selfe, who heard it as we'l as you? No marvell then if it be known abroad. What tell you me of three hundred (quoth he?) Upon your importunate instance I devised it of mine own head, inmirth to tryyour filence, and whether you could keep counfell. Certes, this Senatour was a wife man, and went lafely and warily to worke, who to make proofe of his wile, whom he took to be no foundernor furer than a crackt and rotten veffell, would not pour einto it either wine or oile, but water only, to fee if it would leake and run out. But Fulvius, one of the favorites and minions of Augustus the Emperour, when he was now well stepped in yeares, having heard him toward his latter daies, lamenting and bewailing the detolate effate of his house, in that he had no children of his ownbody begotten, and that of his three nephews or fifters children two were dead, and Posthumius (who only remained alive) upon an imputation charged upon him confined, and living in banishment, whereupon he was enforced to bring in his wives fon, and declared him heire apparant to succeed him in the Empire: notwithstanding upon a tender compassion he was otherwhiles in deliberation with himselfe, and minded to recall his foresaid fisters son from exile, and the place whereunto he was confined Fulvius (I say) being privy to these moanes and designes of his, went home and told his wise all that he had heard. She could not hold but goes to the Empresse Livia, wife of Augustus, and reported what her husband Fulviss had told her. Whereupon Livia taking great indignation, sharply did contest and expossulate with Cafar in these termes: That seeing it is to (quoth she) that you had to long before projected and determined such a thing, as to call home againe your Nephew aforefaid; why fent you not for him at the first, but exposed me to hatred, enmity, and war with him, who another day should weare the Diadem and be Emperour after your decease? Well the next morning betimes, when Fulvius came, as his manner was, to falute Cafar, and give him good morrow, after he had faid unto him xuige Kaisus; that is, God fave you Cafar. He refaluted him no otherwise but this vyiare quality that is God make you wife Fulvius. Fulvius soone found him and conceived prefently what he meant thereby; whereupon he retired home to his house with all speed and called for his wife; unto whom, Cafar (quoth he) is come to the knowledge that I have not kept his countell nor concealed his secrets; and therefore I am resolved to make my selseaway with mine own hands. And well worthy (quoth she) for justly you have deserved death, who having lived folong with me knew not the incontinence of my tongue all this while, nor would take heed and beware of it; but yet fuffer me first to dye upon your sword; and with that catching hold thereof, killed her selfe before her husband. And therefore Phillipides the Comadian, did very wifely in his answer to King Lysimachus, who by way of all courtesse making much of him, and minding to do him honour, demanded of him thus: What wouldst thou have me to impart unto thee of all other treasure and riches that I have? What it shall please your Majesty (quoth he) my gracious Lord, so it be none of your secrets.

Moreover, there is adjoyned ordinarily unto Garrulity, another vice no leffe than it; namely, Buhe intermedling and Curiohty, for men defire to heare and know much news, because they may report and blaze the same abroad, and especially if they be secrets. Thus go they up and down listening, enquiring, and fearthing if they can find and discover some close and hidden speeches, adding as it were some old surcharge of odious matters to their toies and fooleries; which maketh them afterwards to be like unto little boies, who neither can hold you in their hands, nor yet will let itgo; of to fay more truly, they claspe and containe in their bosomessecret speeches, resembling serpents, which they are not able to hold and keep long, but are eaten and gnawn by them. It is faid that certaine fishes called the Sea-needles, yea, and the vipers do cleave and burst when they bring forth their young; and even so, secrets when they be let fall out of their mouths who cannot containe them, undo and overthrow those that reveale them. King Selenem (him I meane who was furnimed Cullinicity, that is, the victorious Conquerour) in one battell against the Galatians, was defeated be and his whole power; whereupon he tooke from his head the Diadem or Royall band that he ware, and rode away on the ipur on horseback with three or source in his company, wandring through defarts and by-waies unknown folong, untill both horse and man were done, and ready to faint for wearingtle; at length he came unto a country kearnes or pealants cottage; and finding (by good fortune) the good man of the house within, asked for bread and water; which the said pealant or cottier gave unto him; and not that only, but look what the field would afford else besides, he imparted unto him and his company with a willing heart and in great plenty, making them the best cheere that he could devile: in the end he knew the Kings face, whereupon he took fach joy, in that his hap was to entertaine the King in his necessity, that he could not containe himselfe, nor second the King in diffembling his knowledge, who detired nothing more than to be unknown: when he had therefore brought the King onward on his way, and was to take his leave of him: Adieu (quothhe) King Seleusus: with that the Kingreached forth his hand, and drew him toward him, as ithe would have kiffed him, and withall beckned to one of his followers, and gave him a fecret tokento take his fword and make the man shorter by the head.

Thus whiles he fp. ke (I wot not what) his head Off gres and lies in dust when he was dead.

Whereas, if he could have held his tongue a little while longer, and mastered himselfe, when the King afterwards had better fortune and recovered his greatnesse and puissance, he should in my conceit have gotten more thanks at his hands, and been better rewarded for keeping filence than for all the courtene and hospitality that he shewed. And yet this fellow had in some fort a colourable excute for this intemperate tongue of his, to wit his own hopes and the good will that he bare unto the King: but the most part of these pratiers undo themselves without any cause or pretense at all of reason: like as it befollunto Denys the tyrants barber: for when (upon a time) there were some talking in his thop as touching his tyrannicall government and estate, how assured it was, and as hard to be rained or overthrown as it is to break the Diamond: the faid barbar laughing thereat: I marvell (quoth he) that you should say so of Denys, who is so often under my hands, and at whose throat in a manner every day I hold my razor: these words were soon carried to the tyrant Denys, who faire crucified this barber and hanged him for his foolish words. And to say a truth, all the fort of these barbers be commonly bufie fellows with their tongue; and no marvell, for lightly the greatest praters and idlest persons in a countrey frequent the barbers shop, and sit in his chaire, where they keep such that, that it cannot be but hy hearing them prate so cultomably, his tongue also must walke with them. And therefore King Archelaus antiwered very pleasantly unto a barber of his that was a man of no few words, who when he had cast his linnen cloath about his shoulders, said unto him: Sir, may it please your Highnesse to tell me how I shall cut or shave you: Mary (quoth he) holding thy tongue and laying not a word. A barber it was who first reported in the City of Litheus the news of that great discomfiture and overthrow which the Athenians received in Sicily; for keeping his shop (as hedid) in that end of the suburbs called Prraum, he had no sooner heard the faid unlucky news of a certaine flave who fled from thence out of the field, when it was loft but leaving thop and all at isse and feven, ran directly into the city, and never refted to bring the faid tidings whiles they were fresh and fire-new;

For fea e some esse might all the honour win,

And he too late or second hould come in.

Now upon the broaching of these unwelcome tidings, a man may well thinke (and not without good cause) that there was a great stir within the City; insomuch, as the people assembled together into the Market-place or Common hall, and fearth was made for the author of this rumour: hereupon the said barber was haled and brought before the body of the people, and examined; who knew not fo much as the name of the party of whom he heard this news; But well affured I am (quoth he) that one faid so, mary who it was, or what his name might be I cannor tell. Thus it was taken for an headlesse tale, and the whole Theatre or Assembly was so moved to anger, that they cried out with one voice; Away with the villaine have the varlet to the rack, fer the knave upon the wheele, heit is only that hath made all on his own finger, ends, this hath he, and none but he devised; for who else has h heard it or who besides him hath believed it? Well, the wheele was brought, and uponit was the barber fretched: meane while and even as the poore wretch was hoyled thereupon, behold there arrived and came to the City those who brought certaine news indeed of the said defeature, even they who made a shift to elcape out of that unfortunate field: then brake up the affembly, and every man departed and retired home to his own house for to be waile his own private losse and calamity, leaving the filly barber lying along bound to the wheele, and racked out othelength, and there remained he until it was very late in the evening. at what time he was let loofe: & no fooner was he at liberty but he must needs enquire news of the executioner, & namely, what they heard abroad of the General himself Nicias. & in what fort he was slain? So inexpugnable and incorrigible a vice is this gotten by custome of much talke, that a man cannot leave it though he were going to the gallows, nor keep in those tidings which no man is willing to heare: for certes, like as they who have dranke bitter potions, or unfavoury medicines, cannot away with the very cups wherein they were; evento, they that bring evill and heavy tidings, are ordinarily hated and detelled of those unto whom they report the same. And therefore Sophocles the Poet hath very finely dillinguished upon this point in these verses:

Meslenger. Is it your least, or elfe your care, That this offends, which you do heare? And why dost thou scarch my disease To know what griefe doth me difplease? Messenger.

His deeds (I see) offend your heart,
But my words cause your eares to smart.

Well then, those who tell us any world news be as odious as they who work our woe; and yet for all that there is no restraint and bridling of an untemperate tongue that is given to walke and overreach, It fortuned one day at Lacedamon, that the temple of Juno, called there Chalciacos, was robbed, and within it was found a certaine empty flagon or stone bottle for wine: great running there was and concourse of the people thither, and men could not tell what to make of that flagon: at last one of them that flood by; My matters (quoth he) if you will give me leave, I shall tell you what my conceit is of that flagon, formy mind gives me (faith he) that these Church-robbers who projected to execute so perilous an enterprize, had first dranke the juyce of hemlock before they entred into the action and afterwards brought wine with them in this bottle, to the end that if they were not surprised nor taken in the manner, they might save their lives by drinking each of them a good draught of meere wine; the nature and vertue whereof (asyou know well enough) is to quench as it were and diffolve the vigour and a rength of that poylon, and fo go their waies fafe enough, but if it chance that they were taken in the deed doing, then they by means of that hemlock which they had dranke die ancafie death, and without any great paine and torment before that they were put to torture by the Magistrate. He had no sooner delivered this speech, but the whole company who heard his words thought verily that fuch a contrived devise, and so deep a reach as this never came from one that suspected such a matter, but rather knew that it was so indeed; whereupon they flocked round about, and hemmed him in, and on every fide each one had a faying unto him: And what art thou (quoth one?) From whence art thou faith another? Here comes one and asketh, who knew him? There tets upon him another, faying, And how commest thou by the light of all this that thou half delivered? To be short, they handled the matter so well that they forced him to bewray himselfe in the end, and to consesse that he was one of them that committed the sacriledge. Were not they also who murdered the Poet Ibyeus. discovered and taken after the same manner? It hapned that the faid murderers were fet at a Theatre to behold the plaies and pallimes which were exhibited; and seeing a flight of Cranes over their heads, they whispered one to another: Loe these be they that will revenge the death of Ibycus. Now had not Ibycus been a long time before feen, and much fearch was made after him because he was out of the way and missed; wherupon they that fate next unto these men, over-hearing those words of theirs, and well noting the speech, went directly to the Magistrates and Justices to give intelligence and information of their words. Then were they attached and examined; and thus being convicted suffered punishment in the end, not by meanes of those Cranes that they talked of, but surely by their own blab-tongues; as if some hellish sury had forced them to disclose that murder which they had committed. For like as in our bodies the members diteated and in paine draw humours continually unto them, and all the corruption of the parts neare unto them flow thither; even so, the tongue of a babling fellow, being never without an inflammation and a feaverous pulle, draweth alwaies and gatherest to it one fecret and hidden thing or other. In which regard it ought to be well fenced with a rampart, and the bulwarke of reason should be evermore set against it, which like unto a bar may stay and Rop that overflowing and inconstant lubricity which it hath; that we be not more undiscreet and foolish beasts than geese are, who when they be to take a slight into Cilicia over the mountaine Tawns, which is full of eagles, take upevery one in their bill a good big stone, which serveth them inflead of a lock or bridle to reftraine their gagling; by which devife they may passe all night long without any noise, and not be heard at all or descried by the said eagles.

Now if one should demand and aske of me, what perion of all others is most mischievous and dangerous : I beleeve very well there is no man would name any other but a traitour, And yet Enthyerates (as faith Demestheres) by his treason covered his own house with a roose made of timber that he had out of Macedonia. Philocrates also lived richly and gailant of that great masse of gold and filver which he had of King Philip for betraying his countrey, and therewith furnished himfelfe with brave harlots gallant concubines, and dainty fishes. Euphorbius also and Philagrus, who betrayed Eretria were endowed by the King with faire lands and postessions: but a pratter is a traitor voluntary and for nothing he demandeth no hire at all, neither looketh he to be follicited, but offereth himlesse and his service; nor betrayeth unto the enemies either horses or walls, but revealeth hidden secrets and disclose the speeches which are to be convealed whether it be in judicial matters of law, or in feditious differeds, or in managing of State-of tires. it makes no matter, and no man connects him thanks; may, he will thinke himselie beholding to others, if they will vouchiate o give him audience. And therefore, that which is commonly taid to a prodigall person, who soolish-

ly misspendeth and vainly wasteth his substance he cares not how to gratifie every man; Thou are not liberall, this is no curtese; a vice it is rather that thou art disposed unto, thus to take pleafure in nothing, but giving and giving still. The same rebuke and reprehension serveth very fitly for a babler: Thou art no friend nor well-willer of mine, thus to come and discover these things unto me; this is thy fault, and a dilease which thou art fick of, that lovest to be clattering, and hast no mind

Now would I have the Reader to thinke that I write not all this so much to accule and blame the vice and malady of garrulity, as to cure and heale the tame; For by judgement and exercise we furmount and overcome the vices and passions of the mind; but judgement, that is to say, knowledge mult go before: for no man accustometh himselse to void, and (as it were) to weed them out of the soule, unlesse he hate and detest them first. Now then, and never before, I egin we to take an hatred to vices, when by the light of reason we consider and weigh the shame and losse that commeth unto us by them; as for example, we know and fee that the legreat praters; whiles they defire to winlove, gaine hatred; thinking to do a pleasure, they displeases looking to be welles cemed, are mocked and derided; they lay for lucre, and getnothing; they hurt their friends, aide their enemies, and undo themselves.

So then, let this be the first receit and medicine for to cure this malady; even the consideration and reckoning up of the shamefull infamies and painefull inconveniencies that proceed and ensue thereof. The second remedy is, to take a survey of the contrary; that is to say, to heare alwaies; to remember and have ready at hand the praises and commendations of filence, the majesty (I lay) the myslicall gravity and holinesse of taciturnity, to represent alwaies unto our mind and understanding how much more admired, how much more loved, and how far wifer they are reputed, who speake roundly at once, and in few words, their mind pithily; who in a short and compendious speech comprehend more good matter and substance a great deale than these great talkers, whose tongues are unbridled and run at randome. Those (I say be they whom Place so highly estemeth, comparing them to skilfull and well practised Ar. hers and Darters, who have the sear of shooting arrows and launcing darts; for they know how and when to speake graciously, and bitterly, soundly, pithily, and compactly. And verily, wile Lycurgus framed and esercifed his Citizens immediately from their childhood by keeping them down at the first with silence to this short and sententious kind of speech, whereby they spake alwaies compendiously, and knit up much in a little. For like as they of Biskar or Celsib ria do make their fleele of iron, by enterring it and letting it lie first within the ground, and then by purging and refining it from the groffe, terrene, and earthly substance that it hath; even so the Laconians speech hath no outward barke (as a man would say) or crust upon it, but when all the superfluity thereof is taken away, it is steeled (as it were) and tempered, yea, and hath an edge upon it fit for to worke with all and to pierce : and verily that apophthegmaticall and powerfull speech of theirs, that grace which they had to answer sententiously and with such gravity, together with a quick and ready gift to meet at every turne with all objections, they attained unto by nothing else but by their much silence. Wherefore it was very expedient to set ever before the eyes of these great praters those short and witty speeches, that they may see what grace and gravity both they have : as for example, The Lacedamonians unto Philip greeting: Diony sius in Corinth: Allo another time, when Philip had written unto them to this effect: If I enter once into the confines of Laconia, will deftroy you utterly that you shall never rise againe. They returned this answer againe in writing, Alaz; that is, If. Likewise when King Demetrius in great displeasure and indignation cried out aloud in these words: The Lacedamonians have fent me an emt affador alone, and who hath no fellow; Meaning that there came but one: the faid embaffedour nothing daunted at his words, answered readily: One for one, Certes, they that used to speake short and sententiously were highly esteemed long ago with our ancients and forefathers. And hereupon it was that the Amphy-Eliones, that is to fay, the Deputies or States for the generall counsell of all Greece, gave order, that there should be written over the doore of the Temple of Apollo Pythius, not the Odysses or Iliads of Homer; ne yet the Canticles or Peans of Pindarus; but these briefe sentences: Traffic ourres; that is, Know thy selfe, Muth ayar; that is, Too much of northing, Also Eyyda, naga & ara; That is, Be surery and make account to pay: so highly esteemed they a plaine, simple, and round manner of speaking, which comprised in few words much matter, and a sentence massie and sound : and no marvell for Apollo himselfe loveth brevity, and is in his oracles very succinct and pithy; wherefore else is he iurnamed Loxius? But because he chooseth rather to avoid plurality than obscurity of words. They allowho without word uttered at all fignifie the conceptions of their mind by certaine symbolicall devises, and after that manner deliver good lessons unto us; are they not fundry waies commended and admired exceedingly? Thus Heraclitus in times pall, being requested by his neighbours and fellow-citizens to make a fententious speech unto them, and deliver his opinion as touthing civil unity and concord, mounted up into the pulpit, and taking a cup of cold water in his hand, bespiced it (as it were) with some meale, and with a sprig or two of the herbe Penniroyall, shookall together: which cone he drank it off, and so came down and went his way: giving them by this demonstration thus much to understand; that if men would take up with a little, and be content with things at hand, without defiring costly superfluities, it were the next way to keep and preferve Cities in peace and concord.

Scylarus a King of the Scythians left behind him fourfcore fons; and when the houre of his death drew neare, he called for a bundle of darts, or a sheafe of arrows to be brought unto him, which he put into his childrens hands one after another, and willed each one to breake and built the same in peeces, bound as it was entire and whole together: which when they had assayed to do. and putting all their frength unto it, could not butgave over: himselfe tooke out of the sheate or knitch the darts aforefaid one by one, and knapt them in twaine single as they were with facility; declaring by this device, that so long as they held together their union and agreement would be firong and invincible; but their differed and diffunion would make them feeble, and be an occasion that they should not long continue. He then that continually shall have these and such like precedents in his mouth, and ordinarily repeat and remember the fame, will peradventure take no great pleasure and delight in idle and superfluous words. Formine own part, surely I am abashed mightily at the example of that domestical servant at Rome, when I consider with my selfe what a great matter it is to be well advited before a man speaketh, and constantly to hold and maintaine the resolution of any purpole. Publius Pifo the great Oratour and Rhetorician, because he would provide that his people and fervitours about him should not trouble his head with much prattle, gave order and commandement unto them, that they should make answer unto his demands only, and no more: now being minded one day to entertaine (Iedius the chiefe ruler of the City at his house, he bad him to supper, and caused him to be sent for and called at the time accordingly; for a stately and royall fealt he had provided, by all likelihood, and as any man would think no leffe : now when funper time was come the rest of the invited guests were present, Clodies only they stayed & looked for; meane while, Pife had fent out oftentimes unto him one of his fert itours who was wont ordinarily to bid his quells for to fee whether he were comming or would come to supper or no? But when it grew late in the evening, to that there was no hope now that he would be there: Now Errah (quoth P fo to his man afore aid) didft thou not invite and bid him? Yes iwis Sir: Why then comes henot faid the make mafter againe? Forfooth (quoth he) because he denied to come: And why toldft thou not me this immediately? Because in you never asked me the question. Well this was a Romane fervicour; but an Athenian fervant I trow whiles he is digging and delving, will tell his malter news, and namely, what be the articles and capitulations in the treaty and composition of peace. So powerfull and for ible is use and custome in all things, whereof I purpose now to treat; for that there is no bit nor bridle that is able to represse, tame, and keep in a talkative tongue, but it is custome that must do the deed, and conquer this maiady.

First and formost therefore, when incompany there shall be any question propounded by them that are about thee frame and use thy selfe to hold thy tongue and be slent untill thou see that every man elle refuteth to speake and make answer: for according to Sophocles,

To counfell and to run a courfe in race . Have not both twaine one end, to hafte arace.

No more verily doth a voice and an answer shoot at the same marke that running aimeth at : for there; to wit, in a race, he winnerh the prize that getteth to be formost; but here, if another man have delivered afufficient answer, it will be well enough, by praising and approving his speech, to gaine the opinion and reputation of a courteous perion; if not, then will it not be thought impertinent neither can envy or hatred come of it in cale a man do gently shew and open that wherein the other was ignorant, and to after a mild and civill manner tupply the defect of the former answer! but above all this regard would be had: That when a question or demand is addressed and directed unto another, we take it not upon our felves; and so anticipate and prevent his answer; and peradventure, neither in this nor in any thing elle is it decent and commendable to offer and put forth out lelves too forward before we be required; and in this case, when another man is asked a question, our own intrusion, with the putting by of him is not seemly; for we may be thought (into doing) both to injure and differed the party demanded as if he were not able to performe that which was put upon him, and also to reproach the demandant, as though he had little skill and discretion to aske a thing of him who could not give the same: and that which more is, such malapert boldnesse and heady haltin. se incash answering importeth (most of all) exceeding arrogancy and presumption; for it feemeth, that he who taketh the answer out of his mouth of whom the queltion is demanded, would say thus much in effect: What need have we of him? What can he say unto it? What skill or knowledge hath he? When I am in place no man ought to aske any other of thele matters but my felle only. And yet many times we propose questions unto some, not of any great defire that we have to heare their antwers, but only because we would find talke, and minister occation of discourse, seeking thereby to draw from them some words that may yeeld matter of mirth and pleafint conference: after which fort, Socrates used to provoke Theaterns and Charmides. To prevent therefore the answer of another to turne avvay menseares, to divert their eyes, and draw their cogitations from him to our felves, is as much as if we should run before and make haste to kiffe one first, who was minded to be kiffed of another, or to enforce him to looke upon us, whole eyes were set and fixed upon another; confidering, that although the party unto whom the demand was made be either not able nor willing to make answer, it were befitting for a man after some little pausemade, to present himselfe in all modesty and reverence, and then to frame and accommodate his speech as neare unto that as may be, which he thinketh will content the mind of him that made the demand and so answer (as it were) in the name of the other: for if they who are demanded a question make no good and sufficient answer, great reason they have to be pardened and held excused but he who intrude th himself, and taking the words out of anothers mouth, is ready to speak before he be ipoken unto, by good right is odious, although he answer otherwise sufficiently; but if he fail, and make no good answer, certes he maketh himself ridiculous, and a very laughing stock to the whole company.

The second point of exercise and meditation, is in a mans own particular answers, wherein he ought especially to be carefull and take heed who is given to over-much talk, to the end that they who would provoke him to speak, and all to make them elves merry and to laugh at him, may well know that he answereth not he knows not what inconsiderately, but with good advice and seriously to the point for such there be in the world, who for no need at all, but only for to passe time in mirth, devile certain questions for the nonce, and in that manner propound them to such persons for no other end, but to provoke them to prattle; and therefore they ought to have a good eye and regard before them, not to leap out and run all on a sudden hastily to their answer, as if they were well pleased and beholden unto them for to have such an occasion of speech; but with mature deliberation to confider the nature and behaviour of him that putteth out the question, together with the necessity thereof, and the profit that may entue thereby and if it appear indeed, that the party be in good earnest, and desirons to learn and be instructed, then he must accustome himself to represse his tongue and take some pause, allowing a competent space of time between the demand and the answer; during which filence, both the demandermay have while to bethink himself and add somewhat thereto, if he lift, and also the demanétime to think of an answer, and not let his tongue run before his wit, and fo huddle upon a confused answer before the question be fully propounded: for oftentimes it falleth out, that for very hafte they take no heed of those things which were demanded, but affiwer kim kam, and one thing for another. True it is (I must needs say) that Pythiathe priestess of Apolle's Temple, is wont to give answer by oracle at the same instant that the question is demanded, yea, and ottentimes before it be asked; for why? the god whom she serveth bit among men, he that would wifely and to purpole aniwer, ought to flay until he conseive the thought, and fully understand the intent of him that propose a question, lest that befall unto him which is faid in the common proverb:

About an hook I question made, And they gave answer of a spade.

and otherwitealfo, if that inconvenience were not, yet are we to bridle this lavish and hastly tongue of ours, and restrain the inordinate and hungry appetite which we have to be talking; lest it be thought that we had a flux (as it were) of humors gathered a long time about the tongue, and grown into an impostume, which we are very well content should be let out, and have if sue made by a question tendered unto us, and so by that means be discharged thereof. Sorners was worn in this manner to restrain and repressed in thirst, after that he had enchasted his body and for himself into an heat, either by wretsling, or running, of such like exercises; he would not permit himself to drink before he had powred out the first bucket of water that he had drawn out of the Pit or Well, acquainting this his sensual appetite to attend the sit and convenient time that reason appointed.

Moreover, this would be noted, that there be three kinds of answers unto interrogations; the first necessary, the second civill, and the third needlesse and superfluous: as for example; If one should ask whether Socrates be within or no; he that is unwilling and not ready and forward with histongue, would make answer and say: He is not within, but if he disposed to laconize a little, and speak more brief, he would leave out the word (within) and lay He is not; or yet more short than so, pronouncing onely the negative Adverb, and faying no more but No. Thus the Lacedamonians dealt once by Philip; for when he had dispatched his letters unto them to this effect; To know whether they would receive him into their City or no they wrote back again, in fair great capitall letters, within a sheet of paper, no more but OY, that is to say, No: and so sent it unto him: but he that would make answer to the former question of Socrates a little more civilly and courteously, would say thus:He is not within fir, for he is gone to the Bank or Exchange; and to give yet a som what better measure he might perhaps adde moreover and say Helooketh there for certain strangers and friends of his. But a vainprating fellow, and one that loves many words, especially if his hap hath been to read the book of Antimachiu the Colophonian, will make answer to the demand aforesaid in this wife: He is not within fir gone he is to the Burle or Exchange, for there he expecteth certain strangers out of Ionia, of whom and in whole behalf Alcibiades wrote unto him, who now maketh his abode within the City of Miletus, to journeth with Tiffaphernes, one of the Lieutenants generall of the great King of Persia; who before time was in league with the Lacedamonians, flood their friend, and sent them aid; but not for the love of Alcibiades, he is turned from them and is sided with the Athenians: for Alc:b:ades being desirous to return into his own Country, hath prevailed so much thathe hath altered Tiff aphernes his mind, and drawn him away from our part; and thus shall you have him rehearse in good earnest the whole eight book (in manner) of Thucydides his story, untill he have overwhelmed a man with a multitude of narrations, and made him believe that in Miletus there is some greatsedition; that it is ready to be lost, and Alcibiades to be banished a second time. Herein then ought a man principally to fet his foot and stay his overmuch language, so as the center and circumference of the answer be that, which he who maketh the demand defireth and hath need to know. Carneades before he had any great name, disputed one day in the publick Schools and places appointed for exercise: Unto whom the Matter or President of the place sent before hand, and gave him warning to moderate his voice (for hespake naturally exceeding big and loud, so as the Schools rung again therewith:) Give me then (quoth he) a gage and measure for my voice; upon whom the faid Mafter replyed thus not unproperly: Let him that disputeth with thee be the measure and rule to moderate thy voice by: even so a man may in this case say: The measure that he ought to keep who answereth, is the very will and mind of him that proposeth the question, Moreover, like as Socrates forbad those meats which drew men on to eat when they are not hungry; and likewise those drinks which caused them to drink who are not athirst, even so should a man who is given to much practle, be alraid of those discourses wherein he delighteth most, and which he is wont to use and take greatest pleasure in; and incase he perceive them to run willingly upon him for to withstand the same, and not give them intertainment. As for example, martiall men and warriours love to discourse and tell of battells; which is the reason that the Poet Homer "M. Ungeth in Neffor eftioons recounting his own proweffe and feats of armes: and ordinary it is with them who in judiciall trials have had the upper hand of their adversaries, or who beyond the fome read, hope and opinion of every man have obteined grace and favour with Kings and Princes, to be subject unto this malady that evermore followeth them, namely, to report and recount eftfoons the manner how they came in place; after what fort they were brought in the order of their pleading; how they argued the case; how they convinced their accusers, and overthrew their advertaries; hast of all, how they were praised and commended: for to say a truth, joy and mirthis much more talkative than that old Agrappina which the Poets do feign and devise in their comædies: for it rouseth and ftirreth up, it reneweth and refresheth it self ever and anon, with many discourses and narrations; whereupon ready they are to fall into such speeches upon every light and colourable occasion : for not onely is it true which the common proverb faith:

Loo'z where a man doth feel his pain and grief,

His hard will foon be there to getel relief.

but also joy and conforment draweth unto in the voice, it leadest the tongue alwayes about with it, and is evermore willing to be remembred and related. Thus we see that amorous lovers passe the greater part of their time in rehearing certain words which may renew the remembrance of their loves infomuch that if they cannot meet with one perion or other to relate the fame unto, they will devile and talk of them with such things as have neither sense nor life: like as were ad of one who brake forth into these words:

Odsinty hed, most sweet and pleasant conch, Oblessed lamp, Ohappy candle light, No leffe than God doth Bacchis you avouch nay, God you are the mightiest in her sight.

And verily a buse prater is altogether (as one would say) a white line or strake in regard of all words, to wit, without discretion he speaketh indifferently of all matters; howbeit if he be affected more to somethan to others, he ought to take heed thereof, and abstain from them; he is (I say) to withdraw & writhe himself from thence; for that by reason of the contentment which he may therein take, and the pleasure that he receiveth thereby, they may lead him wide and carry him every while very farre out of the way the same inclination to overshoot themselves in prating, they finde also when they discourse of those matters wherin they suppose themselves to have better experience, and a more excellent habit than others: such an one I say being a self-lover and ambitious with-

> Most part of all the day in this doth spend, Himself to passe, and others to transcend.

As for example, in histories if he hathread much, in artificiall stile and couching of his words, he that is a Grammarian; in relation of strange reports and news, who hath been a great Traveller and wandred through many forcen Countries: hereof therefore great heed would be taken; for garruling being therein fleshed and baited, willingly runneth to the old and usuall haunt, like as every beast feeketh out the ordinary and accustomed pasture. And in this point was the young Prince Cyrus of a wonderfull and excellent nature, who would never challenge his play-fellowes and conforts in age unto any exercite wherein he knew himfelt to be superiour, and to surpasse, but alwayes to such fears wherein he was lesse practised than they; which he did as well because he would not grieve their hearts in winning the prize from them, as also for that he would profit thereby, and learn to do that wherein he was more raw and unready than they. But a talkative fellow contrariwise, if there be a matter proposed whereby he may hear and learn somewhat that he knew not before, rejecteth and refuseth it he cannot for his life hold his tongue and keep filence a little while, to gain thereby fome hire and reward but cashing and rolling his thought round about he never tests untill he light upon some old ragged rapsodies and overworndiscourses, which he hath patched and tacked together a thousand times. Such a one there was among us, who happed by chance to have peruled two or three books of Ephorus; whereby he took himself to be so great a Clerk and so well-read that he wearied every mans ears who heard him talk; there was no affembly nor feast unto which he came bu he would force the company to arife and depart with his unmeasurable prating of the battel of Lenttres, and the occurrents that enfued thereupon, infomuch as he got himfelf a by-name, and every man called him Epaminondas. But this is the least inconvenience of all others that followeth this infirmity of much babling and turely one good means it is to the cure thereof; To turn the same from other matters to such as these: for thereby shall their tongue be leffe troublesome and offensive, when it passets the bounds in the tearns onely of lite-

Over and besides, for the remedy of this their dilease, they shall do well to inure and accustome themselves to write somewhat, and to dispute of questions apart. Thus did Amigarer the Stoick, who as it may be thought, being not able nor willing to hold out in disputation hand to hand with Carneades, who with a violent fiream (as it were) of his forcible wit and eloquence refuted the feet of the Stoicks, answered the said Carneades by writing, and filled whole books with contradictorie affertions and arguments against him: intomuch as thereupon he was surnamed C. Lamoboas, which is as much to fay, as the lufty Crier with his pen: and to by all likelihood this manner of fighting with a shadow and lowd exclaiming in secret, and apart by themselves, training these south praters every day by little and little from the frequency and multitude of people, may make them in the end more fociable and fitter for company. Thus curft curres after they have spent and discharged their choler and anger upon the cudgeis or stones which have been thrown at them, become thereby more gentle and tractable to men. But above all, it were very expedient and profitable for them to be alwayes neer unto personages for yeers elder, and in authority greater than themselves, and with those to converse; for the reverent regard and fear that they have in respect of their dignity and gravity, may induce and direct them in time and by cultome to keep filence; and evermore among those exercises heretofore by us specified, this advice would be mingled and interlaced; That when we are about to speak, and that words be ready to runne out of our mouth, we say thus unto our felves by way of realoning. What manner of speech is this that is so urgent and pressen so hard to be gone? What ails my tongue, that it is so willing to be walking? What good may come by the utterance thereof? What harm may ensue by concealing it in and holding my peace? For we must not think that our words be like an heavy burden over-loading us, and whereof we should think our selves well eased when we are discharged of themsfor speech remaineth still as well when it is uttered as before: but men ought to speak, either in the behalf of themselves when they stand inneed of some thing, or to benefit others, or else to pleasure and recreat one another by pleasant devices and discourses, (as it were) with falt to mitigate the painfull travels in actions and wordly affairs, or rather to make the same more savory whiles we are employed therein. Now if a speech be neither profitable to him that delivereth it, nor necessary for him that heareth it, ne yet carry therewith any grace or pleafure; what need is there that it should be uttered? For surely, a man may as soon speak a word in vain, as do a thing to no purpoley But above and after all other good advertisements in this case, we ought alwayes to have in readinesse and remembrance this wise taying of Simonides: A man (quoth he) may repent many a time for words spoken, but never for a word kept in: this also we must think: That exercise is all inall; and a matter of that moment and esticacy, that it is able to mafter and conquer every thing: confidering that men will take great pains and be carefull; yea they will endure much forrow for to be rid of an old cough; to chase away the troublesome yex or hicket. Besides, Taciturnity hath not onely this onesair property and good vertue, that as Hippocrates faith) it never breedeth thirst; but also that it engendreth no pain, no grief nor displeasure, neither is any man bound to render an account thereof.

Of Avarice or Covetousnesse.

The Summary.

F there be any excesse in the World that troubleth the repose and tranquillity of the spirit, causing our life to be wretched andmiserable, it is Avarice, against which the Sages and wise men of all ages from time to time have framed (harp and terrible invectives, which in sum and effect do shew thus much; That this Coveteoufuess and greedy desire of garhering goods is (as it were) the capitall City and Scat-town of all wickeduesses the very sink of sinne and receptacle of all vices. Now albeis all men with one voice, yea, and the most coverent persons of all others do confesse as much) set the heart of must is a affectionate a friend to the earth, that needfull it is to propose and set down divers instructions for to avert the same from thesees, and to cause it to range and sort with other occupations and assairs, more beseeming it self than is the over curious fearching after transfiery and corruptible things. This is the reason, that those Phi-losophers who have handled the doctrine as touching manners are employed herein; and Plutarch among the rest, who teacheth sushere in sew words, with what considerations we ought to be furnished and sortified, that we do not permit such a pestilent plague as this to seize upon our souls, and therewith he sheweth the miseries that befall unto Avarices whereof this is the sirst and principall; That in stead of giving contentment sit maketh her slave most wretched, and putteth him to the greatest pain and torture in the world. And hereupon he interlaceth and inserteth a description of three sorts of Covetous persons. First, of those who cover things rare and dangerous, whereas they should seek, after necessaries. Secondly, of such as spending-thing, have much, and yet desire more and more; and these he depainesh in all their colours. Thirdly, of them that be niggards and base minded pinch-pennies Which done the discovereth the second misery of Covetous wretches, to wit; That Avarice doth tyrannize over her caitive and slave, not suffering him to usethat which she commanded him to winne and get. The third is this ; That it causeth him to gather and heap which precommands non to wind none we want to make a superious for ellefor some wicked and graceless beir, whose nature and properties be doth represent and describe very lively. Asterwards having concluded that Covetous persons are herein especially miserables for that the one sort of them use not their goods at all, and other abuse the same: he prescribeth three remedies against this mischievous maladie. The sirst That these who greedily gape after riches, have no more in effelt than they who stand contented with that which is necessary for nature. The second; That we are not to count them happy, who be richly furnished with things unprofitable. And the last; That it is vertue, wherein we ought to ground and seek for contentment; for there it is to be found and not in riches.

Of Avarice or Covetousnesse.

Ippomachus, a great master of wrestling and such exercises of the body, hearing some to praise a certain tall man, high of stature, and having long arms and hands, commending him for a fingular champion, and fit to a fight at buffets: A proper fellow he were (quoth he) if the garland or prize of the victory were hung on high, for to be reached with the hand; semblably it may be faid unto them who efteem so highly and repute it a great felicity to be possessed of much fair lands, to have many great and stately houses, to be sumissed with mighty and september of much fair lands, to have many great and stately houses, to be sumissed with mighty and six and selective to be bought and sold for coin. And yet a man shall see many in the world a chuse rather to be rich and wretched withall, than to give their silver for to be happy and bleffed: but furely it is not filver nor gold that can purchase either repose of spirit void of grief and anguish, or magnanimity, ne yet settled constancy and resolution, considence and suffisiance, or consentment with our own estate. Be a man never so rich, he cannot skill thereby to contemn riches, no more than the possession of more than enough worketh this inus; That we want not fill, and defire even things that be superfluous. What other evill and malady then doeth our wealth and riches rid us from , if it delivereth us not from avarice ? By drink men quench their thirst by meat they slake their hunger. And he that said:

Give Hipponax a cloak to keep him warm, For cold extream I shake, and may take harm.

if there were many clothes hung or cast upon him, would be offended therewith and sling them from him; but this their strong defire and love of money, it is neither filver nor gold that is able to quench: and let a man have never fo much, yet he covereth neverthelesse to have more still. And well it may be verified of riches which one faid sometime to an ignorant and deceitfull Physi-

For riches verily, after that men have once metther ewith, (whereas before they flood in need of bread, of a competent house to put in their heads, of mean raiment and any viands that come next hand) fill them now with an impatient defire of gold, filver, ivory, emerands, horses and hounds, changing and transporting their natural appetite of things needfull and necessary into a disordinate lust to things dangerous, rare, hard to be gotten, and unprofitable when they to be had. For never is any man poor in regard of such things as suffice nature; never doeth he take up money upon usury, for to buy himself meat, cheese, bread or olives; but one indebteth himself for to build a fumptuous and stately house; another runnes in debt, because he would purchase a grove of olivetrees that joyneth to his own land; one is engaged deeply in the ulurers books, by laying corn-grounds and wheat-fields to his own demains, another, because he would be possessed fruitfull vineyards; some are endebted with buying mules of Galatia, and others, because they would be mahave cast themselves into the bottomlessegulf of obligations, conditions, covenants, interests, statutes, real gages and pawns: and afterwards it cometh to passe, that like as they who drink when they be not drie, and ear without a stomack, many times cast up by vomit, even that which they did eat & drink when they were hungry and thirsty even to, when they will needs have such things as be superfluous and to no use, do not enjoy the benefit of those things that are needfull and necessary indeed. Lo what kinde of people there be !

As for those who are at no cost, nor will lay out any thing, and not with standing they have much. yetever covet more; a man may rather marvell and wonder at them, if he would but remember that which Arifippus was wont to lay:He that eateth much (quoth he) and drinketh likewise much and is never latisfied nor full, goeth to the Phylicians, asketh their opinion what his difease and strange indiposition of the body might be, and withall craveth their countell for the cure and remedie thereof:but if one who hath five fair bedfleds already with the furniture thereto belonging & feeketh to make them ten; and having ten Tables with their cupboards of plate, will needs buy ten more; and for all that he is possessed of fair mannours and goodly lands, have his bags and coffers full of money, is never the better fatisfied, but (til gapeth after more, breaketh his fleeps, devifing and casting as he lyethawake, how to compafe the fame, and when he hath all, yet is he not full; such an one (I fay) never thinks that he hath need of a Phylician to cure his maladie or to discourse unto him from what cause all this doth proceed. And verily a man may look, that of those who are thirsty ordinarily, he that hath not drunk, will be delivered of his thirst so soon as he meeteth with drink; but in case such an one as evermore drinketh and powreth in ftill, never giving over, yet neverthelesse contimeth dry and thirsty, we judge him to have no need of repletion, but rather of purging and evacuation:him (I fay) we appoint for to vomit, as being not troubled and diffempered upon any want, but with some extraordinary heat or unkind acrimonies of humours that be with him; even so it is with those that seek to get and gather goods: he that is bare and poor indeed, will haply give over feeking fo foon as he hath got him an house to dwellin or found some treasure, or mer with a good friend to help him to a sum of money to make clear with the usurer, and to be crossed out of his book : but he that hath already more than enough and sufficient, and yet craveth more, surely it is neither gold nor filver, that will cure him, neither horses, nor sheep, nor yet beeves will serve his turnineed had he of purgation and evacuation, for poverty is not his disase, but coverousnesse and an unfatiable defire of riches, proceeding from false judgement and a corrupt opinion that he hath, which if a man doth not rid away out of his mind, as a winding gulf or whirl-pool that is croffed and overthwart in their way they will never cease to hunt after superfluities; and seem to Rand in need thereof (that is to fay) to covet those things which they know not what to do with, When a Phylician commeth into the chamber of a Patient, whom he findeth lying along in his bed groaning and refusing all tood, he taketh him by the hand feeleth his pulse, asketh him certain quethions and finding that he hath no ague; This is a difease (quoth he) of the mind, and so goeth his way; even so, when we see a wordly minded man altogether set upon his gets and gains, pining away, and even confirmed with the greedy worm of gathering goods, weeping, whining and fighing at expenses, and when any money is to go out of his purie, sticking at no pain and trouble, sparing for no indignity, no unhonest and indirect means whatsoever, nor caring which way he goes to work, whether it be by hook or crook, so that he may gain and profit thereby; having choice of houses and tenements, lands lying in every Countrey, droves, herds and flocks of cattell, a number of flaves, wardrobes of apparell and clothes of all forts : what shall we say that this man is fick of, unlesse it be the poverty of the soul? As forwant of money and goods, one friend (as Memander saith) may cure and help with, his bountifull hand; but that penury and needinesse of the soul all the men in the world, that either live at this day, or ever were before time, are not able to satisfie and suffice: and therefore of such Solon said very

No limit set, nor certain bound, men have

Of their defire to goods, but still they or ave.

For, those who are wile and of sound judgement are content with that measure and portion which nature hath fee down and affigned for them; fuch men know an end, and keep themselves within the center and circumference of their need and necessity onely. But this is a peculiar property that avarice hath by it felf. For a coverous defire it is, even repugnant to fatiety; and hindereth it felf that it never can have fufficient, whereas all other defires and fults are aiding and helpfull thereto. For noman (Itrow) that is a glutton, forbeareth to eat a good morcel of meat for gormandife, nor drunkard abstaineth from drinking wine upon an appetite and love that he hath to wine; as these coverous wretches do, who spare their money and will not touch it, through a defire onely that they have of money, And how can we otherwise think, but it were a piteous and lamentable case, yea, and disease next cousin to meer madnesse, if a man should therefore spare the wearing of a garment, because he is ready to chilland quake for cold, or forbear to touch bread, for that he is almost hunger-starved; and even so not to handle his goods because he loveth them: certes, such a one is in the same plight and piteous perplexity that Thrasonides was, who in a certain comedie describeth his own miseries :

At home it is within my power, I may enjoy it every hower: I wish a thing as if I were In raging love, yet I forbeare: When I have lockt and feal'd up all. Or else put forth by count and tale, My cointo brokers for the ule, Or other factours whom I chufe,

I plod and plonder still for more, I hunt, I feek to feich in ftore, I chide and braul with fervants mine, The husbandman and eke thehine I bring to count; and then anon My debters all I call upon: By Dan Apollo now I fwear, Wasany man that earth did bear, Whom thou helt ever known or feen, In love more wretchedto have been?

Sophoeles being on a time demanded familiarly by one of his friends, whether he could yet keep company with a woman if need were: God bleffeme (quoth he) my good friend, talk no more of that I pray you, I am free from those matters long fince, and by the benefit of mine old age, I have elcaped the lervitude of such violent and surious mistresses. And verily it is a good and gracious gift, that our lusts and appetites should end together with our strength and ability, especially in those delights and pleasures, which as Alcans faith neither man nor woman can well avoid, But this is not to be found in avarice and defire of riches; for she like a curst, sharp and sheewd quean, forceth indeed a man to get and gather, but she forbiddeth him withall to use and enjoy the same; she stirreth up and provoketh his lusts, but she denieth him all pleasure. I remember that in old time Stratonics taxed and mocked the Rhodians for their wastuil and superfluous expences in this manner: They build imptuously (quoth he) as if they were immortall and should never die; but they fare at their boards as though they had but a small while to live. But these coverous miters gather wealth together like mighty magnificoes, but they frend like beggerly mechanicals; they endure the pain and travell of getting, and tafte no pleafure of the en-

Demades the Orator came one day to visit Phocion, and found him at dinners but seeing but a little meat beforehim upon the Table, and the same nothing fine and dainty, but course and simple: I marvell (quoth he) O Phocion how you can take up with fo short a dinner and so small a pittance, confidering the pains you do endure in mannaging the affairs of State and Common-wealth. As for Demades he dealt indeed with government, and was a great man in the City with the people, but it was all for his belly, and to furnish a plentifull board, infomuch as supposing that the City of Athens could not yeeld him revenew & provision sufficient for to maintain his excessive gormandise, he laid for cates and victuals out of Macedon, whereupon Antipater when he saw him an old man with a wrinkled and withered face, faid plealantly: That he had nothing left now but his paunch and his tongue, much like unto a Sheep, or some other bealt killed for a facrifice when all is eaten besides. But throu must unhappy and wretched miser, who would not make a wonder at thee, considering that thou can't lead to bale and beggerly a life, without fociety of men or courtefie to thy neighbours, not giving ought to any person, shewing no kindnesse to the friends, no bounty nor magnificence to the common, wealth, yet still dost afflict thy poor self, lie awake all the night long, to il and moil like a drudge and hireling thy felf, hire other labourers for day-wages, lie in the wind for inheri-tances, speak men fair in hope to be their heir, and debase thy self to all the world, and carenot to whom thou cap and knee for gain, having I say so sufficient means otherwise to live at ease (to wir, thy niggardise and pinching parsimonie) whereby thou maist be dispensed or doing just nothing. It is reported of a certain Bizantine, who finding an adulterer in bed with his wife, who though the were but foul, yet was il-favoured enough, laid unto him: O milerable catife, what necessity hath driven thee thus codo? what needs Sapragoras dowry? well, go to: thou takeft great pains poor wretch, thou filleft & fittrest the lead, thou kindlest the fire allo underneath it. Necessary it is in some fort that Kings and Princes should seek for wealth and riches, that these Governours also and Deputies under them should be great gatherers, yea, and those also who reach at the highest places and appreto rule and soveraign dignities ingreat States and Cities; all these (Hay) have need persorce to heap.up groffe fums of money, to the end that for their ambition, their proud port, pomp, and vainglorious humour, they might make sumptuous feasts; give largestes, retain a guard about their perfens, fend prefents abroad to other States, maintain and wage whole armies, buy flaves to combat and fight at fharp to the outtrance: but thou makeft thy felf formuch ado, thou troublest and tor-mented both body and mind, living like an Oister of a shell-snail, and for to pinch and spare, art content to undergo and indure all pain and travell taking no pleasure nor delight in the world afterwards, no more than the Bain-keepers poor Asse which carrying billets and fagors of drie brush and slicks to kindle fire and to heat the stoughes is evermore full of smoak, soot, ashes, and sinders; but hath no benefit at all of the bain, and is never bathed washed, warmed, rubbed, scoured, and made clean. Thus much I ipeak in reproch and didain of this miferable affe-like avarice, this bale raping and scraping together in manner of ants or pilmires.

Now there is another kind of coveroninesse more favage and beast-like, which they professe who backbire and flander, raise malicious imputations forge falle wils and testaments, lie in wait for heritages cog and cozen, and intermeddle in all matters, will be feen in every thing, know all mens states, busie themselves with many cares and troubles, count upon their fingers how many friends they have yet living, and when they have all done, receive no fruition or benefit by all the goods which they havegotten together from all parts with their cunning casts and subtill shifts. And therefore like as we have in greater hatred and deteflation vipers, the venemous flies Cantharides, and the flinging foiders called Philangia and Tarantale, than either beares or lions, for that they kill folke and thing them to death; but receive no good or benefit at all by them when they are dead; even so be these wretches more odious and worthy to be hated of us, who by their milerable parhmony and pinching do milchiefe, than those who by their riot and wasefulnessee be hurtfull to a Common weale, because they take and catch from others that which they themselves neither will nor know how to use, Whereupon it is that such as these when they have gotten abundance, and are in manner sull, rest them for a while, and do no more violence as it were in time of truce and surcease of hostility; much after the manner as Demosthenes faid unto them who thought that Demades had given over all his lewdnesse and knavery: O (quoth he) you see him now full as lions are, who when they have filled their bellies prey no more for the lice untill they be hungry again; but such coverous wretches as be imployed in government of civill affaires, and that for no profit nor pleasure at all which they intend, those I say never rest nor makeholiday, they allow themselves no truce nor cessation from gathering and heaping more together fill, as being evermore empty, and have alwaies need of all things though they have all. But some man perhaps will say: These men (I assure you) do save and lay up goods in Hore for their children and heirs after their death, unto whom whiles they live they will part with nothing: If that be fo, I can compare them very well to those mice and cats in gold mines, which feed upon the gold-ore, and lick up the golden fand that the mines yeeld, so that men cannor come by the gold there, before they be dead & cut up allfin manner of anatomies, But tell me (I pray you) wherefore are these so willing to treasure up so much money, and so great substance, and leave the same to their children, inheritors, and successors after them? I verily believe to this end, that those children and heires also of theirs should keep the same still for others likewise, and so to passe from hand to hand by delcent of many degrees; like as earthen conduit-pipes by which water is conveyed into some cisterne, withhold and reteine none of all the water that passeth through them, but do transmit and send all away from them, each one to that which is next, and referre none to themselves; thus do they until iomearise from without, a meere stranger to the house, one that is a sycophant or very tyrant, who shall cut off this keeper of that great flock and treasure, and when he hath dispatched and made a hand of him, drive and turne the course of all this wealth and riches out of the until channell another way; or at leaftwife until it fall into the hands (as commonly menfay it doth) of the most wicked and ungracious impe of that race, who will disperse and scatter that which others have gathered, who will confirme and devour all unthriftily, which his predeceffors have gotten and spared wickedly: for not only as Euripides faith,

These children wasteful prove and bad,

Who favuite slaves for parents had, but also covetous carles and pinching penny-fathers leave children behind them that be loofe and riotous and spend-thrifts; like as Diogenes by way of mockery said upon a time; That it were better to be a Megatians ram than his fon; for wherein they would feeme to instruct and informe their children, they spoile and mar them cleane, ingrafting into their hearts a defire and love of money, teaching them to be covetous and bale-minded pinch-pennies, laying the foundation (as it were) in their heires of some strong place or fort, wherein they may surely guard and keep their inheritance. And what good lessons and precepts be these which they teach them: Gaine and spare, my son, get and fave; thinke with this selfe and make thine account that thou shalt be esteemed in the world according to thy wealth & not otherwise. But surely this is not to instruct a child, but rather to knit up fast or low up the mouth of a purse that it may hold and keep the better what loever is put into it. This only only is the difference that a purie or money-bag becommeth foule, sullied, and ill-savouring after that filver is put into it; but the children of covetous perions before they receive their patrimonies or attaine to any riches, are filled already even by their fathers with avarice, and a hungry desire after their substance; and verily such children thus nurtured reward their parents again for their schooling with a condigne fallary and recompence, in that they love them not because they shall receive much one day by them, but hate them rather for that they have nothing from them in present possession already, for having learned this lesson of them; To esseme nothing in the world in comparison of wealth and riches, and to aime at nought else in the whole course of their life, but togather a deale of goods together, they repute the lives of their parents to be a block in their way, they wish in their hearts that their heads were well laid, they do what they can to shorten their lives, making this reckoning; That how much time is added to their old age, so much they lose of their youthfull yeares. And this is the reason, why, during the life of their fathers, secretly and underhand they steale (after a fort, by snatches) their pleasure and enjoy the same: They will make semblance as if it came from other, when they give away money and diffribute it among their friends, or otherwise spendit in their delights; whiles they catch it privily from under the very wing of their parents, and when they go to heare and take out their leffons, they will be fure to pick their purses if they can before they go away; but after their parents be dead and gone, when they have gotten into their hands the keyes of their coffers and fignets of their bags, then the cafe is altered and they enter into another course and fashion of life: you shall have my young masters then put on a grave and auftere countenance, they will not feeme to laugh, nor be spoken to or acquainted with any body; there is no talke now of annointing the body for any exercise, the tacket is cast aside, the tennis court no more haunted, no wrestling practised, no going to the schooles either of the Academy or Lyceum to heare the lectures and disputations of Protesfors and Philosophers. But now the officers and fervants be called to an audit and account; now they are examined what they have undertheir hands; now the writings, bills, obligations, and deeds are fought up and perused; now they fall to argue and reason with their receivers stewards, factors, and debtors; so sharpe-set they are to their negotiations and affaires; so full of cares and businesse, that they have no leisure to take their dinners or noon-mea es; and it they sup they cannot intend to go into the baine or hot-house before it be late in the night; the bodily exercises wherein they were brought up and trained in be laid down; no swimming nor bathing any more in the river Dirce; all such matters be cast behind and cleane forgotten. Now if a man fay to one of theie: Will you go and heare such a Philosopher read a lecture or make a fermon: How can I go? (will he fay againe) I have no while fince my fathers death. O miferable and wretched man, what hath he left unto thee of all his goods, comparable to that which he hath bereaved thee of, to wit, Repole and Liberty: but is it northy father formuch, as his riches flowing round about thee, that environeth and compaffeth thee to, as it hath gotten the mastery over thee? this hath set foot upon thy throat, this hath conquered thee; like unto that fhrewd wife in Hefiodus,

Who burnes a man without a match Or brand of fcorching fire, Arddriveth him to gray-old age Before that time require.

Caning thy foule (as it were) to be full of rivels and hoary haires before time, bringing with it catking cares and tedious travels proceeding from the love of money, and a world of affaires with any repole, whereby that alacrity, cheerefulnesse, worship and sociable courtesse which ought to be in a man, are decayed and faded cleane to nothing.

But what meane you fir by all this? (will some one haply say unto me) See you not how there be iome that bestow their wealth liberally with credit and reputation? Untowhom Ianswerthus: Haveyou never heard what Aristotle said: That as some there are who have no use at all of their goods, to there be others who abuse the same; as if he should say? Neither the one nor other was feemely and as it ought to be: for as those get neither profit nor honour by their riches, so these sustaine losse and shame thereby. But let us consider a little what is the use of these riches which are thus much effeemed: Is it not (I pray you) to have those things which are necessary for nature? But these who are so rich and wealthy above the rest, what have they more to content nature than thole who live in a meane and competent estate? Certes riches (as Theophrasters faith) is not fo great a matter that we should love and admire it io much, if it be true that Callias the wealthiest person in all Athens and Ismenias the richest citizen of Thebes, use the same things that Socrates and Epaminondas did. For like as Agas hon banished the flute, corner, and such other pipes from the solemne fealts of men, and tent them to women in their folemnities, supposing that the discourses of men who are present at the table are sufficient to entertaine mirth; even so may he as well rid away out of houses hangings, coverlets and carpets of purple, collinand sumptuous tables, and all such superfluities, who feeth that the great rich worldlings use the very same that poorer men do. I would not as Hefiodius faith;

Tha: plough or helme should hang in smoake to dries Or painfull tillage now be laid assue Nor works of oxe and mule for ever dies, Who serve our turnes to draw to till, to ride;

But rather that these goldsmiths, turners, gravers, persumers, and cooks would be chased and sent away, toral much as this were indeed an honest and civil banishment of unprofitable artificers, as forreiners, that may be spared out of a city. Now if it be fo, that things requisite for the necessity of nature becommon as well to the poore as rich, and that riches do vaunt and fland to much upon nothing else but superfluities, and that Scopus the Thessalian is worthily commended in this; That being requested to give away and part with tomewhat of his houshold stuffe which he might spare and have no need of: Why (quoth he) in what thingselfe confifteth the felicity of those who are reputed happy and fortunate in this world above other men, but in their superfluities that you seem to aske at my hands, and not in such as be necessary and requisite? If it be so I say, see that you be not like unto him that praifeth a pompe and folemne shew of plaies and games more than life indeed, which standeth upon things necessary. The procession and solemnity of the Bacchanales which was exhibited in our country, was wont in old time to be performed after a plaine and homely manner, merrily, and with great joy: You should have seen there one carrying a little bartell of wine, another a branch of a vine tree; after him comes one drawing and plucking after hima goat; then followeth another with a basket of dried figs; and last of all one that bare in shew Pi alua, that is to say, the resemblance of the genital member of a man; but now adars all these remonies are de piled, neglected, and in a manner not at all to be seene, such a traine there is of those that carry veffels of gold and filver to many fumptuous and coffly robes, fuch flately chariots, richly fet out, are driven and drawn with brave fleeds most ga lantly dight, besides the pageants, dumbeshews, and maskes, that they hide and obli ure the ancient and true pompe according to the first inflitution; and even to it is in riches; the things that be necessary and serve for use and profit are overwhelmed everwhelmed and covered with needleffe toies and superfluous vanities, and I assure you the most part of us be like unto young Telemachus, who for want of knowledge and experience, or rather indeed for default of judgement and discretion when he beheld Nessor housesumines, are reckoned the master of the house happy for having such good provision of such necessary and prostable things: but being in Mentaus his house, and seeing there store of Ivory, gold, and silver, and the metall Elettrum, he was ravished and in an extasse with admiration thereof, and brake out in these words:

Like unto this, the pallice all Within I judge to be,
Of Jupiter that mighty god
Who dwels in acute skie:
How rich, how faire, how infinite
Are all things which I fee!
My heart, Al do them behold,
I travife droomd-roufly,
But Socrates and Diogenes would have laid thus rather:
How many wetched shings are here?
When I them view, I dough therent,

Of them I am not faine.

And what faiest thou foolish and vaine sot as thou art? Whereas thou shouldst have taken from thy very wife her purple, her jewels and gaudy ornaments, to the end that she might no more long for fuch inperfluity, nor run a madding after forreine vanities, far fetcht and deare bought; doit thou contrariwije embellish and adorne thy houselike a theatre, scaffold, and stage to make a goodly fight for those that come into the Shew-place? Loe wherein lieth the selicity and happinesse that riches bringeth, making a trim shew before those, who gaze upon them, and to testine and report to others what they have seen; set this aside (that they be not shewed to all the world) there is nothing at all therein to reckon. But it is not to with temperance, with philosophy, with the true knowledge of the gods, so far forth as is meet and behoovefull to be known, for these are the same still and all one, although every man attaine not thereto, but all others be ignorant thereof. This piety (Ifay) and religion hath alwaies a great light of her own, and resplendant beames proper to it telfe, wherewith it doth shine in the soule, evermore accompanied with a certaine joy that never ceaseth to take contentment in her own good within, whether any one see it or no, whether it be unknown to gods and men or no, it skilleth not. Of this kind and nature is vertue indeed, and truth, the beauty also of the Mathematicall sciences, to wit. Geometry, and Astrology; unto which who will thinke that the gorgeous trappings and capacifons, the brooches, collars, and carkans of riches are any waies comparable, which (to say a truth) are no better than jewels and ornaments good to trim young brides, and fet out maidens forto befeen and looked at? For riches, if no man do regard, behold, and fet their eyes on them (to fay a truth) is a blind thing of it felfe, and fendeth no light at all nor raies from it; for certainly fay: That a rich man dine and fup privately alone, or with his wife and some inward and familiar friends, he troubleth not himselfe about surnishing of his table with many fervices, dainty dishes, and festivall fare; he stands not so much upon his golden cups and goblets, but useth those things which be ordinary, which go about every day and come next hand, as well veffels as viands; his wife fits by his fide and beares him company, not decked and hung with jewels and spangles of gold, not arrayed in purple, but in plaine attire and simply clad; but when he makes a feast (that is to say) sets out a theater, wherein the pompes and shews are to meet and make a jangling noise together, when the plaies are to be represented of his riches, and the solemne traine thereof to be brought in place; then comes abroad his brave furniture indeed; then he ferchesh out of the ship his faire chausers and goodly pots; then bringeth he forth his rich three-footed tables; then come abroad the Lampes, Candlesticke, and Branches of silver; the lights are disposed in order about the cups; the cup-bearers, skinkers, and tasters are changed; all places are newly dight and covered; all things are then stirred and removed that faw no fun long before; the filver plate, the golden veffels, and those that be set and enriched with precious stones; to conclude, now there is no shew else but of riches; at such a time they will confesse themselves and be known wealthy. But all this while whether a rich man sup alone, or make a feast, temperance is away and true contentment.

Of the natural Love or Kindnesse of Parents to their Children.

The Summary.

VV [self faidone, (whosover it was) That to banish amity and friendship from among men, were as great hart to the society of mankind, as to deprive them of the light and heat of the Sun: which being verified and found true in the whole course of this life, and in the maintenance of all estates; not without great cause Nature hath cast and sprinkled the seed thereof in the generation and nourishment of a race and linage, whereof she gives hevident testimonies in brute beasts, the better to move and incite us to our day. That we may see therefore this precious seed and graine of amity, how it doth slower and frustifie in the world, we must begin at the love and naturall kindnesse of fathers and mothers to their children: For if this be well kept and maintained, there proceed from it an infinite number of contentments which do much as wage and ease the inconveniences and discommodities of our life. And Plutarch entring into this matter, sheweth first in generality: That menlearne (as it were) in the schoole of brute beasts, with the mater, piewen just in generality: I hat menteurne (as it were) in the schoole of brute beasts, with what assection they should beget, woursh, and bring up their children: assertand he doth particularly thereof, underrich the sime argument by diversex amplet. But for that he would not have us thinke that he excelled dumbe beasts above man and woman, he observed had setted down very well the difference that is of amities, discoursing in good and models termes as touching the generation and nutture of children, and briefly by the way represented muto us the miserable entrance of man into this race upon earth, where he is to washie could be the miserable entrance of man into this race upon earth, when he was a supposed in the superior is to wash to could be the miserable entrance of man into this race upon earth, when he was the supposed in the suppo wenginaeville or un his courfe. Which done, he provesh that the nonriphing of infants hath no other caufe and reason but the love of futhers and mothers; he discoveresh the source of this affection; and for a conclusion, sheweth that what defect and fault soever may come between and be medled among, yet is cannot altogether abolish the same.

Of the naturall Love or Kindnesse of Parents to their Children.

Hat which moved the Greeks at first to put over the decision of their controversies to forraine judges, and to bring into their countrey strangers to be their Umpires, was the distrust and diffidence that they had one in another, as if they confeshed thereby that justice was indeed a thing recessary for mans life, but it grew not among them: And is not the case even to as touching certaine questions disputable in Philotophy? For the determining whereof, Philotophers (by reason of the fundry and divers opinions which are among them) have appealed to the nature of brute beafts, as it were into a strange city, and remitted the deciding thereof to their properties and affections, according to kind, as being neither subject to partial favour, nor yet corrupt, deprayed, and polluted. Now furely, a common reproach this must needs be to mans naughty nature and lewd behaviour; That when we are in doubtfull questions concerning the greatest and most necessary points pertaining to this present life of ours, we should go and search into the nature of hories, dogs, and birds for resolution; namely, how we ought to make our marriages, how to get children, and how to reare and nourish them after they be born and as if there were no figne (in a manner) or token of nature imprinted in our selves, we must be saine to alledge the passions, properties and affections of brute beafts, and to produce them for witnesses, to argue and prove how much in our life we transgresse and go aside from the rule of nature, when at our first beginning and entrance into this world we find such trouble, disorder, and consusion; for in those dumbe beasts beforefaid, natured oth retaine and keep that which is her own and proper, simple, entire, without corruption or alteration by any strange mixture; whereas contrariwile, it seemeth that the nature of man by discourse of their reason and custome together, is mingled and confused with so many extravagant opinions & judgements fet from all parts abroad (much like unto oyle that commeth into perfumers hands) that thereby it is become manifold variable, and in every one severall and particular, and doth not retaine that which is its own indeed proper and peculiar to it felt; neither ought we to thinke it a strange matter and a wonderfull that brute beasts, void of reason, should come nearerunto nature and follow her steps better, than men endued with the gift of reason: for surely, the very feniclesse plants herein surpasse those beasts beforesaid and observe better the instanct of nature; for confidering that they neither conceive any thing by imagination nor have any motion, affection, or inclination at all; to verily their appetite (such as it is) varieth not, nor stirreth to and fro out of the compasse of nature, by meanes whereof, they continue and abide as if they were kept in and bound within close prison, holding on still in one and the same course, and not stepping once out of that way wherein nature doth lead and conduct them: as for beafts, they have not any fuch great portion of reason to temper and mollifie their naturall properties, neither any great subtility of lense and conteit nor much delite of liberty; but having many infliners, inclinations, and appetites, nor ruled by realon, they breake out by the meanes thereof otherwhiles, wandring all ray, and running up and down, to and iro, howbeir, for the most part, not very far out of order, but they take fure hold of nature; much like a ship which lieth in the rode at anchor, well may she dance and be rocked up and down, but the is not carried away into the deep at the pleasure of the winds and waves; or much after the manner of an affe or hackney, travelling with bit and bridle, which go not out of the right and fireight way, wherein the matter or rider guideth them; whereas in man, even reason her selfe, the mittris that ruleth and commandeth all, findeth out new cuts (as it were) and by-waies, making many flarts and excurions at her pleasure to and fro, now here, now there; whereupon it is that she leaveth no plaine and apparant print of natures tracks and footing.

Consider I pray you in the first place the marriages (if I may so terme them) of dumbe beasts and reasonlesse creatures; and namely, how therein they follow precisely the rule and direction of nature, To begin withal, they stand not upon those laws that provide against such as marry not, but lead a fingle life; neither make they reckoning of the acts which lay a penalty upon those that be late ere they enter into wedlock, like as the citizens under Lycurgus and Sclon, who stood in awe of the faid statutes; they seare not to incur the infamy which followed those persons that were barren and never had children; neither do they regard and feeke after the honours and prerogatives which they attained, who were fathers of three children, like as many of the Romans do at this day, who enter into the flate of matrimony, wed wives, and beget children, not to the end that they might have heires to inherit their lands and goods, but that they might themselves be inheritors and capable of dignicies and immunities. But to proceed unto more particulars, the male doth afterwards deale with the female in the act of generation not at all times; for that the end of their conjunction and going together is not grosse pleature so much, as the engendring of young and the propagation of their kind: and therefore at a certaine featon of the year, to wit, the very prime of the spring, when as the pleasant winds so apt for generation dogently blow, and the temperature of the aire is friendly unto breeders, commeth the female till lovingly and kindly toward her fellow the male, even of her own accord and motion (as it were) trained by the hand of that fecret infline and defire in nature; and for her own part, shedoth what she can to wooe and sollicite him to regard her, as well by the sweet lent of her flesh, as also by a special and peculiar ornament and beauty of her body, shewing her selte fresh and cheerefull, full of dew and verdure of greene herbes, pure and near I warrant you; in this manner doth she present her selfe unto the male and courteth him: now when the perceives once that the is fped and hath conceived by him, the leaveth him and retireth apart in good fort full decently; and then her wholecare is to provide for that which she goeth withall, forecasting how to be delivered of it inductime, and bethinking how to lave, preserve, and reare it when it is fallen and brought forth. And certes it is not possible to express sufficiently and worthily the particulars that are done by their dumbe creatures (but only this, that every thing proceedeth from the tender love and affection which they have to their young ones) in providence, in patience, in abstinence.

We all acknowledge the Bee to be wife, we call her fo, we celebrate her name for producing and working so diligently that yellow honey, yea, and we flatter in praising her, feeling as we do the sweetnesse of the said honey how it tickleth and contenteth our tongue and taste ; and all this while what one is there of us that maketh any account of the wildome, wit, and artificiall subtilty that other creatures shew, as well in the bringing forth their young, as the softering and nurture of them? For first and formost do but consider the sea-bird called Aleyon, no sooner doth she perceive her selfe to be knit with egge, but she salleth presently to build her nest, she gathereth together the chine-bones of a certaine fea-fish, which the Greeks call Benden, that is to say, the sea-needle, these she coucheth, plaiteth, windeth, and interlaceth one within another, so artificially working the same and weaving them close together in a round and large forme, after the manner of a fishers leape or weele net; and when she hath knit and fortified the same exactly with many courses of the said bones driven and united joyntly together in good order, she exposeth it full against inundation and dashing of the sea-waves, to the end that the superficial out-side of the worke beaten upon gently and by little and little with the water, being thickned and felted thereby might be more folid and firme, and so it proveth indeed; for so hard it groweth by this meanes that scarcely any stone can crush it, or edged instrument of iron cleave it; but that which is yet more wonderfull, the mouth and entry of the faid nest is composed and wrought proportionably just to the measure and bignesse of the bird Alcyon aforelaid, so as no creature bigger or lesse than her selfe, no nor the very sea (as men say) nor the least thing in the world can get into it. And will you see moreover what kindnesse and naturall affection thesea-weefils or sea-dogs do shew unto their little ones? They breed their young whelpes or kitlings alive within their bellies, and when they lift let them forth and fuffer them to run abroad for reliefe and to gettheir food, and afterwards receive them into their bodies againe, enclosing them whiles they be afleep themselves, cherishing them couched in their bowels and wombe. The she-beare, a most fell, savage, and cruell beast, bringeth forth her young whelps, without forme or fashion, unknit and unjoynted, having no distinct limbs or members to be seene; howbeit with her tongue, as it were with a toole and infirument for the purpole she keepeth such a licking of them, the formeth and fashioneth those membranes wherein they were lapped in her wombe in inch fort, that she seemeth not only to have brought forth her young, but also to have wrought them afterwards workeman-like to their shape and proportion. As for that lion which Homer describeth in this wife,

Who leading forth his tender whelps
To feeke abroad for prey
Ho forest wide in Jonner meets
With hunters in the way,
But looking sternewith bended brows
Which cover both his eyes,
He makes a stand, and them assure with

Thinke you not by this description that he relembleth one who is bent to capitulate and stand upon termes of composition with the hunters for to save the life of his little ones? To speake in a word, this tender love and affection of beasts toward their young, maketh them that otherwise be timorous, hardy, and bold; those that be slow and idle by nature, laborious, and painfull; and such themileves are greedy and ravenous, to be spare and temperate in their seeding, like as the bird whereof the same Homer speaketh,

Which brings in mouth unto her neft, Such food as she abro. d Couldget to feedher nakedyoung, And doth her selfe defraud.

For content the is even with her own hunger to nourish her little ones, and the same sood or bair that she hath for them, being so necreas it is unto her own craw and gester, she holdeth close and sast in her bill, for seare less she might swallow it down the throat ere she were aware:

Or like the bisch running about Her young whelps, at the fight Of strangers, bases and barkes apace, And ready is to fight.

No doubt the feare which she hath lest her little ones should take harm redoubleth her courage, and maketh her more hardy and angry than before: as for the partridges when they be laid for by the fowler, together with their covie or young birds, they tuffer them to flie away as well as they can, and make shift to save themselves, but the old rowens full subtilly seeme to wait the comming of the faid hunters, abiding untill they approach neare unto them, and by keeping about their feet, trains them (till away after them. ready ever as it were to be caught; now when the fowler shall seeme to reach unto them with his hand, they will run a little, or take a short flight from him, and then they stay againe, putting him in new hope of his prey and booty, which every foor he thinketh to take with his hand: thus they play mock holiday with the fowlers, and yet with fome danger to them-felves for the safety of their young, untill they have trained them a great way off who sought for their lives. Our hens, which we keep about our houles to ordinarily, and have daily in our eyes, how carefully do they look unto their young chickens whiles they receive some under their wings, which they spread and hold open for the noncethat they may creep in; others they suffer to mount upon their backs, gently giving them leave to climbe and get up on every fide, and they do not without great joy and contentment, which they testifie by a kind or clocking and speciall noise that they make at fuch a time; if when they be alone without their chickens, and have no feare but for themselves a dog or a serpent come in their way, they slie from them; let their brood be about them when such danger is presented, it is wonderfull how ready they will be to desend the same, yea, and to fight for them, even above their power. Do we thinke now that nature hath imprinted fuch affections and paffions in these living creatures, for the great care that she hath to maintaine the race and posterity (as it were) of hens, dogs, or beares; or do we not rather make this construction of it that the shameth, pricketh, and woundeth men thereby when we reason and discourse thus within our felves, that these things be good examples for as many as follow them, and the reproa-ches of those that have no sense or feeling of natural affection; by which no doubt they do blame and accuse the nature of man only, as if she alone were not affectionate without some hire and reward, nor could skill of love but for gaine and profit? for admired he was in the theaters that thus

For hope of gaine one man willlove another, Take it away, what one will love his brother?

This is the reason (according to the opinion and doerrine of Epicorus) that the father affecteth his fon the mother is tender over her child, and children likewise are kind unto their parents: but set case that brute bearls could both speake and understand language. In some open theater, and that one called to meet together a sufficient assembly of beefes. horses, dogs, and sowies, certes if their voices were demanded upon this point now in question, he would set down in writing, and openly pronounce, that neither bitches loved their wheipes, normares their foles, hens their bitches, and other soules their little birds in respect of any reward but treely & by the instinct of nature: and this would be found a true verdict of his, justified and verified by all those passions and affections which are observed in them: and what a shame and infamy unto markind is this to grant and avouch, that the act of generation in brute beafts, their conception, their breeding, their painfull delivery of their young, and the carefull feeding and cherishing of them be natures works meerly, and duties of gratuity; and contrariwise that in men they be pawns given them for security of interest, hires. gages, and earnest pennies respective to some profit and gain which they draw after them? But surely as this project is not true, to it is not worth the hearing, for nature verily as infavage plants and trees, to wit, wild vines, wild figge-trees, and wild olives the doth ingenerate certain raw and unperfect rudiments, (fuch as they be) of good and kind fruits; to fne hath created in brute beafts a naturall love and affection to their young, though the same be not absolute nor fully answerable to the rule of justice, ne yet able to passe tarther than the bonds and limits of necessity. As for man, aliving creature, endued and adorned with reason, created and made for a civil society, whom she bath brought into the world for to observe lawes and justice, to serve, honour and worship the gods, to found Cities and govern Common-wealths, and therein to exercise and perform all offices of bounty; him she hath bestowed upon noble, generous, fair and fruitfull seeds of all these things, to, wit, a kind love and tender affection toward his children; and these she followeth still, and persisteth therein, which the infused together with the first principles and elements that went to the frame of his body and foul: for nature being every way perfect and exquifite, and namely, in this inbred love toward infants, wherein there wanteth nothing that is necessary, neither from it is ought to be taken away as superfluous; It hath nothing (as Erafistratus was wont to say) vain, stivolous and unprofitable, nothing inconstant, and shaking to and iro, inclining now one way, and then another. For in the first place, as touching the generation of man, who is able to expresse her prudence sufficiently? neither haply may it stand with the rule of decent modesty to be over-curious and exquisite in delivering the proper names and tearms thereto belonging; for those naturall parts serving in that act of generation and conception secret as they be and hidden, so they neither can well, nor would willingly be named but the composition and framing thereof, to aptly made for the purpose, the dispofition and fituation likewise so convenient, we ought rather to conceive in our mind than utter in

Leaving therefore those privy members to our private thoughts, passe we to the consection, dispolition and diffribution of the milk, which is sufficient to shew most evidently her providence, industry and diligences for the superfluous portion of blood which remaineth in a womans body, over and above that which serveth for the use whereunto it is ordained, floring up and down within her afterwards, for defect or feebleneffe of fpirits wandereth (as it were) to and tro, and is a burden to her body:but at certain fet-times and dayes, to wit, in every monthly revolution, nature is carefull and diligent to open certain fcluces and conducts, by which the faid superfluous blood doth void and passe away, whereupon she doth not onely purge and lighten all the body besides, but also cleanseth the matrice, and maketh it like of a piece of ground brought in order and temper, apt to receive the plough, & desirous of the seed after it in due season : now when it hath once conceived and retained the faid feed, so as the same take root and be knir, presently it draweth it self strait and close together round, and holdeth the conception withinit; for the nivill (as Democritus faith) being the first thing framed within the matrice, & ferving in stead of an anchor against the waving and wandering of it to and fro, holdeth fure the fruit conceived, which both now groweth and hereafter is to be de-livered (as it were) by a fure cable and strong bough, then also it stoppeth and shutteth up the said rivulets and passages of those monethly purgations; and taking the foresaid blood, which otherwise would run and void by those pipes and conducts, it makes use thereof for to nourish, and (as it were) to water the infant, which beginneth by this time to take some consistence and receive shape and form, so long, untill a certain number of dayes which are necessary for the full growth the reof within be expired; at which time it hath need to remove from thence for a kind of nutriment elle-where in another place; and then diverting the faid course of blood with all dexterity and a skilfull hand (no gardener nor fountainer in drawing of his trenches and channels with all his cunning fo artificiall) and employing it from one use to another, shee hath certain cesterns (as it were) or fountainheads, prepared of purpose from a running source most ready to receive that liquor of blood quickly, and not without some sense of pleasure and contentment; but withall, when it is received, they have a power and faculty, by a mild heat of the naturall spirits within them, and with a delicate and feeminine tendernesse, to concost, digest, change and convert it into another nature and quality, for that the paps have within them naturally, the like temperature and disposition answerable unto it: now these teats which spout out milk from the cocks of a conduct, are so framed and disposed, that it floweth not forthall at once, neither do they send it away suddenly: but nature hath so placed the dug, that as it endeth one way in a spongeous kind of slesh full of small pipes, and made of purpose to transmit the milk, and let it distill gently by many little pores and secret passages, so it yeeldeth a nipple in manner of a faucet, very fit and ready for the little babes mouth; about which to nuzzle and mudgel with it pretty lips it taketh pleasure, & loveth to be tugging & lugging of it ibut to no purpose and without any fruit of profit at all, had nature provided such tools and infruments for to engender and bring forth a child; to no end(I fay)had she taken so good order used so great industry, diligence and forecast, if withall she had not imprinted in the heart of mothers a wonderfull love and affection, yea, and an extraordinary care over the fruit of their womb, when it is born into the

Of creatures all which breath and walk, upon the earth in fight, None is there wretched more than man new born into this light,

And wholoever faith thus of a young infant newly coming forth of the mothers womb, maketh no lie at all, but speaketh truth; for nothing is there so impersed, so indigent and poor, so naked, so deformed, so foul and impure, than is man to see presently upon his birth, considering that to nomined, no some and impact, that is made to be personally about the source has been passed and way into his gight; so furred he is all over and polluted with blood, so ful of filth and ordure, when he entrethint the world refembling rather a creature fresh killed and flain; than newly boths that no body is willing to touch, to take up, to handle, dandle, kiffe and clip it, but fuch as by nature are lead to love it: and therefore, whereas in all other living creatures, nature hath provided that their udders and paps should be set beneath under their bellies; in a woman onely, the hath seated them aloft in her breasts, as a very proper and convenient place, where she may more readily kiffe, embrace, coll and huggle her babe while it sucketh; willing thereby to let us inderstand, that the end of breeding, bearing and rearing children, is not gain and profit, but pure love and meeraffection, Now, if you would fee this more plainly proved unto you, propose (if you please) and call to remembrance the women and men both in the old world, whole hap was either first to bear children, or to see an infant newly born; there was no law then to command and compell them to noutrifh and bring up their young babes; no hope at all of reciprocall pleasure of thanks at their hands that induced them; no expechance of reward and recompence another day to be payed from them, as due debt for their care, pains and cost about them: nay, if you go to that, I might say rather: That mothers had some reason to deal hardly with their young infants, and to bear in minde the injuries that they have done then, in that they endured such dangers and so great pains for them:

As namely, when the painfull throwes assumption to pumping throwes

assumptions
In travels sinch a worden meet;
and pierce thereothe them:
Which midwives, Justoes daighters then,
do just her to, poor wretch;
Who many a pane; when when their hand
they make her body fretch.

But our women fay; It was never Homerus (lurely) who wrote this but Homer's tather: that is to fay, fome Poctrelle of woman of his Poeticall vein, who had been her felf at futh a bussels, and der the dolorous pands of child-birth, or elfe was even then in labour, and upon the point to be delivered, feeling a mixture of bitter and tharp throwes in her back, belly and flanks, when the powred out these veres but yet, for all the forrow and dear bargain that a mother hath of it, this kind and naturall love doth ftill to bend, incline and lead her, that notwithstanding she be in a heat still upon their travell, full of pains and after throwes, panting, trembling and shaking for very anguish, yet she neglecketh not her sweet babe, nor windeth or shrinketh away from it; but she turneth toward it, she maketh to it, she simileth and laugheth upon it, she taketh it into her arms, she hugleth it in her bosome, and kissen it still kindly; neither all this whiles gathereth she any sruits or pleasure or profit, but painfully (God wor) and carefully

She lapps it then in raggs full foft, With finadling bands file wrapt it oft, By turns file cools and keeps it warm, Loth is file that it flould take harm: And thus a fwell by night as day, Pains after pains file taketh ay.

Now tell me (I pray you) what reward, recompenseand profit do women reap for all this trouble and painfull hand about their little ones? None at all (furely) for the present, and as little in future expectanceanother day, confidering their hopes are so farre off, and the same so uncertain. The husbandman that diggeth and laboureth about his vine at the Æquinox in the Spring , preffeth grapes out of it and maketh his vintage at the Æquinox of the Autumn. He that foweth his corn when the starres called Pleiades, do couch and go down, reapeth and hath his harvest afterwards when they rife and appear again; kine calve, mares foal, hennes hatch, and foon after there cometh profit of their calves, their colts and their chickens : but the rearing and education of a man is laborious, his growth is very flow and late; and whereas long it is ere he cometh to proof and make any shew of vertue, commonly most fathers die before that day. Neocles lived not to fee the noble victorie before Salanus that Themsfooles his sonne atchieved :neither saw Militades the happy day wherein Cimon his sonne won the field at the famous battell neer the river Enrywiden: Xantipping was not so happy as to hear Pericles his sonne, out of the Pulpit preaching and making orations to the people; neither was it the good fortune of Ariffon to be at any of his forme Plato's lectures and disputations in Philosophie: the fathers of Euripides and Sophocles, two renowmed Poets, never knew of the victories which they obtained, for pronouncing and rehearing their Tragedies in open Theazer, they might hear them peradventure when they were little ones to stammer, to lispe, to spel and put syllables together, or to speak broken Greek, and that was all. But ordinary it is that men live to see, hear, and know when their children sall to gaming, revelling, masking, and banquetting, to drunkennesse, wanton love, whoting, and such like missemenors. So as in this regard this one Mot of Eutens in an Epigram of his; deserveth to be praised and remembred.

And yet for all this fathers ceale not ftill to nourith and bring up children, and inch moil of all who fland leaft in need of their children another day; for a meer mockery it were, and a ridiculous thing if a man should suppose that rich and wealthy men do facrifice unto the gods, and make great joy ar the nativity and birth of their children, because that one day they shall feed and sustain them in their old age, and interre them after they be dead unselfie perhaps it may be faid, they rejoyce thus and be so glad to have and bring supchildren, for phan to otherwise dies? Gloud leave none heirs behind them as who would say, it were so hard a matter to find out and meet with those that would be willing to inherite the lands and goods of strangers. Certes the sands of the seather that motes in the summe raised of dust, the feathers of birds, sitogether with their variable notes, be not so many in number, as there be men that gape after heritages, and be ready to succeed others in their livings. Danasus (who as they say was the sather of 50, daughters) if his fortune had been to bechildlesses, and other not but he should have had more heirs than so ich have parted his goods and state among them, and those verily after another sort than the heirs of his own body. For children yeeld their parents no thanks at all for being their inheritours, neither integrand thereof od they any service, duty, or honour unto them? sorwhy? they expect and look for the inheritance as a thing due of right belonging unto them: but contrarivile you hear how those strangers that hang and hum about a man who hath no children, much sike to those in the Comodies singing this sorg.

O fir, no wight shall do you any harm, I will revenge your wrong, and quarrels ar; Hold heresthree-half-pence good to keep you warm; Purseit drink it, sing wo and care, away.

Purjeit, arink it, sing we and care away,

As forthat which Euripides faith,

These worldly goods procure mens friends to chuse, And credit most who then will them resused

It is not fimply and generally true, unlesse it be to those that have no children; for such indeed are fure to be invited and seased by the richilords and rulers will make court and be serviceable to such, for them great Oratours and Advocates will plead at the bar without see, and give their counsell gratis,

How mighty is a rich man with each one, So long as his next heir is known to none?

whereas you shall seemany in the world, who before time having a number of friends and honour enough, and no sooner had a little child born unto them; but they lost all their triends, credit, and reputation at once, to that by this reckoning the having of children maketh nothing at all to the authority of their parents, so that in regard thereof, it is not that they do so love their children but surely the cause of this their kindnesse & affection proceedeth altogether from nature and appeareth no lessen mankind than in wildbeasts: Howbeit otherwhiles this naturall love as well as many other good qualities in men, are blemished and obscured by occasion of vice that buddeth up afterwards: like as we see wilde briers, bushes and brambles to bring up and grow among good and kind seeds, for otherwise we might as well collect and say, that men ove not themselves because many cut their own throats, or wilfully fall down head-long from seep to the sand high places. For Oscasion

With bloody handhis own eie-lids did force,

And plucked out his eies upon remorce.

Hegefine disputing and discoursing upon a time of abstinence, caused many of his auditours and scholars to pine themselves to death.

Such accidents of many forts there le , Permitted by the gods we daily see.

But all of them like as those other passions and maladies of the mindbetore named, transports man out of his own nature, and put him befole himself, o as they testified against themselves, that this is true, and that they do amiss he here is of if a 500 whaving farrowed a little ligge, devour it when she hath done, or a Bitch chance to tear in pieces a Puppy or whelp of her ownlitter, presently men are amazed at the sight thereof, and wonderfully afrighted, whereupon they factifice unto the gods certain explanory factifices, i for to divert the sinister prelages thereof, as taking it to be a prodigious wonders consessing thereby, that it is a property given to all living creatures, even by the instinct and institution of nature; To love, softer and cherish the finit of their own bodies: colarteis is from them to destroy the same. And yet, norwithstanding her corruption and depravation in this behalf-Likeasin mines, the gold (although it be mixed with much clay, and surred all over with earth).

thineth and glittereth thorow the same, and is to be seen a farre offseven so nature amid the molt de pravate manners and corrupt passions that we have, sheweth a certain love and tender affections little ones. To conclude, whereas the poor many times make no care at all to nourish and rear up their children, it is for nothing elie but because they fear, lett having not so good bringing up nor to civill education as they ought, they should proove servile in behaviour, unraught, unmannerly rude, and void of all good parts; and judging (as they do) poverty to be the extremity of all mileries that can befall to man, their heart will not ferve them to leave unto their children this hereditary calamity, as a most grievous and dangerous disease.

Of the Plurality of Friends.

The Summary.

N certain discourses going before, it appeareth what a benefit and good thing friendship is. And now Plutarch addeth thereto a certain correction very necessary, in regard of our nature which is given amaies to bind unto extremities, and not ablelong to hold the golden meane. Like as therefore it benrapeth a miserable metched, and cursed mind, to be desirous for to lead a life without acquaint unce and familiarity with any person; even so to make friends (as they say) hand over head, and upon every occapon is peradventure unpossible, but surely not expedient. Our Author therefore, willing toxeforme this disordina:e affection that is in many, who because they hould have a number of friends; of entimes have assorauma: assection state is in many wind occasing excessional inversa minimor of priemals, openismes these not one assured, showeth that it is fare better for a man to get one fast and fait full friend, than a great multitude of whom he cannot make any certaine account; propounding as aremedy for this coverous mind of entertaining such a plurall yof friends, the examples of those who are contented with few, and by that meanes thinke their effect more sure and seedful. After this, he were acted of the choice of friends, the state of the state o but especially of one. Then discourseth be of that which is requisite intrae friendship, annexing thereto many proper and apt similitudes, which represent as well the benefit that sincere affection bringeth, as the hurt which commeth of fained and counterfeit amity. This done, he proveth, that to entertaine a number of friends, it avery hard matter, yea, and unpossible is for that a man it not able to converse with them, nor to frame and sort with them all, but that he shall procure dispstiff enemies omial sides: und when he bath enriched and adorned the same with notable examples, he proceedeth to deferibe what use a man is to make of friendhip, and with what fort and condition of men he ought to joyne in amoust but this is the conclusion; That an honest and vertuous man cannot quit himselfe well, and performe his devoirs unto many friends at once.

Of the Plurality of Friends.

Ocrates upon a time demanded of Menon the Thessalian, who was esteemed very sufficient all literature, and a great schoole-man, exercised in long practice of disputations, and named to be one (as Empedacles faith) who had attained to the very height and perfection of wildome and learning, what verme was; and when he had answered readily and boldly enough, in this wife: There is a vertue (quoth he) of a young child, and of an old gray beard; of a man, and of a woman; of a magistrate, and of a private person; of a master, and of a fervant: I con you thank (quoth Socrates againe, replying unto him) you have done it very well: I asked you but of onevertue, and you have raised and let flie a whole swarme (as it were) of vertues gueffing and collecting not amifle by fuch an answer, that this deep clarke, who had named thus many vertues, knew noth fo much as one. And might not a man feem to fcornand mock us well enough, who having not yet gotten one friendship and amity certaine, are afraid (for footh) left ere we be aware, we fall into a multitude and plurality of friends: for this were even as much as if one that is maimed and flark blind, should feare to become either Briaress the giant, with an hundred armes and hands, or Argus, who had eyes all over his body. And yet we praise and commend excessively and beyond all measure the young man in Menander, when he saith:

Of all the goods which I do hold, To thinke each one (I would be bold) Right wonderfull, If I might find The shadow only of a friend.

But certainly this is one cause among many others, and the same not the least that we cannot be posfeffed of any one affured amity, because we cover to have so many much like mito these common firmmers and harlors, who for that they profit the their bodies fo often and to fo many men, cannot make any reckoning to hold and retain any one paramor or lover fast and sure unto them; for that the first commers seeing themselves neglected and cast off by the entertainment of new retire and fell away from them, and feeke elfewhere; or rather much after the manner of that * fofter-child of La - * Ophelies dy Hypsiphyle,

Who being fet in meadow greene With pleasant flowers all faire beseene, One after other cropt them still, Hunting this game with right good will: For why, his heart tooke great content In their gay hew and sweety sent: So little wit and sma'l* discretion The infant had and no * repletion.

Even so every one of us for the defire of novelty, and upon a satiety and sulnesse of that which is 200 to present and at hand, suffereth himselfe ever to be carried away with a new-come triend that is fresh virtor a and flowring; which fickle and inconstant affection causeth us to change often, and to begin many gaussy friendships and finish none; to enter still into new amities and bring none to periection; and for the love of the new which we purfue and feeke after, we passe by that which we held already and let as it is read it go. To begin then first and formost at antiquity (as it were) from the goddesse Vesta (according to essente the old proverbe) let us examine and confider the common fame of mans life, which hath been delivered unto us from hand to hand time out of mind, by the succession and progresse of so many ages from the old world unto this day, and take the fame for a witnesse and counseller both in this matter, we shall find in all the yeares past these only couples and paires of renowned friends, to wit, These we and Pirithous; Achilles and Patroclus; Orestes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon; Epaninondas and Pelopidas. For friendship is indeed (as I may so say) one of these cattell that love company and defire to feed and pasture with fellows; but it cannot abide herds and droves, it may not away with thelegreat flocks, as jayes, dawes, and coughes do. And whereas it is commonly faid and thought that a friend is another own-felfe, and men give unto him the name of eraie or erace in Greeke, as if a man should say, grage, that is, such another : what implieth all this, but that friendthip should be reduced within the measure and compasse of the dual number, that is, of twaine Well, this is certaine, we can buy neither many flaves nor purchase many friends with a small piece of coine: but what may be this piece of money that will fetch friends? Surely, kind affection or good will, and a lovely grace joyned with vertue, things I may tell you fo rare, as look thorowout the world, and the whole course of nature, you shall find nothing more geas on. No marvell then, if it be unpossible either to love many, or to be loved of many perfectly and in the height of affection. But like as great rivers, if they be divided into many channels, and cut into fundry rivulets, carry but an ebbe water, and run with no strong streame; even so a vehement and affectionate love planted in the mind, if it be parted many and divers waies becommeth enervate and feeble, and commeth in manner to nothing. This is the reason in nature, that those creatures which bring forth but one and no more, love their young more tenderly and entirely than others do theirs. Homer also when he would fignifie a child most dearely beloved, callethit μθνον τηλύγετόν, that is to say, only begotten and toward oldage, to wit, when the parents have no more between them, nor ever are like or do looke to have another: for mine own part, I would not defire to have that µusov, that is to say, one friend, and no more; but surely, I could wish that with other he were τηλύρετος, yea, and διέγου. that is to fay, long and late first ere he begotten, like as a son which is borne toward the latter daies of his parents, yea, and such a one, as (who according to that proverbe so common in every mans mouth) hath eaten with me a measure of falt. And are not many now adaies called friends? What else? If they have but drunke once together at the taverne, or met in the tennis court, or else turned into a tabling houle, and played at dice and hazzard one with the other, or haply light in company at one hollelry and lodged together, and in one word, they do contract and gather friends in this manner out of common Innes, wreftling places, and ordinary walkes in the markets or publike galleries. And verily, the common fort, when they see every morning in the houses of rich men and mighty rulers a great multitude and concourle of people, with much ado and hurry giving attendance there to salute them and bid them good morrow, kissing their right hands, and glad if they may touch them, accompanying them in manner of a guard when they go out of their lodging; Oh, they imagine and repute fuch potentates wondrous happy, as being furnished with such numbers of friends; and yet surely, as many as they be, they shall see more flies ordinarily in their kitchins: and to say a truth, like as these flies will be gone if no cates and viands be stirring; so these friends will tarry no longer than gaine and profit is to be gotten.

Certes, true and perfect friendship requireth these three things especially; Vertue, as being honelt and commendable; Society, which is pleafant and delectable; and Profit, which is needfull and necessary: for a man must admit and receive a friend upon judgement, and after triall made he ought to delight and joy in his company, and he is to make use of him as occasion serveth: all which three are contrary unto plurality of triends, but especially that which is principall, to wit, judgement upon a triall: and to prove this to be true, see first and formost whether it be possible in a small time to make proofe and triall of finging-men and querifiers, that they may keep a good confent and harmony together in their fong; or to make choice of oare-men, who shall agree in their rowing, to rise and fall with their oares just together; or of houshold servants such as we purpose to make the bailifes and stewards of our goods, or the governours and bringers up of our children? Much more unlikely than is it, that we should have proofe of many friends in a little foace, who will be ready to enter the triall with us of all manner of fortune, and of whom every one willbe prest and willing

Of his welfare to yeeld even part to thee,

And beare like part of thy culamity. For neither is a ship shot or haled into the sea against so many stormes and tempests; nor men do fet and pitch somany stakes in a pallisado for the defence of any place; or in havens raise bankes, and oppose damms, against the like dangers, or infear of so many perils, as friendship promiseth succour and refuge for, if it befounded furely and aright upon good proofe and inflicient experience. As for such as before triall and experiment made do intrince themselves comming and going for friends, such when they be put to the triall and touch indeed, and then found like evill money, counterfeit or light, they that go without them be glad in their mind, and as many as have them, wish with all their heart, and pray to God for to be rid of them. But furely this is a trouble some and comberous thing neither is it an ease matter to void and cast off such a friendship as this, so dispersant and offentive: for like as it fome kind of bad meat do trouble and offend the flomack a man can neither receine and hold it Hill, but it will put him to paine and breed hurt and corruption nor yet put it off and fend it out in such fort as it went in, but all filthy and loathsome, as being surred over with slime, and mixed conjusedly with other humours, and wholy altered from the former state; even so anill friend either tarrieth with us still to his own grieseand ours both, or else away he goeth perforce with ill-will, malice and enmity like bitter choier that is vomited out of the stomack. It is not good therefore to receive and admit of friends over-lightly and over-soone, nor to set our minds and knit our affections to those that come next hand, and present themselves first, ne yet love those incontinently that seeke to us and follow us; but rather to seek after them and follow them our selves that are worthy of friendship: for we must not alwaies choose that which is easie to be had, and willing to begotten; for we put by gorie and furzen bushes; we tread under foot briers and brambles though they cat h hold of us, and hang unto us as we walke whether we will or not whereas we go forward to the one tree and the vine; and even fo it is not alwaies decent and good to entertaine into our familiarity one that is ready to embrace and hang about us; but rather such ought we our telves affectionately to embrace whom we have tried to be profitable unto us, and who deferve that we should love and make account of them. And like as Xenxis the painter answered sometime to those who found fault with him for his flow hand in painting: I confesse indeed (quoth he) that I am long in drawing a picture, for I purpose that my worke should continue long; and even to that friendship and familiarity is like to last and be preserved long which was a good while in proofe and triall. Is it then no easiematter to make tryall and choise of many friends togewrite in processing the state of the state o and the most sweet and pleasant truit of amity consistent in keeping continual society, and daily frequenting one anothers company, like unto those who uttered these words,

For during lifewe will not fit In counsell from our friends, Nor yet resolve of doubtfull points Before we know their minds.

As Homer reporteth in one place: and in another Menelaus speaking of Ulyffes, saith thus, Nought else us twaine, our mutual love, And pleasures shall depart, Untill death close up both our eyes Andstrike us o the heart.

But this plurality of friends whereof we now speake, seemeth to do cleane contrary; for whereas the simple amity of twain draweth us together, holdeth and uniteth us by frequent and continuall conversation, sellowship, and duties of kindnesse,

Much I ke as when the figtree juyces You put white milke among, It curd es knits and inds the fame. No leffe than rennet strong.

According to the words of Empedecles; and furely defirous it is to make the semblable union and concorporation: this friendship of many separateth distracteth, and diverteth us, calling and transporting us fundry waies, not permitting the commixture and sodering (as it were) of good will and kind affection to grow into one and make a perfect joynt by familiar conversation, enclosing and fastening every part together. But the same anon bringerh withall a great inequality in offices and reciprocall fervices meet for friends, and breedeth a certaine foolish bashfulnesseand straining of curtesie in the performan ethereof, for by occasion of many friends those parts in amity, which otherwise are easie and commodious become difficult and incommodious: And why?

All men do not agree in humour one Their thought their cares hand diver fly each one.

And no marvell, for our very neutres do not all incline in affection the same way; neither are we at all times conversant and acquainted with the like fortunes and adventures. To say nothing of their fundry occasions and occurrences which serve not indifferently for all our actions; but like as the winds unto failers, they are with some and against others; sometimes on our backs and other whiles full in our face. And fay that it may fall out to, that all our friends at once do stand in need, and be defirous of one and the same help and ministery at our hands, it were very hard to fit all their turnes and satisfie them to their content; whether it be in taking our advice and counsell in any negotiations, or in treating about State matters, or infuit after dignities, places of government, or in feathing and entertaining frangers in their houses; But suppose that at one and the same instant, our friends being diverfly affected and troubled with fundry affaires, request all of them together our helping hand; as for example, one that is going to sea for to have our company in that voyage; another who being defendant and to anliver for himselfe in the law to affift him in the court; and a third that is a plaintife, to fecond him in hisplea; a fourth who either is to buy or fell, for to help him to make his markets; a fifth who is to marry, for to facifice with him, and be at his wedding dinner; and a fixth, who isto interre a dead corps, for to mourne and folemnize the funerals with him: in fuch a medley and confusion as this, as if according to Sophocles:

A city smook dwith incense sweet,

Andring with longs for mirth le meet,
Was be plaints allo and groaners resumd,
And all in one and silfe sime found,
And all in one and silfe sime found.

Certes having so many friends to affelt and gratifie them all were impossible, to pleasure more were abfurd, and in serving ones turne to reject many others, were offensive and hurtfull: for this is a

Who to his friend is well affected, Loves net himfelfe to be negletted.

And yetcommonly such negligences and forgetfull defaults of friends, we take with more patience. and put up with leffe anger and displeafure, when they shall come to excuse themselves by oblivion. making these and such like answers. Surely, you were but forgotten; it was out of my head, and I never thought of it: but he that shall alledge thus and say: I was not your affiltant in the court, nor flood to you in your cause, by reason that I attended another friend of mine in a triall of his; or I came not to vinte you whiles you had an ague, forthat I was bufily employed, at a feast, that or I came not to vinte you whiles you had an ague, forthat I was bufily employed, at a feast, that buth a one made to one of his friends; excusing his negligence to one friend, by his diligence to others; surely he maketh no fatisfaction for the offence already taken, but increaseth the same and maketh it worle than before, by reason of jealousie added thereto; howbeit most men as it should seeme aime at nothing else but at the profit and commodity which sriendship bringeth and yeeldeth from without, and never regard what care it doth imprint and worke within; neither remember they that he whose turne hath been served by many friends must likewise reciprocally be ready to help them as their need requireth. Like as therefore the giant Briareus with his 100 hands feeding 50 bellies, had no more fuffenance for his whole body than we, who with two hands furnish and fill one belly; even forthe commodity that we have by many friends bringeth this discommodity withall, that we are to be employed also to many, in taking part with them of their grieses and pussions, in travelling and in being troubled together with them in all their negotiations and affaires : for we are not to give eare unto Euripides the Poet when he faith thus,

In mutuall love men ought a meane to keep, That it touch not heart root nor marrow deep,

Affections for to change it well befit;

To rife and full, now hot, now coole, by fits.

Giving us to understand that friendship is to be used according as need requireth more or lesse, like to the helme of a ship, which both holdeth it hard, and also giveth head, or the tackling which spread and draw, hoise and strike saile as occasion serveth. But contrariwise, rather (good Euripides) we may turne this speech of yours to enmity, and admonish menthat their quarrels and contentions be moderate and enter not to the heart and inward marrow (as it were) of the foule, that hatred (I say) and malice, that anger, offences, defiances, and suspitions, be so entertained as that they may be soone appeased, laid down and sorgotten. A better precept is that yet of Pytharoras, when he teacheth us not to give our right hand to many; that is to say, not to make many men our friends, nor to affect that popular amity common to all, and exposed or offered to every one that commeth, which no doubt cannot chule but bring many passions with it into the heart, among which, to be difquieted for a friend, to condole or grieve with him, to enter into troubles, and to plunge ones selse into perils for his take, are not very easie matters to be borne by those that carry an ingenious mind with them, and be kind-hearted: but the saying of wise Chilan, a protessour of Philosophy, is most true, who answering unto a man that vaunted how he had not an enemy; It should seeme then (quoth he) that thou hast never a friend; for certainly enmities ensue presently upon amities, nay, they are both interlaced together; neither is it the part of a friend not to feele the injuries done unto a friend norto participate with him in all ignominies, hatred, and quarrels that he incurreth; and one enemy evermore will be sure to suspect the friend of another, yea, and be ready to malice him; as for friends, oftentimes they envy their own friends, they have them in jealousie, and traduce them every way. The oracle answered unto Timesias when he consulted about the planting and peopling of a new colony in this wife:

Thou think'st to lead a swarme of bees full kind, But angry waspes, thou shalt them shortly sind.

Semblably they that leeke aiter a bee-hive (as it were) of friends, light ere they be aware upon a wafpes neft of enemies: where there is a great ods and difference even in this, that the revenging remembrance of an enemy for wrong done, over-weigheth much the thankfull memory of a friend for a benefit received: and whether this bettine or no confider in what manner Alexander the Great entreated the friends of Philosa and Parmenie's how Dientifus the tyrant used the familiars of Dieni after what fort Noro the Emperour deals by the acquaintance of Plantus; or Tiberius Cefar by the well-willers of Sejanus, whom they caused all to be tacked, tortured, and put to death in the end. And like as the colly jewels of gold, and the rich apparell of King Creans daughter, ferved him in no stead at all, but the fire that tooke hold thereof, shaming light out fuddenly, burned him when he ran unto her to take her in his armes, and so consumed father and daughter together; even so you shall have some, who having never received any benefit at all by the prosperity of their friends, are entangled notwithstanding in their calamities, and perish together with them for company; a thing that ordinarily and most of all they are subject unto, who be men of prosession, great clarkes, and honourable personages. Thus Theseus, when Pershous his friend was punished and lay bound in prison

With fetters sure to him tied was Far stronger than of iron or brasse.

Thueyd'des also writeth; That in the great pestilence at Athens, the best men and such as made greatest profession of vertue, were they who died most with their friends that lay sick of the plague-ior that they never spared themselves, but wentto visite and look to all those whom they loved and were familiarly acquainted with. And therefore it is not meet to make so little regard and reckoning of vertue, as to hang and falten it upon others, without respect, and (as they say) hand over head, but to reserve the communication thereof to those who be worthy; that is to say, unto such who are able to love reciprocally, and know how to impart the like againe. And verily, this is the greatell contrariety and opposition which crosseth plurality of friends, in that amity indeed is bred by similitude and conformity: for considering that the very brute beasts not endued with reason, if a man would have to ingender with those that are of divers kinds, are brought to it by force, and thereto compelled, inlomuch, as they shrinke, they couch down upon their knees, and be ready to flee one from another; whereas contrariwife, they take pleasure and delight to be coupled with their like, and of the same kind, receiving willingly, and entertaining their company in the act ofgeneration with gentlenesse and good contentment: how is it possible that any found and persect friendship should grow between those who are in behaviour quite different, in affections divers, in conditions opposite, and whose course of life tendeth to contrary or sundry ends? True it is, that the harmony of musick whether it be in fong or instrument, hath symphony by antiphony (that is to say) the accord artieth from discord, and of contrary notes is composed a sweet tune, so as the treble and the base concur after a fort, (I wot not how) and meet together, bringing forth by their agreement that found which pleaseth the eare: but in this confonance and harmony of friendship there ought to be no part unlike or unequall nothing obscure and doubtfull, but the same should be composed of all things agreeable, to wit, the same will, the same opinion, the same counsell, the same affection, as if one foule were parted into many bodies. And what man is he, so laborious, so mutable, so variable, and apt to take every fashion and forme? Who is able to stame unto all patterns, and accommodate himielie to io many natures, and will not rather be ready to laugh at the Poet Theognis, who giveth this lesson:

Put on a mind (I thee do wish)
As wiria le as Polype fish,
Who ayeresemble will the roch, Towhich he neerly doth approach.

And yet this change and transmutation of the laid polype or pourtcuttle fish entreth not deeply in, but appeareth superficially in the skin, which by the closenesse or laxity thereof, as he draws it in, or lets it out, receiveth the defluxions of the colours from those bodies that are near unto it; whereas amities do require that the manners, natures, passions, speeches, studies, desires, and inclinations may be conformables for otherwise to do, were the propertie of a Protess, who was neither fortunate noryet very good and honest, but who by inchantment and forcery could eit loones transforme himselfe from one shape to another in one and the same instant; and even so he that entertaineth many friends mult of necessity be conformable to them all; namely, with the learned and Audious, to be ever reading; with professions of wrestling to bestrew his body with dust (as they do for to wreftle; with hunters, to hunt; with drunkards, to quaffe and caroufe; with ambitious citizens to we and munge for offices, without any ferled manfion (as it were) of his own nature for his This conclude manage of once of the state of of all formes, and of its own nature fo apt to alter and change, that fometimes it is ardent and burning. otherwhiles it is liquid and moist; now rare and of an airy substance, and afterwards againe groffe and thick refembling the nature of earth; even to must the mind, applied to this multiplicity of friends, be subject to many passions sundry conditions, divers affections pliable, variable, and apt to change from one fashion to another. Contrariwise, simple friends in an amicy between twaine requires ha staid mind, a firme and constant nature, permanent and abiding abiding abiding abiding abiding abiding abiding abiding abiding a retaining still the same fashions; which is the reason that a fast and assured friend is very geason and hard to be found.

Of Fortune.

The Summary

Ong time hath this Proverbe been current, That there is until in this world hat good fortune and misfortune. Some hute expanded and taken in thus, any will things work curried by meere chance and womeners or moved and driven by incenfiant furture, and all things work curried by meere chance informed in the providence of the True-Sod, who conduct the ordinarily allehings in this wordshy freedom confes and labaterne meanestyea, the very mation, will and work of mon, for the execution of historidance and prople. Now Plutarch and also tarife and rech up to this drivine and becample yilland wilder though the wore, he confused to the knowledge, flayeth below; and yet poore Pagan and Ethnicks though he were, he confused to thus diagree row opinion of Fortune; them; that it saketh away all diffinition of good and evil, questilethe he proved that prudence and wildeme over-suled this blind fortune; by conflating the inaffery and deministration that man hath above beafts: the Arts also and Soiences whereof he makethy profesion, together with bit judgement and wild weetly opposite and contactive all calinatives and changes.

Of Fortune.

Lind fortune rules mans life alway, Sage counsell therein beares no fway, Said one (whoever it was) that thought all humane actions depended upon meers califally and were norguided by wildome. What: And hath juffice and equity no place at all in this world? Can remperance and modely do nothing in the direction and managing of our affaires; Came it from fortune, and was it indeed by meere chance that Arifides made choise to continue in poverty, when it was in his power to make himselfe a Lord of much wealth and many goods? Or that Scipio when he hadforced Carthage, took not to himself, not so much as faw any part of all that pillage and was it long of Fortune, or by calualty, that Philogrates having received of King Philip a great ium of gold bought therewith harlots and dainty fishes? Or that Lasthenes and Embyeraces betraied the City Olymbus, measuring toversigne good and felicity of man by belly-cheere, and those pleasures which of all other be most dishonest and infamous? And shall we say it was a work of Fortune that Alexander, ion of Philip, not only himself es forbareto touch the bodies of the tap-tive women taken in war, but also punished all such as offered them violence and in jury? And contrariwile, came it by ill-luck and unhappy fortune that another Alexander, the fon of King Priamus, flept and lay with his friends wife, when he lodged and entertained him in his house, and not only 10, but carried her away with him, and by that occasion brought all manner of calamity upon two maine parts of the Continent, to wit, Europe, and Asia, and filled them both with those miseries that follow wars?

If we grant that all these occurrents came by Fortune, what should let us, but we might as well say, that Cats, Goats, and Apes be likewise by fortune givent to be alwaies lickorous, secherous, fir.ewd, and sawy? But in case it be true (astrue it is) that the world hath in it remperance, institute, and fortitude: what reasons there to say, that there is no prudence and wildome therein? Now if it be yeelded that the world is not void of prudence: how can it be maintained that there should not be in it sage counsell? For temperance (as some say) is a kind of prudence: and most certaine it is, that justice should be affisted by prudence: or to say more truly, ought to have it prefers which her continually. Certes, sage counsell and wildome in the good use of pleasures and delights, whereby we continue honest, we ordinarily do call continence and temperance; the same in dangars and travels, we terme tolerance, patience, and fortitude: in contrasts and management of State-affaires, we give the name of loyalty, cquity, and justice; whereby it comment to passe, that will artibute the effects of counsell and wildome unto fortune, we must likewise ascribe unto her the works of justice and temperance. And to (beleeve me) to rob, and steale, to cut purse, and to keep whores, must proceed from fortune; which it is be fole tu as bandon all discourte of our reason, and betake our selves wholly to fortune, to be driven and carried to and fro at her pleasure like to disse, chaftle, our weepings of the floore, by the puffs of some great wind. Take away sage and discrete counsellell is arewell then all consultations as touching affaires, away with deliberation, consideration, and inquifition into that which is behovefull and expedient: for furely then Sophocles talked id gly, and knew not what he spake in faying thus to a constraint a local burs office.

Seeke, and be fure to find with diligence, But lofe, what you for-let by negligence.

And in another place where dividing the affaires of man he faith in this wife :

What may be taught, I strive to learne;

What may likewife be found I feeke, for wishes all I pray,

And would to God be bound. \(\frac{1}{2}\)
Now would I gladly know, what is it that men may find, and what can they learne, in case all things in the world be directed by fortune? What Senate house of City would not be dissolved and abolished? What Councell chamber of Prince should not be overthrown and put down, if all were at the disposition of of Fortune? Wedo her wrong in reproaching her for blindnesse, when we run upon her as we do, blind, and debating our felves unto her; for how can we chuse but flumble upon her indeed, if we pluck out our own eyes, to wit, our wildome and dexterity of counfell, and take a blind guide to lead us by the hand in the course of this our life? Certes, this were even as much, as if some one of us should fay, the action of those that see is fortune, and not sight of eyes, which Plato calleth passing, that is, Light-bearers: the action likewife of them that heare is nothing elie but fortune, and not a naturall power and faculty to receive the stroke or repercussion of the aire, carried by the careto the braine; But better it were (I trow) and io will every wife body thinke to take heed how to discredit our senses so, as to submit them to fortune: For why? Nature hath bestowed uponus fight, hearing, tafte, and smelling, with all the parts of the body endued with the rest of their powers and faculties, as ministers of countell and wisdome. For it is the soule that seeth, it is the folle and under flanding that heareth, all the reft are deafe and blind; and like as it there were no fun at all, we should (for all the stars besses) live in perpetual right, as Heraclinus saith; everso, sim man had not reason and intelligence, notwithstanding all his other sense, he should not differ in the whole race of his life from brute and wild beasts; but now in that we excellent rule that the stars had not reason and intelligence. them all, it is not by chance and fortune: but Promethem (that is to fay) the use and discourse of reafon is the very cause that hath given us in recompence

According as we read in Afchylus the Poet, Forasmuch as otherwise fortune and nature both have been more favourable; and beneficiall to most of the brute beafts in their entrance into this life, than ainto man; for armed they be with hornes, tusks, spurs, and slings; moreover as Empedacles

The Urchin Strikes with many a pricke,

Which grow on backe both sharp and thicke.
Again, there be many beasts clad and covered with scales and thag haire; shod also with claws and hard hoofes: only man, as Platofaith, is abandoned and forfaken by nature, all naked, unarmed, unshod, and without any vesture whatsoever,

But by one gift which she hath given, Amends (he makes, and all is even.

And that is the use of reason, industry, and providence.

For strength of mortall man is small, His limbs but weake and finews all: Tet by his wit and quick conceit,

By cunning casts and subtile sleight, No beast in sea, or mount, so fell,

So wild or flie, but he doth quell.

What beaft more nimble, more light and fwift than is the horse; but for man it is that he runneth in therace: the dog is couragious and eager in fight, but it is in the defence of man: fifnes yeeld a most delicate and weet meat, and swine be full of good stefth, but both of them serve for viands for the food and nourishment of man: what creature is bigger or more terrible to see to than is the elephant? howbeit he maketh man sport and pastime, he is shewed as a goodly sight in settival solemnities where people be assembled, he is taught to friske and dance his measures, to fall upon his knees likewise and do reverence: and verily these and such like sleights and examples are exhibited not in vaine, nor without good profit, but to this end, that thereby we may know how far forth reafon and wildome doth advance and lift up a man above what things it maketh him furmount, and how by meanes thereof he ruleth all; and surpasseth all:

At fight with fifts we are not good, Nor yet in tripping feet, In wreftling we may well be blam'd,

Our running is not fleet. But in all these seats we are inseriour to brute beasts, howbeit for experience, memory, wildome, and artificiall fleights (as Anaxagoras faid) we go beyond them all, and thereby we have the mastery and use of them, making them to serve our turnes: we straine honey out of the combes of bees; we prefie milke out of beafts udders; we tob and foole them, we drive and carry them away and whatfoever they have, infomuch as in all this there is nothing that can be justly attributed to fortune there all proceeds from counsell and forecast.

Furthermore, the works of carpenters are done by hand of man, foarethey also of smiths and brasiers, of masons, builders, gravers, and imagers in all which there is nothing to be seen, that a man can fay is done by chance or fortune, at least wife when it is wrought absolutely and as it should be And fay that it may fall our otherwhiles that a good artifan, whether he be a three in brafle or a mason, a smith, or a carpenter, may meet with fortune and do some little thing by chance; yet the greatest peeces of worke, and the most number are wrought and finished respectively by their arts, which a certaine Poet hath given us fectetly to undertand by these verses;

Maroli on your way edon areign .
Who boe upon your bandy-crift,
On forth I gay to consign that,
Tour facted puniters bestet those;
. After atte the wild stall you're March on your way each artifan

The daughter grim of Jupiter,
For this Ergane (that is to lay Minerva) all artifans and artificers acknowledge and honour for their patroneffe, and not fortune. True it is that the report goes of a certaine painter, who drawing the picture of an horfe, had done very well in all respects, both in portraiture and also colours, save only that he pleased not himselfe in painting the four and Jwelling tooth which useth to gather about the bit as he champeth upon the same, and so salleth from his mouth when he snuffeth and bloweths this I say he liked not, neither thought he it workmanly done, infomuch as he wiped it out many times and began it anew; but never was it to his mind; at last in a pelting chare, because it would frame no better, he takes me his spunge full as it was of colours, and flung it against the table wherein he wrought; but fee the wonderful chance; this founge lighting as it did upon the right place, gave fuch a print, and dashed so, as that it repressings the front that he so much desired most lively; and to my remembrance there is not in any history fet down an artificiall thing but this that fortune ever did.

Artificersule altogether in every piece of works, their squares, their sules, their lines and levels; they go by measures and numbers, to the end that in all their works there should not be anything found done either rashly or at aventure. And verily these arts are perty kinds of Pruderke and so called; or rils and rivulers flowing from Prudence, or certaine parcels rather of it, iprinkled and dispersed among the necessities of this life: and thus much is covertly signified by the sable of the fire that Prometheus divided by sparkles, which flew some here, some there; for semblably, the small parcels and fragments of wifdome, being cut into fundry portions, are ranged into their feverall rankes and become arts. A wonderfull thing how there are and friences hould have no dealing with Fortune, nor need her help, for to attaine unto their proper ends; and yet Prudence which is the greatest foveraigne and most perfect of them alliyes, and the very height of all the glory, reputation, and goodnesse of man, should be just nothing. In the winding up and letting down of the strings of an instrument, there is one kind of wisdome, and that is called Musick; in the deesting and ordering of meats and viands there is another, which they name Cookery; in walking and foonring of cloaths and garments there is a third, to wit, the fullers craft. As for our little children, we reach them to draw on their shooes, to make them ready and dresse themselves in their cloathis decently, to take meat in their right hand, and to hold bread in the left; an evident argument, and proofe, that even such small matters as these depend not of chance and fortune, but require skill and heedtaking. Shall we say then that the greatest and most principall things that are, even those that be most materiall and necessary for mans selicity, use not wildome, nor participate one whit with providence and the judgement of reason? There is no man so blockish and void of understanding shat, after he hath tempered clay and water together, lets it alone and goeth his way when he hath to so done, looking that of its own accord, or by fortune there will be bricks or tiles made thereof neither is any one such a tot, as when he hath bought wooll and leather, sitshim down and praies unto fortune that thereof he may have garments of shooes: and is there any man to foolish thinke you? who having gathered together a great maffe of gold and filver, gotten about him a mighty retime of flaves and fervants, and being possessed of divers faire and stately houses with many a doore within and without, and those surely locked on every fide, having before him in his eye-sight a fort of fumptuous beds with their rich and costly furniture, and of tables most precious, will repose soveraigne felicity therein, or thinke that all this can make him to live happily, without paine, without griefe secure of change and alteration if he have not wisdome withall?

There was one that cavilled upon a time with Ciptaine Iphierates, and by way of reproach and minding to prove that he was of no reckoning, demanded what he was? For (quoth he) you are not a man at armes, nor archer, nor yet targetter: I am not indeed I confesse (quoth Iphierates) but I am he who command all these, and employ them as occasion serveth; even so wildome is neither gold nor filver, it is not glory nor riches, it is not health, it is not ftrength, it is not beauty: What is it then? Surely even that which can skill how to use all these, and by meanes whereof each of thefethings is pleasant, honourable, and profitable; and contrariwise, without which they are difplealant, hurtfull and dangerous, working his destruction and dishonour who possesset them. And therefore right good countell gave Promethem in Heffodm to his brother Epimethem in this one Receive no gifts at any time, Which heavenly Jove shall lend: But fee thou do refuse them ally And back againethem fend.

Meaning thereby these outward goods of fortunes gift, as if he would havefaid: Go not about to play upon a Flute, if thou have no knowledge in Musick; nor to read if thou know never a letter in the book; mount not on horse back, unlesse thou canst tell how to sit him and ride; and even so he advited him thereby, not to feeke for office and place of government in common-weale, wanting wit as he did; nor to lay for riches, so long as he bare a covetous mind and wist not how to be liberall; nor to marry a wife for to be his mafter, and to lead him by the nofe: for not only wealth and prosperity hapning above desert unto unadvised folke, giveth occasion (as Demosthenes said) unto them for to commit many follies; but also worldly happinesse beyond all reason and demerit, caufeth such as are not wife, to become unhappy and milerable in the end.

Of Envy and Hatred.

The Summary.

N this briefe Treatife concerning Envy and Hatred, Plutarch after he hath shewed in generall termes, I that they be two different vices, and declared withall the properties of the one and the other, proveth this difference by divers reasons and arguments ranged in their order: he discovereth the nature of envious perfons and malicious; and sheweth by a proper similitude that the greatest personages in the world be secured from the claws and paws of envious perfons, and yet for all that ceafe not to have many enemies. And verily is feemeth that the author began this little works; especially for to beat down envy, and that the infamy therof might so much more appeare in comparing and matching it with another detestable vices the which notwith franding he saith is tell cenormous than it.

Of Envy and Hatred.

T feemeth at the first fight, that there is no difference between envy and hatred, but that they be both one. For vice (to speake in generall) having (asit were) many hooks or crotchets, by meanes thereof as it firreth to and fro, it yeeldeth unto those passions which hang thereto many occasions and opportunities to catch hold one of another, and so to be knit and enterlaced one within the other; and the same verily (like unto diseases of the body) have a sympathy and fellow-feeling one of anothers distemperature and inflammation: for thus it commets to passe, that amalicious and spightfull man is as much grieved and offended at the prosperity of another, as the envious person and so we hold that benevolence and good-will is opposite unto them both, for that it is an affection of a man, wishing good unto his neighbour: and envy in this respect resembleth hatred for that they have both a will and intention quite contrary unto love: but for a smuch as no things like be the same, and the resemblances between them be not so effectuall to make them all one, as the differences to distinguish them asunder; let us search and examine the said differences, beginning at thevery fource and originall of these passions.

Hatred then is ingendred and arifeth in our heart upon an imagination and deep apprehension that we conceive of him whom we hate, that either he is naught and wicked in generall to every man, or else intending mischiefe particularly unto our selves: for commonly it salleth out, that those who thinke they have received some injury at such an ones hand, are disposed to hate him, yea, and those whom otherwise they know to be maliciously bent and wont to hurt others, although they have not wronged them, yet they hate and cannot abide to looke upon them with patience; whereas ordinarily they beare envy unto such only as seeme to prosper and to live in better state than their neighbours: by which reckoning it (nould feeme that envy is a thing indefinite, much like unto the disease of the eyes Ophthalmia, which is offended with the brightnesseof any light whatsoever; whereas hatred is determinate, being alwaies grounded upon some certaine subject matters respective to it selfe, and on them it worketh. Secondly, our hatred doth extend even to brute beats; for some you shall have, who naturally abhor and cannot abide to see cats, nor the sies cantharides, nor todes, nor yet snakes, and any such serpents. As for Germanieus Casar, he could not of all things abide either to see a cock, or to hearehim trow. The Sages of Perfia called their Magi, killed all their mice and rats, as well for that themselves could not away with them, but detested them, as also because the god (forsoeth) whom they worshipped had them inhorror. And intruth, all the Arabians and Æthiopians generally, hold them abominable. But envy properly is between man and man; neither is there any likelihood at all, that there should be imprinted envy in savagecreatures one against another; because they have not this imagination and apprehension, that another is either fortunate or unfortunate, neither be they touched with any fense of honour or dishonour; which is the thing that principally and most of all other giveth an edge, and whetteth on envy; whereas it is evident that they hate one another, they bear malice and maintein enmity, nay, they go to war as against those that be distoiall treacherous, and such as are not to be trusted for in this wile do eagles war with dragons, crowes with owles, and the little nonnet or tit-mouse fighteth with the linnet, infomuch, as by report, the very blood of them after they be killed, will not mingle together, and that which is more, it you feem to mix them, they will feparate and run apart again one from the other and by all likelihood the hatred that the lion hath to the cock, and the elephant also unto an hogge, proceedeth from fear; for lightly that which creatures naturally fear, the same they also hate; fo that herein also a man may affigne and note the difference between envy and hatred, for that the nature of beafts is capable of the one but not of the other.

Of Envy and Hatred.

Over and besides, no man deserveth justly to be envied, for to bein prosperity and in better state than another, is no wrong or injurie offered to any person; and yet this is it for which men be envied; whereas contrariwise, many are hated worthily, such as those whom in Greek we call μξιομισήτες, that is to fay, worthy of publick hatred; as also as many as do not flie from such, detest them not, nor abhor their company. And a great argument to verifie this point, may be gathered from hence, namely, in that some there be who confesse and take it upon them, that they hate many; but no man will be known that he envieth any: for intruth, the hatred of wicked persons and of wickednesse, is commended as a quality in men praise-worthy. And to this purpose serveth well that which was faid of Charilles, who reigned in Sparta, and was Lycurgus his bothers sonne, whom when there were certain that commended for a man of mild behaviour and of a relenting & gentle nature. And how can it be (quoth he was joined with him in the royall government) that Charillus should be good, seeing he is not sharp and rigorous to the wicked. And the Poet Homer describing the deformity of Therfires his body, depainted his defects and imperfections in fundry parts of his perion, and by many circumlocutions; but his perverse nature and crooked conditions he set down briefly and in one word in this wife:

Worthy Achilles of all the hoft

And sage Ulysses, he hated most. for he could not chuse but be stark naught and wicked in the highest degree, who was so sull of hatred unto the best men. As for those who deny that they are envious, in case they be convinced manifeltly therein, they have a thousand pretenies and excuses therefore, alledging that they are angry with the man or stand in tear of him whom indeed they bear envie unto, or that they hate him, colouring and cloaking this passion of envie with the vail of any other whattoever for to hide and co-ver it, as it it were the only malady of the soul, that would be concealed and dissembled. It cannot chuse therefore, but that these two passions be nourished and grow as plants of one kind, by the fame means, confidering that naturally they fucueed one the other howbeit, we rather hate those that be given more to lewdnesse and wickednesse, and we envy such rather who seem to excel others in vertue, And therefore Themsfooles (being but a youth) gave out and faid, that he had done nothing notable, because as yet he was not envied for like as the flies cantharides fettle principally upon that wheat which is the rairest and come to full perfection; and likewise stick unto the roles that are most out, and in the very pride of their flowring; even so envie taketh commonly unto the best conditioned perions, and to fuch as are growing to the height of vertue and honour: whereas contrariwise the lewdest qualities that be, and wi ked in the highest degree do mightily move and augment hatred: and hereupon it was that the Athenians had them in such detellable hatred, and abhorred them so deadly, who by their slanderous imputations brought good Socrates their sellow-citizen to his death, infomuch as they would not vouchiafe either to give them a coal or two of fire or light their candles, or dein them an answer when they asked a question; nay, they would not wash or bathe together with them in the same water, but commanded those servitours in the bains which were called Parachyra, that is to fay, drawers and laders of water into the bathing veffels, to let forth that as polluted and defiled wherein they had washed whereupon they seeing themselves thus excommunicate and not able to endure this publike hatred which they had incurred, being weary of their lives, hung and strangled themselves. On the contrary fide it is often seen, that the excellency of vertue; honor and glory, and the extraordinary successe of men is so much, that it dothextinguish and quench all envie. For it is not a likely or credible matter that any man bare envieunto Cyrus or Alexander the Great, after they were become the onely lords and monarchs of the whole world but like as the funne when he is directly and plumb over the head or top of any thing, causeth either no shadow at all, or the same very small and short by the reason that his light overspreadeth round about; even so when the prosperity of a man is come to the highest point, and have gotten over the head of envie, then the said envy retireth and is either gone altogether, or else drawne within a little room by reason of that brightnesse over-spreading it: but contrativise the grandeur of fortune and puissance in the enemies, dorh not one jot abbreviate or allay the hatred of their evill willers; and that this istrue, may appear by the example of Alexander above named, who had not one that envied him, but many enemies be found and those malicious, and by them in the end he was traiteroully for-layed and murdered.

Semblably, adventities may well stay envy and cause it cease, but enmity and hatred they do not abolish; for men never give overto despite their enemies, no not when they are brought lowd and oppressed with calamities; whereas you shall not see one in misery envied. But most true is that saying sound of a certain sophister or great profession; no our dayes: That envious persons of all other saying sound of a certain sophister or great profession; so that herein syeth one of the greatest difference between their two passions; that hatred departed not from those persons of whom it hath once taken hold, neither in the prosperity nor adversity of those whom they hate; whereas envie doth avoid and vanish away to nothing upon extremity as well of the one as the

Over and befides we may the better discover the difference also of them by the contraries: for Arred, enmity, and malice cease presently fosoon as a man is persuaded that he hath caught no harred, enmity, and malice cease presently fosoon as a man is persuaded that he hath caught no harm nor sustein a single party or when he hath conceived an opinion that such as he hated harm nor sustein their lewdnesses are to ever more the last favor that is shewed (as Thur,dider sinth) fure or good turn at their hand; for ever more the last favor that is shewed (as Thur,dider sinth) fure or good turn at their hand; for ever more the last favor that is shewed (as Thur,dider sinth) fure or good turn at their hand; for ever more the last favor that is shewed (as Thur,dider sinth) fure or good turn at their hand; so will the causes before specified, the first doth nor wash greater offence taken before. Now of these three causes before specified, the first doth nor wash away envy; for say that men were persuaded at the first that they received no wrong at all; yet they give not over for all that to be are noy still and assort the two laters they do riretate and provoke it the rathers for such as they effect men of quality and good worthstose they do eye-bite more than before, as having vertue the greatest good that is sand not withstanding that they doreap commodity and find favour at their hands, who prosper more than they yet they grieve and ver thereat, envying them still both for their good mind to benefit them, and for their might and abi ity to perform the same, for that the one proceedeth from vertue, and the other from an happy estate, both which are Wemay therefore conclude, that envy is a paffion farre different from harred, fince it is so that wherewith the one is appealed and mollified, the other is made more exalperate and grievous. But let us consider a little in the end the scope and intentional well of the one as the other. Certes the man that is malicious, purposeth fully to do him a mischief whom he hatesh; so that this passion is defined to be a disposition and forward will to spie out an occasion and opportunity to wait another a shrewd turn; but sorted this is not in envy: for many there be who have an envious eye to their kinsslok and companions, whom they would not for all the good in the world see either to perish or to fall into any grievous calamity; onely they are grieved to see them in such prosperity, and would impeach what they can their power, and ecclypse the brightnesse of their glory; mary they would not procure nor define they itter overthrow, nor any distresse remedilesse or extream miseries; but it would content and suffice them to take down their height; and as it were the upmost garret or turret of an high house which overlooketh them.

A Mong the dangerous effects of every and harred, this is not the least nor one of the last, that they shoot (as is were) from within our adversaries, for so slide and enter into us and take possession in our bears; making us believe that we shall impact one evilt by another which is as much as to defir to cleans one ordere by anney, and so quench agrees free by putting into it plenty of oil. How a Man may receive Profit by his Enemies.

See that you have chosen by your self (O Cornelius Pulcher) the meetest course that may be in the government of a common-wealth; wherein having a principal regard unto the weal-publik; you thew your felf most gracious and courteous in private to all those that have accesse and repair unto you. Now for a much as a man may well find some countrey in the world, wherein there is no venemous beaft, as it is written of Cardie, but the management and administration of State affairs was never known yet to this day clear from envie, jealoulie, emulation and contention, paffions of all other most apt to engender and breed enmities, unto which it is subject; for that if there were nothing elfe, even amity and friendship it self is enough to entangle and encumber us with enmities; which wife Chilon the Sage knowing well enough, demanded upon a time of one (who vaunted that he had no enemies) whether he had not a friend. In regard hereof a man of State and policy, in mine opinion (among many other things wherein he ought to be well fludied) should also thorowly know what belongeth to the having of enemies and give good ear unto the faying of Xenoplion, namely, That a man of wit and understanding is to make his profit and benefit by his enemies. And therefore having gathered into a pretty Treatife, that which came into my mind of late to discourse and dispute upon this matter, I bavesent unto you written and penned in the very same tearms as they were delivered, having this eye and regard as much as possible I could, not to repeat any thing of that which heretofore I had written touching the politick precepts of governing the weal-publick for that Ifee that you have that book often in your hand.

Our fore-fathers in the old world contented themselves in this; That they might not be wounded or hurt by strange and savage beasts brought from forrein countreys, and this was the end of a 1 those combits that they had against such wild beasts; but those who came after, have learned moreover how to make use of them:not onely to take order to keep themselves from receiving any harm or dammage by them;but (that which more is) have the skill to draw iome, ommodity from them, feeding of their flesh, clothing their bodies with their wool and hair curing and healing their maladies with their gall and renner, arming themselves with their hide and skinnes; infomuch as now from henceforth, it is to be feared (and not without good cause) left if beafts should fail, and that there were none to be found of men, their life should become brutish, poor, needy and savage. And fince it is fo, that whereas other men, think it sufficient not to be offended or wronged by their enemies, Xenophon writeth: That the wife reap commodity by their advertaries; we have no reason to derogate any thing from his credit, but to believe him in fo faying yea & we ought to lear h for the method and art to attain and reach unto that benefit, as many of us (at least wife) as cannot peffibly live in this world without enemies. The husbandman is not able with al his skilto make alllort of trees to cast off their wild nature, and become gentle and domesticall. The hunter annot with all his cunning, make tame and tractable al the favage beafts, of the forrests; and therfore t ey have fought and devised other means and uses to make the best of them; the one finding good in barren and fruit less eplants, the other in wild and savage beasts. The water of the sex is not potable, but brackish and hurtfull unto us, howbeit, fishes are nourished therewith, and it serveth mans turn also to transport passengers (as in a waggon) into all parts, and carry whatsoever aman will. When the Satyre would have kissed and embraced fire the first time that ever he saw it, Prometheus admonished him and said:

Thou wilt bewail thy goats-b. ard foon,

If thou it touch, 'twill burn anon. but it yeeldeth light and heat, and is an instrument serving all arts, to as many as do know how to use it well; semblably, let us consider and see whether an enemy being otherwise harmefull and intractable, or at least-wife hard to be handled may not in some sort yeeld as it were a handle to take hold by for to touch and use him so as he may serve our turn and ministerunto us some commodity. For many things there are besides, which be odious, troublesome, cumberous, hurtfulland contrary unto those that have them or come near unto them; and yet you see that the very maladies of the body give good occasion unto some for to live at rest and repose: I mean sequestred from affairs abroad, and the travailes presented unto others by fortune, have so exercised them, that they are become thereby strong and hardy: and to say more yet, banishment and losse of goods, hath been the occasion unto divers, yea, and singular means to give themselves to their quiet study and to Philosophie; like as Diogenes and Craves did in times past. Zeno himself when newes came unto him that his ship wherein he did venture and trassick was split and cast away: Thou hast done well by me fortune (quoth he) to drive me again to my scholars weed. For like as those living creatures which are of a most found and healthfull constitution and have besides strong stomacks, are able to concoct and digest the serpents and scorpions which they devour; nay, some of them there be which are nourished of stones, scales, and sheis, converting the same into their nutriment by the strength and vehement heat of their spirits; whereas such as be delicate, tender, foft, and crasse, are ready to cast and vomit if they taste a little bread onely, or do but sip of wine; even so soolish tolk do marre and corrupt eventriendship and amity; but those that are wise canskill how to use enmities to their commodity, and make them ferve their turnes. First and formost therefore in my conceir, that which in enmity is most hurtfull, may turn to be most profitable unto such as be weary and cantake good heed and what is that you will fay? Thine enemy as thou knowest well enough watcheth continually, spying and prying into all thine actions, he goeth about viewing thy wholelife, to see where he may hinde any vantage to take hold of thee, and where thou lieft open that he may affail where he may muce any values to take that it pierceth not onely through an oke, as Lyneum did, or fromes and finels; but allo it goeth quite through thy friend, thy domeftical fervants, yea, & every familiar of thine with whom thou daily doeft converte, forto dit overio much as possibly he can what thou doest or goest about; he foundeth and searcheth by undermining and secret ways what thy defigues and purposes be. As for our friends, it chanceth many times that they fall extreme sick, yea, and die thereupon before we know of it, whiles we defer and put off from day to day, to go and vifit them or make small reckoning of them; but as touching our enemies, we are so observant, that we curioully enquire and hearken even after their very dreames; the dileales, the debts, the hard ulage of men to their own wives, and the untoward life between them, are many times more unknown unto tho e whom they touch and concern than unto their enemy but above all the flicketh close unto thy faults, inquisitive he is after them, and those he traceth especially and like as the geirs ar vultures flie unto the Hinking fent of dead carions and putrified carcales, but they have no fmell or fent at all of hodies found and whole; even fo those parts of our life which are diseased, naught and ill affected, be they that move an enemy; to these leap they in great haste who are our ill willers, these they seize upon and are ready to worry and pluck in pieces; and this it is that profiteth us most, in that it compelleth us to live orderly, to look unto our steps that we tread not awry, that we neither do or tay ought in onfiderat ly or rashly; but alwayes keep our life unblameable, as if we observed a most first and exquire diet; and verify this heedfull caution repreffing the violent paffions of our mind in this fort and keeping reason at home within doores, engendreth a certain studious delire, an intention and will to live uprightly and without touch for like as those Cities by ordinary wars with their neighbour Cities, and by continuall expeditions and voiages, learning to be wife, take a love at length unto good lawes and lound government of state; even so they that by occasion of enmity be forced to live foberly, to fave themselves from the imputation of idlenesse and negligence, yea, and to do every thing with discretion and to a good and profitable end, through use and custome shall be brought by little and little (ere they be aware) unto a certain setled habit that they cannot lightly trip and do amisse, having their manners framed in passing good order, with the least helping hand of reason and knowledgebesides for they who have evermore readily before their eyes this fentence:

This were alone for Priamus, and his fonnes likewife all, Oh how would they rejoyce at heart, in cafe this should befall.

certes would quickly be diverted, turned and withdrawn from fuch things, whereat their enemies are wont to joy and laugh a good: fee we not many times stage plaiers, chanters, musicians and such artificers in open theaters, who ferve for the celebration of any folemnity unto Backbus or other gods, to play their parts carelessely, to come unprovided, and to carry themselves I know not how negligently, nothing forward to thew their cunning and do their bett, when they are by themselves alone and no other of their own profession in place ? but if it chance that there be emulation and contention between them and other concurrents who shall do best; then you shall see them not onely to come better prepared themselves, but also with their instruments in very good order; then shall you per eive how they will bestir themselves in trying their strings, in tuning their instruments more exactly, and in fitting every thing about their flutes and pipes, and affaying them. He then who knoweth that he hath an enemy ready and provided to be the concurrent in his life, and the rivall of his honour and reputation, will look better to his wayes and stand upon his own guard; he will (I fay) fit fast and look circumspectly about him to all matters, ordering his life and behaviour in better fort : for this is one of the properties of vice , that when we have offended and trespassed, we have more reverence and stand rather in awe of our enemies lest we be shamed by them than of our friends. And therefore Scipio Natica when some there were that both thought and gave out that the Romane estate was now settled and in safety, considering that the Carthaginians who were wont to make head against them and keep them occupied, were now vanquished and defated, the Athenians likewise subdued and brought under subjection: Nay mary (quoth he) for it is clean contrary and even now are we ingreatest danger, being at this passe that we have left our felves none to fear, none to reverence.

And hereto moreover, accordeth well the answer that Diogenes made, like a Philosopher and a man of State indeed: One asked him how he should be revenged of his enemy: Marie (quoth he) by being a vertuous and honest man thy self. Men seeing the horses of their enemies highly accounted of, or their hounds praised and commended do grieve thereat, if they perceive also their land well tilled and husbanded or their gardens in good order, ites hand flowring, they setch a sigh and fortow for thematter, What(think you then) will your enemy do?how will he sare, when you shall be seen a just man wise and prudent, honest and sober, in yords well advised and commendable, in deep pure and clean, in diet neat and decent?

Reaping the fruit of wildome and prudence, Sowne in deep furrow of heart and confcience, From whence there spring and bud continually Counsels full sage, with fruit abundantly.

Pindarus the Poet faid That those who are vanquished and put to foil, are so tongue-tied, that they cannot say a words howbeit, this is not simply true, nor holdeth in all, but in such as perceive themselves overcome by their enemies, in diligence, goodnesse, magnanimity, humanity, bounty and beneficence: for these bethe things (as Demossheres saith) which stent the tongue, close up the mouth, stop the wind-pipes and the breath, and in one word, cause mento be filent and dweb.

Refemble not level folk, but them out-go Invertuous deeds, for this thou maift well do.

Wouldest thou do thine enemy who hateth thee a great displeasure indeed ? Never call him by way of reproch, buggerer, wanton, lativious, rushan surrile scotter, or coverous michers but take order with thy self to be an honest man every wayschalte, continents, true indeed & word, courteous and just, to all those that deal with these but if thou be driven to let sall an opprobrious speech, and to revile thine enemy, then take thou great heed after wards that thou come not neer in any wise to those vices which thou reprochest him with, enter into thy self, and examine thine own consience, search all the corners theros, look that there be not in thy soul some putrified matter and rotten corruption, for sear left thine own vice within may hit thee home, and require thee again with this verse out of the tragical Poet:

If thou chance to upbraid thine enemy with ignorance, and call him unlearned, take thou greater pains at thy book love thou thy fludy better, and ger more learning; if thou twit him with cowardile, and name him dastard, stirre up the vigour of thine own courage the rather, and shew thy selfa man fo much the more half thou given him the tearms of beaftly whore-mafter or lateivious lecher wipe out of thy heart the least taint and spot that remaineth hidden therein of concupiscence and sensuality; for nothing is there more shamefull or causeth greater grief of heart, than an opprobrious and reprochfull speech returned justly upon the author thereof. And as it seemeth that the reverberation of a light doth more offence unto the feeble eyes; even so those reproches which are retorted and fent back again by the truth, upon a man that blazed them before, are more offenfive: for no leffe than the North-east wind Cacias doth gather unto it clouds: so doth a bad life draw unto it opprobrious speeches; which Plato knowing wellenough, whensoever he was present in place, and law other mendo any unfeemly or dishonest thing, was wont to retire apart, and say this secretly unto himlest: Do not I also labour other-while of this disease? Moreover, he that hath blamed and reproched the life of another, it presently with all he would go and examine his own reforming the same accordingly redressing and amending all that hosindes amisse until he have brought it to a better state shall receive some profit by that reproving and reviling of his sotherwise it may both seem (as it is no lesse indeed) a vain and unprofitable thing. Commonly men cannot choose but laugh when they see eight ther a bald-pate or a bunch-back, to taunt and icoffe at others for the same defects or deformities; and so in truth, it were a ridiculous thing and a meer mockery to blame or reproch another in that, for which he may be mocked and reproched himself. Thus Leo the Byzantine cut one home that was crumpt-shoulder'd and buncht-backt, when heseemed to hit him in the teeth with his dim and feeble eye-fight: Doest thou twit me (quoth he) by any imperfection of nature incident unto a man, when as thy felf art marked from heaven, and carrieft the divine vengeance upon thy back? Never then reprove thou an adulterer, if thy self be an unclean wanton with boies; nor seem thou to upbraid one with prodigality, if thou be a coverous mifer thy felf. Alemann reviled Adraffus (upon a time)in this wife: Thou

A fifter hoft by parents twain , Whose hands her husband deare have slain.

But what answered Advastus? He objected not unto him the crime of another, but payeth him home with his own, after this manner:

But thouthy self hast murdered Thine own kinde mother, who thee bred.

In like fort, when Domitius (upon a time) feemed to reproch Crassius, saying: Is it not true, that when your lamptey was dead which was kept full daintily for you in a stew. you wepttherfore? Crassius precently came upon him again with this bitter reply: And is ir not true that you when you followed three wives of yours one after another to their funerall fire, never shed tear for thematter? It is not for requisit or necessary with (as the vulgar fort do think) that he who checketh and rebusketh another, should have a ready wit of his own, and a naturall give in doing it, or a loud and big yocke, or an audacious and boldface; no, but such an one he ought to be, that cannot be noted and taxed with any vices for it should seem that Apple addtessed this precept of his [Know thy self] to no perion so much as to him who would blame and find fault with another; for fear left such men, in speaking to others what they would, hear that again which they would not. For it happeneth ordinarily as Sophoeder slatch: That such a none

Who lets his tongue run foolishly , In noting others bitterly, Shall hear himfelf (unwillingly)

The words he give so wilfully.

Lo what commodity and profitensheth upon reproching an enemy.

Neither cometh there lesse good and advantage unto a man by being reproched by another, and hearing himself reviled by his enemies: and therefore it was very well and truly said of Antisthenes, that fuch men as would be faxed and become honest another day, ought of necessity to have either good friends, or most spitefull and bitter enemies for as they with their kind remonstrances and admonitions; so these with their reprochfull tearms were like to reform their sinfull life. But forasmuch as amity and friendship now adayes speaketh with a small and low voice when faults should freely be reproved, and is very audible and full of words in flattering, altogether mute and dumb in rebukes and chastifements; but what remaineth now but that we should hear the truth from the mouth of our enemies? much like unto Telephus, who for default of a Phylician that was a friend to cure him, was forced to commit his wound or ulcer to the iron head of his enemies spear for to be healed; and even to those that have no well-willers that darefreely reprove their faults, must per-torce endure with patience the stinging tongue of their enemy and evill-willer in chastizing and rebuking their vices not regarding fo much the intent & meaning of the ill-speaker, as the thing it self, and the matter that he speaketh; and look how he who enterprised the killing of Promethem the Theffalian, ran him so deep with his sword into the impostume or swelling botch which he had about him, that he let forth the corruption, and saved his life by the breaking and issue thereof; even to for all the world it falleth out many times, that a reprochfull speech delivered in anger or upon evill will is the cause of healing some malady of the soul, either hidden or unknown altogether, or else neglected: but the most part of those who are in this manner reproched, never consider whether the vice wherewith they are touched be in them or no, but they look rather if they can finde fome other vice to object unto him, who hath thus challenged them; and much like unto wreftlers, they never wipe away their own dust, that is to say, the reproches that be fastned upon themselves, and wherewith they be defamed, but they befrew one another with duft, and afterwards tripup one anothers heels, and tumble down one upon another, weltering in the same, and soiling one another therewith: whereas indeed it behoved rather that a man when he findeth himself tainted by his enemy, to ender our for to do away that vice wherewith he is noted and defamed, much rather than to fetch out any spot or stein out of his garment, which hath been shewed him : and although there be charged upon us some slanderous imputation that is not true; yet neverthelesse we are to fearch into the occasion whereupon such an opprobrious speech might arise and proceed, yea, and take heed we must and sear lest ere we be aware we commit the like or come neer unto that which hath been objected unto us. Thus for example fake Lacydes King of the Argives, for that he did wear his hair curiously set; in manner of a perruke, and because his gate or manner of going, seemed more delicate and nice than ordinary, grew into an ill name and obloquie of effeminate wantonnels. And Pompeius the great could not avoid the like fuspicion, because he used otherwhiles to scratch his head with one finger onely, and yet otherwise he was so farre from feminine wantonnesseand incontinence as any man in the world. Crassus was accused for to have had carnall company with one of the religious nuns or votaries of V. sta, for that being defirous to purchase of her a fair piece of land and house of pleasure which she had, he resorted oftentimes privately unto her, spake with her apart, and perhaps made court unto her for to have her good will in that respect onely. Posthumialikewise another vestall virgin, for that she was much given to laugh upon a small occafion, and withall would not flick to entertain talk with men, more boldly peradventure than became a maiden of her profession, was so deeply suspected of incontinence, that she was brought judicially into question about it, howbeit found unguilty, and acquit she was: but when Spurius Minutius the high-priest for the the time being, assoiled her and pronounced the sentence of herabfolition, minding to difmisse her of the Court, he gave her a gentle admonition by the way, that from then e forward the should forbear to use any words lesse modest and chaste then the carriage of her life was. Themistocles likewise, notwithstanding he was most innocent indeed, was called into question for treason, because he intertained amity with Paulanias, sent and wrote oftentimes unto him, and so by that meanes gave suspicion that he minded to betray all Greece. When as therefore thou are charged with a falle crimination by thine enemie, thou must not neglect it and make small account thereof, because it is not true, but rather look about thee and examine what hath been done or faid, either by thee or any one of those who affect and love thee, or converse with thee, founding and tending any way to that imputation which might give occasion or likelihood thereof, and carefully to beware and avoid the same : for if by adverte and heavy fortune whereunto others have inconfiderately fallen, they are deerly taught what is good for them, as Merope faith in one Tragedie:

Fortune bath taken for her salarie, My deerest goods of which I am berift, But me she taught by that great miferie For to be wife, and fo the hath me left.

What should let or hinder us, but that we may learn by a master that costeth us nought, nortaketh nothing for his reaching (even our enemy) to profit and learne fomewhat that we knew not before. for an enemy perceiveth and findeth in us many things more than a friend, by reason that (as Plate faith) That which loveth is alwaies blind in the thing that is loved; whereas he who hateth us, besides that he is very curious and inquisitive into our imperiections, he is not meale-mouthed (as they say) nor will not spare to speake, but is ready enough to divulge and biaze all abroad. King Hiero chanced upon a time, being at words with one of his enemies, to be told in reproachfull manner by him of his flinking breath i, whereupon being somewhat dismaied in himselfe, he was no sooner returned home to his own house but he chid his wife: How comes this to passe (quoth he?) What fay you to it ? How hapneth it that you never told me of it? The woman being a fimple, chaste, and harmelesse dame: Sir (saith she) I thought all mens breath had smelled so. Thus it is plaine, that fuch faults as be object and evident to lenles, groffe, and corporall, or otherwise notorious to the world, we know by our enemies sooner than by our friends and samiliars.

Over and besides, as touching the continence and holding of the tongue, which is not the least point of vertue, it is not possible for a man to rule it alwaies, and bring it within the compasse and obedience of reaton, unlesse by nie and exercise, by long custome, and painfull labour he have tamed and mastered the worst passions of the soule, such as anger is: for a word that hath escaped us against our wils, which we would gladly have kept in; of which Homer faith thus:

Out of the mouth a word did fly

For all the range of tenth $f_i f_i^{l-by}$. And a speech that we let at a venture (a thing happing often-times, and especially unto those whose spirits are not well exercised, and who want experience, who run out, as it were, and breake forth into paffions) this (Ilay) is ordinary with fuch as be hafty and cholerick, whole judgement is not ferled and stated, or who are given to a licentious course of life: for such a word, being (as divine Plato faith) the lightest thing in the world, both gods and men have many a time payed a most grievous and heavy penalty; whereas Silence is not only (as Hipporrates faith) good against thinst, but also is never called to account, nor amerced to pay any fine; and that which more is, in the bearing and putting up of taunts and reproaches, there is observed in it a kind of gravity beleening the perfon of Socrates, or rather the magnanimity of Hercules, if it be true that the Poetfaid of him:

Of bitter words he leffe account did make Thandoth the flie, which no regard doth take.

Neither verily is there a thing of greater gravity, or fimply better, than to heare a malicious enemy to revile, and yet not to be moved nor grow into passions therewith,

But to passed or man that loves to raile,

As rock in seaby which me swim or saile.

Moreover, a greater effect will ensue upon this exercise of patience, if thou canst accustome thy selfo to heare with silence thine enemy whiles he doth revile, for being acquainted therewith, thou shalt the better endure the violent fits of a curst and shrewd wifechiding at home; to heare also without trouble the sharpe words of friend or brother; and if it chance that father or mother let fly bitter rebukes at thee, or beat thee, thou wiltfuffer all, and never shew thy selfe dipleated and arigry with them. For Socrates was wont to abide at home Kantippe his wife, a perillous shrewd woman and hard to be pleased, to the end that he might with more ease converse with others, being used to endure her curstnesse. But much better it were for a man to come with a mind prepared and exercised before-hand with hearing the icoffes, railing language, angry taunts, outragious and foule words of enemies and arangers, and that without anger and shew of disquietnesse, than of his domestical people within his own house. Thus you see how a man may shew his meekuesse and patience in enmities; and as for simplicity, magnanimity, and a good nature indeed, it is more seene here than infriendship: for it is not so honest and commendable to do good unto a friend, as dishonest, not to fuccour him when he standeth in need and requesteth it.

Moreover, to forbeare to be avenged of an enemy if opportunity and occasion is offered, and to let him go when he is in thy hands, is a point of great humanity and curtesie; but him that hath compassion of him when he is fallen into adversity, succoureth him in distresse, at his request is ready for to shew good will to his children and an affection to sustaine the state of his houle and family being in affliction; whosoever doth not love for this kindnesse, nor praise the goodnesse of his nature,

Cafar commanded that the flatues erected in the honour of Pompeius, which had been beaten down and overchrown, should be set up againe; for which act Cicerolaid thus unto him: In rearing the images of Pompetus, O Cefar, thou hast pitched and erected thine owne. And therefore we ought not to be spary of praise & honour in the behalfe of an enemy especially when he deserveth the sames for by this meanes the party that praiseth shall win the greater praise himselfe; and besides, if it happen againe that he blame the laid enemy, his acculation shall be the better taken, and carry the morecredit, for that he shall be thought not so much to hate the person as disallow and missike his

But the most profitable and goodliest matter of all, is this: That he who is accustomed to praise his enemies, and neither to grieve or envy at their well-fare, shall the better abide the prosperity of his friend, and be furthest off from envying his familiars in any good successe or honour thatby well-doing they have atchieved. And is there any other exercise in the world that canbring greater profit unto our toules, or worke a better disposition and habit in them, than that which riddeth us of emulation and the humour of envy? For like as in a City, wherein there be many things neceffary, though otherwise simply evill, after they have once taken sure footing, and are by custome established in manner of a law, men shall hardly remove and abolish, although they have been hurt andendammaged thereby; even so enmity, together with hatred and malice, bringeth in envy, jealousie, contentment and pleasure in the harme of an enemy, remembrance of wrongs received, and offences paffed, which it leaveth behind in the foule, when it felie is gone; over and befides, cunning practiles, fraud, guile, deceit, and fecret forlayings or ambushes, which seeme against our enemies nothing ill at all, nor unjuftly used, after they be once setled and have taken root in our hearts, remaine there fait, and hardly or unneth are removed; infomuch as if men take not heed how they use them against enemies, they shall be so inured to them, that they will be ready afterwards to practice the lame with their very friends. If therefore Pythagoras did well and wilely in acquainting his Scholars to forbeare cruelty and injuffice, even as farre as to dumbe and brute bealts; whereupon he misliked fowlers, and would request them to let those birds flie againe which they had caught; yea, and buy of fifthers whole drafts of fifthes, and give order unto his difciples to put them alive into the water againe, infomuch as he expressely forbad the killing of any tame beast whatfoever : certes it is much more grave and decent, that in quarrels, debates, and contentions among men; an enemy that is of a generous mind, just, true, and nothing treacherous, should represse, keepe down, and hold underfoot the wicked, malicious, cautelous, base, and ungentleman-like passions; to the end that afterwards in all contracts and dealings with his friend they breake not out, but that his heart being cleare of them, he may abitaine from all mischievous prachifes, Scaurus was a professed enemy, and an accuser of Domittus judicially; now there was a domelticall fervant belonging to the taid Domitius, who before the day of tryall and judgement, came unto Scaurm, faying, That he would discover unto him a thing that he knew not of, that which might ferve him ingood flead when he should plead against his master; but Scaurus would not so much as give him the hearing; nay, he laid hold on the party, and fent him away bound unto his Lord and Master. Caso (the younger) charged Massana, and indiced him in open Court for popularity and ambition, and declaring against him that he fought indirectly to gainethe peoples favour and their voices to be chosen Confull; now as he went up and downe to collect arguments and proofes thereof, and according to the manner and cultome of the Romans, was attended upon by certaine persons who sollowed him in the behalfe of the defendant, to observe what was done for his better inflruction in the processe and suit commenced; these sellowes would oftentimes be in hand with him and aske whether he would to day fearch for ought, or negotiate any thing in the matter and cause concerning Mirrara? If he faid, No; fuch credit and trust they reposed in the man that they would rest in that answer, and go their waies; a singular argument this was of all other to prove his reputation, and what opinion men conceived of him for his justice; but fure a farre greater testimony is this, and that passeth all the rest, to prove that if we be accustomed to deale justly by our very enemies, we shall never shew our selves unjust, cautelous, and deceitfull with our friends. But for almuch as every larke (as Simonides was wont to fay) must needs have a cop or crest growing upon her head; and so likewise all men by nature do carry in their head I wot not what jealousie, emulation, and envy, which is if I may use the words of Pin-

Of brain-fick fooles and persons vaine.

A man should not reape a small benefit and commodity by discharging these passions upon his enemies, to purge and cleanse himselfe quite thereof, and as it were by certaine gutters or channels, to derive and dreine them as far as possibly he can from his friends and familiar acquaintance; whereof I suppose Onomademus a great Politician, and wise States-man in the Isle Chios was well adviled, who in a civil differtion being fided to that faction which was superiour, and had gotten the head of the other; counselled the relt of his part not to chase and banish out of the City all their adversaries, but to leave some of them still behind : For feare (quoth he) lest having no enemies to quarrell withall, we our felves begin to fall out and go together by the eares; semblably if we spend these vicious passions of ours upon our enemies, the lessear they like to trouble and molest our friends: for it ought not thus to be as Hessodus saith, That the potter should envy the potter; or one Minstrell or Musician spite another; neither is it necessary that one neighbour should be in jealousse of another; or couzens and brethren be concurrents and have emulation one at another, either firiting to be rich or speeding better in their affaires: for if there beno other way or meanes to be delivered wholly from contentions, envies, jealousies, and emulations, acquaint thy felie at leastwife to be stung and bitten at the good successe of thine enemies; whet the edge and tharpen the point (as it were) of thy quarrellous and contentious humour, and turne it upon them and spare not: for like as the most ski full and best gardeners are of this opinion, that they shall have the sweeter roses and more pleasant violets, if they set garlick or sow onions neare unto them, forthat allthestrong and stinking savour in the juyce that seedeth and nourisheth the said slowers is purged away and goeth to the laid garlick and onions; even so an enemy drawing unto himielie and receiving all our envy and malice, will cause us to be better affected to our friends in their proferrity, and teffe offended if they out go us in their efface; and therefore in this regard we must contendand fitive with our enemies about honour, dignities, government, and lawful meanes of advancing our own effacts, and not only to be grieved and vexed to fee them have the better and the vantage of us, but allo to marke and observe every thing whereby they become our superiours, and so to straine and endeavour by carefull diligence, by labour and travell, by parsimony, temperance, and looking nearely to our felves, to surpasse and go beyond them; like as Them species was wont to fay : That the victory which Miltiades atchieved in the Plaine of Marathon brake his sleepe, and would not let him take his nights rest: for he who thinketh that his enemy surmounteth him in dignities, in pattonage of high matters and pleading of great causes, in management of flate affaires, or in credit and authority with mighty men and grand Stigniors, and inflead of fittiving to enterprife and do fome great matter by way of emulation, betaketh himfelfe to envy only, and fo first till doing nothing, and lofeth all his courage, furely he bewrayeth that he is poffelfed with naught else but an idle, vaine, and enervate kind of envy. But he that is not blinded with the regard and light of him whom he hateth, but with a right and just eye doth behold and consider all his life, his manners, designs, words, and deeds, shall soone perceive and find that the most part of those things which he envieth were archieved and gotten by such as have them, with their diligence, wildome, forecast, and vertuous deeds: he thereupon bending all his spirits and whole mind thereto, will exercise (I trow) and sharpen his own defire of honour, glory, and honesty, yea, and cut off contrariwile that yawning drowfinesse and idlessoath that is in his heart. Set case more over, that our enemies by flattery, by cautelous shifts and cunning practiles, by pleading of cases at the bar, or by their mercenary and illiberall service in unhonest and foule matters, seemeto have gotten some power, either with Princes in courts, or with the people in States and Cities; let the fame never trouble us, but contrariwise cheere up our hearts and make usglad in regard of our own liberty, the purenesse of our life and innocency unreproachable, which we may oppose against those indirect courses and unlawfull meanes. For all the gold that is either above ground or underneath (according as Plato laith) is not able to weigh against vertue, And evermore this sentence of Solon we ought to have in readinesse:

Many a wicked man is rich,
Andvertuous men are many poore:
But change we never will with fich
Nor give onr goodnesse for their store,
And why? vertue is distable,
Whereas their wealth is mutable.

Much leffe then, will we exchange the acclamations and shouts of a popular multitude in theaters, which are won with a feast; nor the honours and prerogatives to fit uppermost at a table neareun to the chamberlaines, minions, favorites, concubines, or lieutenant general of Kings and Princes. For nothing is desirable, nothing to be affected, nothing indeed honest that proceedeth from an unhonest cause: But he that loveth (according as Plaso saith) is alwaises blinded by the thing which is loved, and sooner do we perceive and marke any unseemely thing that our enemies do. Howbeit to conclude, neither our, joy and contentment conceived by observing them to do amisse, nor our griefe and displeasure in seeing them do well, ought to be idle and unprofitable unto us; but this reckoning and account we are to make of both; that in taking heed how we still into their saults, we may become better, and in imitating their good parts not worse than they.

How a man may perceive bis own proceeding and going forward in Vertue.

The Summary.

Hardly can it be defined, whether of these two extremities is more to be seared, to wit, blockish supidi-ty, or vaine presumption, considering the dangerous effects proceeding as well from the one as the other; And contravivoi feran excellent matter it is to be able for to teach menthe meanes to avoid both extreames, and to hold the meane between. And this is the very thing that our Author doth in this present Treatise for as he laboureth to difrobe, as it were, the lovers of vertue, and turne them out of their habit of perverse ignorance, wherewith most part of the world is alwaie; clid's fo he is desirous to keep them from putting on the habiliment and garments of pride and vaine oftentation, that they might be arrayed with the apparell of vertucin such fort, that in taking knowledge of that good whereof they have already some part, they might endeavour and do what they can to get a greater portion from day to day, untill they come unto at affered contentment wherein they may reft. Then teacheth he how to know what a man hath profited in the schoole and exercise of vertue, showing that he ought to consider sirst, whether he recule from wise by little and little; wherein he confuse th the opinion of the Stocks, who imagined that no man was good, unlesse he became vertuous all at once. This done, he adjoyneth four erules to know the said profit and progresse in vertue, to wit, When we perceive our heart to tend unto good without any intermission: When our affection redeemeth and regaineth the time that is loft, growing fo much the more as it was before staied and hindered: When we begin to take our whole pleasure and delight therein: Lastly, When we surmount nad overcome all impeachments that might turne us aside out of the way of vertue, After all this he entreth into the matter more specially, and sheweth how a man is to employ himselfe in the study of wildome; what vices he ought to flie; wherein his mind and firits should be occupied; and the profit that he iste reace and gather from Philosophers, Poets, and Historians. Item, with what affection we ought to feake in the presence of cur neighbours, whether it be publikely, or in private; of what fort our actions should be; and to what end and scope we are to addresse and direct them, giving a sustre unto all these discourses by excellent similitudes; taxing and reproving the faults committed ordinarily by them who make a certaine semblance and outward shew of aspiring unto vertue. Having thus discoursed of these points aforesaid he proposeth and setteth down againe diverse rules which may resolve us in this advancement and proceeding forward of our sin goodnesses, namely, That we ought to love reprehensions; to take heed even unto our dreames; to examine our passions, and so to hope well if we perceive that they waxe mild and gentle to imiate goodshings; in no wife to beare any speech of evill; to take example by the best persons, to rejoyce and be glad, to have witnesses and beholders of our goodwill and intention; and not to essence any sint or trespasses small but to avoid and shun them all: last of all, he closeth up his treatise with an elegant similitude, wherein he discovereth and layeth open the nature as well of the vicious as the vertuous, thereby to make the meanes of affiring and attaining unto vertue, so much the more amiable to each person.

How a man may perceive his own proceeding and going forward in Vertue.

T is not possible (my good friend Sossius Senecio) that a manby any meanes should have a fee-ling in himselse, and a conscience of his own amendment and progresse in vertue, if those good proceedings do not daily make fome diminution of his folly, but that the vice in him weighing in equall ballance against them all do hold him down

Like as the lead plucks down the net,

Which for to catch the fift was fer,
For so verily in the art of Musick or Grammar, a man shall never know how far he is proceeded, so long as in the studying and learning thereof, he diminish no part of his ignorance in those arts, but ftili findeth himselse as unmusicall and unlettered as he was before; neither the cure which the Physician employethabout his patient, if it workeno amendment at all, nor alleviation of the disease feeming in some sort to yeeld unto medicines and to flake, can procure any fensible difference and change unto a better state before that the contrary disposition and habit be restored perfectly to the former health, and the body made found and strong againe. But certainly, as in these cases there is no amendment to be accounted of, if those that seeme to amend do not perceive the change by the diminution and remission of that which weighed them down and find themselves to encline and bend (as it were) in a ballance to the contrary; even so it fareth with those that make profession of philosophilosophy: it cannot be granted that there is any progresse or sense at all of profiting, so long as the soile cast not off by little and little, and purge away herefolly, but untill such time as the can attaine (forfooth) unto the loveraign and period good, continueth in the meane while fully possessed of vice and fin in the highest degree; for by this meanes it would follow, if at one instant and moment of time a wife man should passe from extreame wickednesse unto the supreame and highest disposition of vertue: That he had all at once and in the minute of an houre fled vice and call it from him fully, whereof in a long time before he was not able to be rid of one little portion. But you know full well already, that those who hold such extravagant opinions as these, make themselves worke enough, and raile great doubts and questions about this point, namely, How a man should not perceive and feele himlelfe when he is become wife, and be either ignorant or doubtful that this growth and increase commeth in long processe of time by little and a little, partly by addition of something, and partly by inbitraction of other, untill one arrive gently unto vertue, before he can perceive that he is going toward it. Now if there were so quick and sudden a mutation, as that he who was to day morning most vicious, should become in the evening as vertuous; and if there ever were known to happen unto any man such a change that going to bed a very foole, and so sleeping should awake and rife a wife man, and taking his leave of yellerdaies follies, errours, and deceits, fay unto

My lying dreames fo vaine, cd 1y, ad 1y,

Note the worth you were, I now both Jee and fir.

Is it possible that such a one (I say) should be ignorant of this sudden change, and not perceive so great a difference in himselfe, nor scele how wisdome all at once hath thus lightened and illuminated his foule; For mire own part, I would rather thinke that one upon earnest prayer transformed by the power of the gods from a woman to a man (as the tale goes of Canans) should be ignorant of this Metamorpholis, than he who of a coward, a foole & a dissolute or loose person become hardy, wise, fober and temperate; or being transported from a fentuall and beattly life unto a divine and heavenly lie, should not mark the very instant wherein such a change did besall. But well it was said in old time: That the Hone is to be applyed and framed unto the rule, and not the rule or square unto the flone. And they (the Stoicks I meane) who are not willing to accommodate their opinions unto her things indeed, but wrett and force against the course of nature things unto their own conceits and supportions, have filled all philotophy with great difficulties and doubtful ambiguities; of which this is the greatest: Inthat they will seeme to comprise all men, excepting him only whom they imagine perfect under one and the same vice in generall: which strange supposition of theirs hath caused that this progress and proceeding to vertue scalled Tigoroun seemeth to be a darke and obscure riddle unto them, or a meer fiction little wanting of extreame folly; and those who by the means of this amendment be delivered from all passions and vices that be are held thereby to be in no better state, nor less wretched and miserable, than those who are not free from any one of the most enormious vices in the world; and yet they refute and condemne their own selves; for in the disputations which they hold in their schooles, they set the injustice of Aristides in equall ballance to that of Phalaris; they make the cowardise and feare of Brasides, all one with that of Dolon; yea, and compare the folly or erront of Melius and Pluotogether, as in no refpect different; howbeit, in the whole counce of their life, and management of their affaires, they decline and avoid those as implacable and intractable; but these they use and trust in their most important businesse, as persons of great worth and regard: but we who know and see that in every kind of sin or vice, but principally in the inordinate and confused state of the soule there be degrees according to more or lesse; and that herein differ our proceedings and amendments, according as reason by little and little doth illuminate, purge, and cleane the foule in abating and diminishing evermore the vitiosity thereof, which is the shadow that darknethit, are likewife fully periwaded that it is not without reason to be assured, that men may have an evident tense and perceivance of this mutation, but as if they were raised out of some deep and darke pit, that the same amendment may be reckoned by degrees in what older it goeth forward. In which computation we may go first and formost directly after this manner, and consider, whether like as they who under faile fet their course in the maine and vaste ocean, by observing together with the length and space of time, the force of the wind that driveth them, do cast and meafure how far they have gone forward in their voyage, namely, by a probable conjecture how much in such a time, and with such a gale of wind it is like that they may passe; so also inphilosophy a man may give a guesse and conjecture of his proceeding and going forward, namely, what he may gaine by continual marching on still, without stay or intermission otherwhiles in the midst of the way, and then beginning afterh again to leap forward, but alwaies keeping one pace gaining and getting ground fill by the guidance of reason. For this rule,

If little still to little those do add, A heape at length, and micklewell be had.

Was not given respectively to the encrease of sums of money alone, and in that point truly spoken, but it may likewise extent and feach to other things, and namely, to the augmentation of vertue, to wit, when with reason and doctrine continuall use and custome is joyned, which maketh mastery and is effectual to bring any worke to end and perfection; whereas these intermissions at times without order and equality, and these coole affections of those that stupy philosophy, make not only many states and lets in proceeding forward (as it were) in a journey, but that which is worfe cause going backward, by reason that vice which evermore lies in wait to set upon a man that idiely standeth still never so little haleth him a contrary way. True it is that the Mathematicians do call the Planets Stationarie, and fay they fland fill, while they ceale to move forward; but in our progresse and proceeding in Philosophy, that is to say, in the correction of our life and manners, there can be admitted no intervall, no pause or cessation, for that our wit naturally being in perpetuall motion in manner of a ballance, alwaies casteth with the least thing that is, one way or other, willing of it felfe either to encline with the better, or elfe is forcibly carried by the contrary to the worfe. If then according to the oracle delivered unto the inhabitants of Circha, which willed them if they minded afterwards to live in peace, they should make war both night and day without intermission; thou find in thy selfe and thine own conscience, that thou hast fought continually with vice as well by night as by day, or at least wife that thou hast not often left thy ward, and abandoned thy station in thegarrison, nor continually admitted the heralds or messengers between, comming from far (as it were) to parly and compound, to wit, pleasures, delights, negligences, and amulements upon other matters, by all likelihood thou maiest with confidence and alacrity be assured to go forward and make an end of thy courie behind.

Moreover, lay that there fall out some interruptions and staies between, that thou live not altogether canonically and like a philosopher; yet if thy latter proceedings be more constant than the former, and the fresh courses that thou takest longer than the other, it is no bad sign, but it testifieth, that by labour and exercise idlenesse is conquered, and stoath utterly chased away; whereas the contrary is a very ill fign, to wit, if by reason of many cessations, and those comming thick one after another, the heat of the former affection be cooled, languish, and weareth to nothing: for like as the shoot of a cane or reed, whiles it hath the full strength and greatest force, puttern forth the first stem reaching out in length, streight, even, smooth, and united in the beginning, admitting few knots in great distances between, to stay and put back the growth and rising thereof in height; but afterwards as if it were checked to mount up aloft by reason of short wind and failing of the breath, it is held down by many knots, and those neare one to another, as if the spirit therein which coveteth upward found some impeachment by the way, smiting it back, and causing it as it were to part and tremble; even so as many as at first tooke long couries and made hast unto Philosophy or amendment of lite, and then afterwards meet eftfoones with flumbling blocks, continually turning them out of the direct way, or other means to distract and pluck them aside, finding no proceeding at all to better them, in the end are weary, give over, and come short of their journeys end; whereas the other above faid hath his wings growing ftill to help his flight, and by reason of the fruit which he findeth in his course goeth on apace, cutteth off all pretences of excuse, breaketh through all lets, (which fland as a multitude in the way to hinder his passage) which he doth by fine force and with an industrious affection to attaine unto the end of his enterprise. And like as to joy and delight in beholding of beauty present is not a fign of love beginning, for a vulgar and common thing this is, but rather to be grieved and vexed when the same is gone or taken away; even so many there be who conceive pleasure in philosophy, and make femblance as if they had a fervent defire to the study thereof: but if it chance that they be a little retired from it by occasion of other businesse and affaires, that first affection which they tooke unto it vanishesh away, and they can well abide to be without Philosophy

But he who feeles indeed the prick Of love that pierceth neare the quick,

as one Poet faith; will seeme unto thee moderate and nothing hot in frequenting the philosophicall schoole and conferring together with thee about Philosophy; but let him be plucked fromit, and drawn apart from thee, thou shalt see him enslamed in the love thereof, impatient, and wear of all other affaires and occupations; thou shalt perceive him even to forget his own friends, such a passionate desire he will have to philosophy. For we ought not so much to delight in learning and philosophy whiles we are in place, as we do in sweet odours, persumes, and ointments, and when we are away and separated therefro never grieve thereat, nor seeke after it any more; but it must imprint in our hearts a certaine passion like to hunger and thirst when it is taken from us, if we will profit in good earnest and perceive our own progresse and amendment; whether it be that maniage, riches, some friendship, expedition or warfare come between, that may drive him away and make separation, for the greater that the sruit is which he gathered by Philosophy. so much the more will the griefe be to leave and forgo it. To this first signe of progresse in Philosophy may be added another of great antiquity out of Hefiodus; which if it be not the very same, certes it commeth neare unto it, and this he describeth after this sort, namely, When a man findeth the way no more difficult, rough and craggy, nor exceeding steep and upright, but ease, plaine, with a gentie descent, as being indeed laid even and smooth by exercise and wherein now there begins light clearely to appeare and shine out of darknesse, instead of doubts, ambiguities, errours, and those repentances and changes of mind incident unto those who first becake themselves to the study of Philosophy; after the manner of them who having left behind them a land which they know well enough, are troubled whiles they cannot descry and discover that for which they set faile and bend their course; for even so it is with these persons, who when they have abandoned these common and familiar studies whereof whereto they were innred before they came, to learne, apprehend, and enjoy better, oftentimes in the very middle of their course are carried round about, and driven to returne back againsthesame way they came. Like as it is reported of Sexins a nobleman of Rome, who having given over the honourable offices and magistracies in the City, for love of Philosophy, afterwards finding himselfe much troubled in that fludy, and not able at the beginning to brooke and digelt the reasons and discourses thereof, was so perplexed, that he went very neare to have thrown himselfeint othe lea out

The semblable example we read in histories, of Diogenes the Sinopian, when he first went to the fludy and profession of Philosophy: for when about the same time it chanced that the Athenians celebrated a publike folemnity with great feafting and sumptuous fare, with theatricall plaies and pastimes, meeting in companies and assemblies to make merry one with another with revels and dances all night long, himself in an odde corner of the market place lay lapped round in his cloaths, purposing to take a nap and sleep; where and when he sell into certaine santastical imaginations which did not a little turneand trouble his braines, yea, and breake his heart, discoursing thus in his head: That he upon no constraint or necessity, should thus wilfully betake himselfe to a laborious and strange courie of painfull life sitting thus by himselfe mopish, sequestred from all the world, and deprived of all earthly goods; In which thoughts and conceits of his, he elpied (as the report goeth) a little mouse creeping and running towards the crums that were fallen from his loase of bread, and was very bufie about them, whereupon he tooke heart againe, reproved and blamed his own feeble courage, faying thus to himselfe: What saiest thou Diogenes? Sect thou not this filly creature what good cheare it maketh with thy leavings? How merry she is whiles she seedeth thereupon? And thou (like a trim man indeed as thou art) dost waile, weepe, and lament, that thou drinkest not thy felf drunk as thosedo yonder; nor lie in fost and delicate beds richly set out with gay and costly surniture. Now when such temptations and distractions as these be, returns not often, but the rule and discourse of reason presently riseth up against them, maketh head, turneth upon them suddenly againe (as it were) in the chase, and pursued in the rout by enemies, and so quickly discomfitten and dispatcheth the anxiety and despaire of the mind, then a man may be affured that he hath profited indeed in the schoole of Philosophy, and is well setled and confirmed therein. But for a much as the occasions which do thus shake men that are given to Philosophy, yea, and otherwhiles plucke them a contrary way, do not only proceed from themselves by reason of their own infirmity and io gather strength; but the sad and serious counsels also of sriends, together with the reproofes and contradictory affaults made upon them by adversaries, between good earnest and game, do mollifie their tender hearts, and make them to bow, bend, and yeeld, which otherwhiles have been able in the end to drive some altogether from Philosophy, who were well entred therein: It may be thought no small signe of good proceeding, it one can endure the same meekely without being moved with such temptations, or any waies troubled and pinched when he shall heare the names and furnames of such and such companions and equals otherwise of his, who are come to great credit and wealth in Princes Courts; or be advanced by marriages, matching with wives who brought them good dowries and portions; or who are wont to go into the Common Hall of a City, attended upon and accompanied with a traine and troupe of the multitude, either to attaine unto some place of government, or to plead some notable cause of great consequence: for he that is not disquieted, astonied, or overcome with such assaults; certaine it is, and we may be bold to conclude that he is arrested (as it were) and held sure as he ought to be by Philosophy. For it is not possible for any to cease affecting and loving those things, which the multitude do to highly honour and adore, unlesse they be such as admire nothing else in the world but vertue. For to brave it out, to contell, and make head against men, is a thing incident unto some by occasion of choler, unto others by reason of folly; but to contemne and despise that which others esteeme with admiration, no man is able to performe, without a great measure of true and resolute magnanimity: In which respect such persons comparing their state with others magnific themselves, as Solon did in these words:

Many a wicked man is rich, And good men there be many poore: But we will not exchange with fich, Nor give our goodnesse for their store. For vertue age is durable, Whereas riches be mutable.

And Diogenes compared his peregrination and flitting from the City of Corinth to Athens, and againe his removing from hebes to Corinth, unto the progresses and changes of abode that the great King of Persia was wont to make; who in the Spring season held his Court at Susse; in Winter, kept house at Babylon; and during Summer, passed the time and sojourned in Media. Agesilans hearing upon a time the faid King of Perfix to be named, The Great King: And why (quoth he) is he greater than my felfe? Unleffe it be that he is more just and righteous. And Arostotle writing unto Antipater as touching Alexander the Great. faid, That it became not him only to vaunt much and glorifie himselfe for that his dominions were so great, but also any man else hath no lesse cause who is instructed in the true knowledge of the gods. And Zeno seeing Theophrastus in great admiration, because he had many scholars: Indeed (quoth he) his auditory or quire is greater than mine, 205 but mine accordeth better and makes sweeter harmony than his. When as therefore thou hast so grounded andestabilshed in thine heart that affection unto Vertue, which is able to encounter and stand against all externall things, when thou hast voided out of thy foule all envies, jealouses, and what affections loever are wont either to tickle or to fret, or otherwise to depresse and cast downe the minds of many that have begun to professe Philosophy; this may serve for a great argument and token that thou art well advanced forward, and hast profited much; neither is it a small figue thereof, if thou perceive thy language to be changed from that it was wont to be; for all those who are newly entred into the schoole of Philosophy (to speake generally) affect a kind of speech or file which aimeth at glory and vaine oftentation: some you shall heare crowing aloud like cocks, and mounting up aloft by reason of their levity and haughty humour, unto the sublimity and iplendor of physicall things or secrets in nature; others take pleasure (after the mannity and picture of physical and the state of warron whelps, as PLas faith) in tugging and tearing evermore whatfoever they can catch or light upon; they love to be doing with litigious quellions, they go directly to darke problemes and fophifical inbitities, and most of them being once plunged in the quillets and quiddities of Logick, make that (as it were) a meanes or preparative to flesh themselves for Sophifirs: Mary there be, who go all about collecting and gathering together lententious layings and hittories of ancient times; and as Anachas six wont to say: That he knew no other use that the Greeks had of their coyned peeces of money, but to tell and number them, or elie to cast account and re: kon therewith; even so do they nothing else but count and measure their notable sentenies and layings, without drawing any profit or commodity out of them: and the same befalleth unto them which one of Pluo's familiars applied unto his schollars by way of allusion to a speech of Amiphanes: this Aniphanes was wont to fay in merriment; There was a City in the world, whereas the words fo foone as ever they were out of his mouth, and pronounced, became frozen in the aire by reason of the coldnesse of the place, and so when the heat of Summer came to thaw and melt the same the inhabitants might heare the talke which had been uttered and delivered in Winter; even fo (quoth he) it is with many of those which come to heare Plato when they be young; for whatsoever he speaketh and readeth unto them, it is very long ere they understand the same, and hardly when they become old men; and even after the same fort it fareth with them above said, who fland thus affected universally unto Philosophy, untill their judgement being well fetled and grown to found refolution, begin to apprehend those things which may deeply imprint in the mind a morall affection and passion of love, yea, and to search and trace those speeches, whereof the tracts (as Alop was wont to ay) ead ratherin, than out. For like as Sophocles faid merrily upon a time, by w yof derifion: That he would first cut off the haughty and stately invention of Afchylus, and then abridge his affected, curious, and artificiall disposition, and in the third place change the manner and forme of his elocution, which is most excellent, and fullest of weet affections; even so, the fludents in Philosophy, when they shall perceive that they passes from orations exquisitely penned and framed for oftentation in frequent and folemne affemblies, unto morall speeches, and those that touch the quick, as well the mild and gentle motions, as the hot and violent passions of the mind, thes begin they indeed to lay downe all pride and vanity, and profit truly in the ichoole of Philo-

Confider then, not only in reading the works of Philosophers, or in hearing their lectures, first and formoft, whether thou art not more attentive to the words than to the matter; or whether thou be not carried with a greater affection to those who deliver a more subtill and curious composition of fentences, than tuch as comprise profitable, commodious, substantial and fleshy matters (if I may so fay) but also in perusing Poems, or taking in hand any history, observe well and take heed, that there elcape thee not any one good fentence rending properly to the reformation of manners or the alleviation of passions: for like as (according to Simonides) the Bee letleth upon flowers for to such out of it the yellow honey, whereas others love only their colour or pleasant sent, and neither care nor seeke for any thing else thereout; even so, when other men be conversant in Poems for pleasure only and passime, thou sinding and gathering somewhat out thereof worth the noting, shall seeme at the first fight to have some knowledge already thereof by a certaine custome and acquaintance with it, and alove taken unto it as a good thing and familiar unto thee. As for those that read the books of Plate and Xonophan, in no other regard but for the beauty of their gallant stile, teeking for nought else but for the purity of speech, and the very natural! Atticke language, as if they went to gather the thin dew or tender mosse or downe of herbs; What will you say of such? But that they love phylick drugs, which have either a lovely colour, or a pleafant imell only; but otherwise the medicinable vertues thereof and properties either to purge the body or mitigate any paine, they neither defre to know nor are willing to use.

Moreover, such as are proceeded further, yet profited more, have the skill and knowledge how to reape fruit not only out of words spoken or books written but also to receive profit out of all fights, spectacles, and whatsoever things they see, gathering from thence whatsoever is fit and commodious for their purpo'e; as it is reported of Afchylus and other fuch as he: For Afchylus being upon2 time at the Ithmian games, beheld the fight of the fword-fencers that fought at sharpe, and when one of the laid champions had received a grievous wound, whereupon the whole theater fet up a cry, he jogging one that was by him (named Iohn of Chios) See you not (quoth he) what use and exer ise is able to do? The party himselfe that is hurt saith never a word, but the lookers on cry out,

Brifides chanced among drie figs to light upon a filly monse that bithim by the finger, and when he had shaken her off and let her go, saidthus to himself: See how there is nothing so little and so feeble, but it is able to make shift and save its life is it dare only defend it self. Diagenes when he saw one make means to drink out of the bail of his hand, calt away the dish or cup that he carried in his budget, Lo, how attentive taking heed and continual exercise makethmen ready & apt to mark, objetve and learnfrom all things that make any way for their good. And this they may the rather do when they joyn words and deeds together, not onely in that fort (as Thursdides speaketh of)by meditating, and exercising themselves with the experience of present perils, but also against pleasures, quarrels, and altereations in judgements about defences of causes and magistracies; as making proof thereby of the opinions that they hold, or rather by carriage of themselves, teaching others what opinons they are to hold. For such as yet be learners, and not with sarding that, intermeddle in affairs like pragmatical persons spying how they may catch any thing out of Philosophie, and go therewith incontinently in manner of juglers with their boxe, either into the common place and market, or into the school which young men frequent, or elle to Princes tables, there to let them abroads we are not to think them Philosophers; no more than those to be Physicians, who onely fell medicinable spices, drugs or compound confections; or to speak more properly, such a sophister or counter eit philosopher as this resembleth the bird that Homer describeth, which forefooth, fo foon as he hath gotten any thing, carrieth it to his Scholars (as the faid bird doth in her mouth convey meat to her naked young ones that cannot flic,)

And so him felf he doth beguile

And thereby take much have the while.

And thereby take much have the while.

Converting and distributing naught of allthat which he hash gotten to his own nourithment, nor so converting and distributing naught of allthat which he hash gotten to his own nourithment, nor so much as concocking and digetting the same: and therefore we ought of necessity to regard and confider well whether we use any discourse and place our words so, that for our selves they may do good ; and in regard of others, make no shew of vain-glory nor ambitious desire to be known abroad, but onely of an intention rather to hear, or elie to teach. But principally we are to observe whether our wrangling humour and desire to be cavilling about questions disputable, be allayed in us or no, as also whether we have yet given over to devife reasons and arguments to assail others; like aschampions armed like hurlebats of tough leather about their arms and bals in their hands, to annoy their concurrents, taking more pleasure and delight to fell and aftonish with one rap our advertary, and so to lay him along on the earth, than to learn or teach him: for furely, modelty, mildnesse and courtesse in this kind will do well; and when a man is not willing to enter into any conference or disputation, with a purpose to put down and vanquish another, nor to break out into fits of choler, nor having evicted his adversary to be ready as they say to tread and trample him under foot, nor to seem displeased and discontent if himself have the foil and be put to the worlt, be all good fignes of one that hath with iently profited. And this shewed Aristippus very well upon a time when he was so hardly pressed and overlaid into a certain disputation, that he knew not what answer to make presently unto his adversary, a jolly bold and audacious sophister, but otherwite a brain-sick fool and without all judgement: for Ariflippus feeing him to vaunt himself puffed up with vain glory, that he had put him to a now plus: Wel (quoth he) Lee that for this time I go away with the worle, but furely when I am gone I will fleep more foundly and quietly than you that have gotten the better. Moreover we may also prove and found our felves, whether we have profited or no, even whiles we speak in publick place; namely, if neither upon the fight of a greater audience than welooked for, we shrink not for fear and false heart, norcontrariwise be discouraged to see sewer come to hear our exercises than we hoped for ne yet when we are to make a speech to the people, or before a great magistrate. we leefe the opportunity thereof, for that we have not well premeditated thereof before, 'nor come provided of apr words to declare our mind a thing that by report befellunto Demosthines and Alcibiades: or Alcibiades as he was passing ingenious and inventive of matter, so he wanted audacity, and was not so ready as some other to utter the same, but troubled estioons in his pleading and delivery of it, insomuch as many times in the very mids of his oration he would be out and to leek for a proper and fitterm to expresse the conception of hismind, or else to recover that word again which was slipt and escaped out of his memory. As for Homer, he had such an opinion of his own perfection, and his poeticall vein in the rest of all his work, that he fluck not to set down the very first verse of his poeme defective in measure, and not answerable to the rules of verfifying. So much the rather therefore likely it is, that they who fet nothing before their eyes, nor aim at oughr eliebut vertue onely and honefly will make use of the present occasion and the occurrence of affaires fall out as they will, without regard of applaule, hiffing or any other noise whatloever in token of liking or disliking their

Now everyman ought to confider not onely his own speeches, but also his actions, namely, whether they carry with them more profit and found truth, than vain pomp and oftentation for if the true love indeed of yong folk, man or woman, requireth no witnesses, but resterh in the private contentment and enjoying of the sweet delights, although the same were performed and their desires fully accomplished secretly between them without the privity of any person; how much more credible is it, that that he who is enamoured of honesty and wisedome, using the company and fellowship familiarly of vertue by his actions, & enjoying the same, shal find in himself without saying one word an exceeding great contentment, and demand no other hearers or beholders but his own conflience ? For like as he was but a vainfool who called unto his maid in the house and cryed with a loud voyce; Dionysia, come and see I am not proud and vain-glorious now as I was wont to be; even so he that hat hat hath done some vertuous and commendable act, and then goes forth to tell it abroad & spread the fruit thereof in every place, certain it is that such an one regards stil outward vanities, and is carried with a covetous defire of vain-glory, neither hath he ever had as yet a true fight indeed and perfect vision of vertue, but onely a fantalticall dream of her, imagining as he lies afleep, that he feeth some wandring shadow and image thereof, and then afterward representeth thus unto his view that which he hath done, as a painted Table to look upon. Well then, it is the property of him that proceedeth in vertue, not onely when he hath bestowed some thing upon his friend, or done a good turn unto one of his familiars, for to make no words thereof; but also when he hath given his voyce justly, or delivered his opinion truly, among many others that are unjust and untrue; or when he hath flatly denyed the unhonest request, or stoutly crossed a bad motion of some rich Man, great Lord or mighty Magistrate; or resuled gits and bribes; or proceeded so farre that being athirst in the night he hath not drunk at all; or hath resuled to kiffe a beautiful boy or fair maiden, and turned away from them coming toward him as Agefilaus did to keep all this to himself and say nothing: For such a one as is content to be proved and tryed by his own self, not setting light by that triall and judgem ent, but joying and taking delight in his confcience, as being a inficient witness and beholder, both of good things and commendable actions, sheweth that reafon hath turned in, to lodge and keep resiance with him, that it hath taken deep root there: and as Democritus faith: That he is well framed, and by custome brought to rejoyce and take pleasure in himself. And like as Husbandmen are more glad and willing to see the ears of corn hang down their heads, and bend toward the earth, than those who for their lightness stand straight, upright and staring alost, for that they suppose such ears are empty, or have little or nothing in them, for all their fair shew; even to, among young men, students in Philosophie, they that have least in them of any weight & be most void, be those that are at the very first most confident, set the greatest countenance, carry the biggelt port in their gate, and have the boldest face, shewing therein how full they are of pride in themselves, contempt of all others, and sparing of none: but afterwards as they begin to grow on and burnish, furnishing and filling themselves with the fruits indeed of reason and learningithen and never before they lay away thefe proud looks; then down goes this vain pride and outward oftentation. And like as we see in vessels, whereinto men use to powr in liquor, according to the quantity & measure of the faid riquor that goeth in the air which was there before flieth out; even so to the proportion of those good things which are certain and true indeed, wherewith men are replenished, their vanity giveth place, all their hypocrifie vanisheth away their swelling and pusfing pride doth abate and fall, and giving over then to fland upon their goodly long beards and fide robes, they transferre the exercise of outward things into the mind and foul within, using the sharp bit of bitter reprehension principally against themselves. And as for others, they can finde in their hearts to devile, conferre, and talk with them more graciously and with greater courtesies the manner of Philosophie, and reputation of Philosopers, they do not usurp nor take upon them, neither do they use it as their addition in sormer time; and if haply one of them by some other be called by that name, he will not answer to it; but if he be a young gentleman indeed, after a smiling and pleasant manner, yea, and blushing withall for shame, he will say thus out of the Poet Ho-

I am no God nor heavenly wight: Why doft thou give to me their right? For true it is as Æschylus faith:

A dam' fell young if the have known And tasted man once carnally ; Her eye doth it bewray anon, It sparkles fire suspiciously.

But a young man having truly tafted the profit and proceeding in Phiolophie, hath thele fignes following him, which the Poetreffe Sappho fetteth down in these verses:

When Iyou fee, what do I al? First suddenly my voice doth fail, And then like fire a colour red, Under my skin doth run and spread.

It would do you good to view his fetled and flayed countenance, to behold the pleafant and fweet regard of his eye, and to hear him when he speaketh : for like as those who are professed in any confraternity of holy mysteryes, at their first assembly and meeting together, hurry in tumultuous fort with great noise, infomuch as they thrust and throng one another; but when they come to celebrate the divine fervice thereto belonging, and that the facred reliques and ornaments are once shewed, they are very attentive with reverent fear and devout filence; fo, at the beginning of the fludy of Philotophie and in the very entry (as it were) of the gate that leadeth unto it, a man shall see much ado a foul stirre great audaciouiness, insolency, and jangling words more than enough for that some there be, who would intrude themselves rudely, and thrust into the place violently, for the greedy desire they have to winner eputation and credit but he that is once within and seeth the great light, as if the fanctuaries and facred cabinets or tabernacles were let open, anon he putteth on another habit, and a divers countenance with filence and aftonishment, he becometh humble, pliable and modelt, ready to follow the discourse of reason and doctrine, no lesse than the direction of some god. To fuch as these, me thinks, I may do very well to accommodate that speech which Menedemus fomtime in mirth ipake pleafantly: Many there be that fail to Athens (quoth he) for to go to fchool there, who when they come first thicher feeth * Sophi, that is be wile, and afterwards prove "Philipsphi, that is lovers of wifedones then of Philosophers they become *Sophisters, that is Professiond * 41/050-Readers, untillin processe of time they grow to be * Idiots, that is to lay, ignorant and fools to see go. to: for the neerer that they approch to the use of reason and to learning indeed, the more do they * Ebassas. abridge the opinion that they have of themselves, and lay down their presumption. Among those * Istoral. that have need of physick, some that are troubled with the tooth-ach, or have a telon or whitelaw on their finger, go themselves to the Physician for to have remedy; others who are sick of an ague lend for the Phylician home to their houses, and desire to be eased and cured by him; but those that are fallen either into a fit of melancholy, or phrenie, or otherwise be distracted in their brains and out of their right wits, otherwhiles will not admit or receive the Physicians, although they came of themselves uncalled; but either drive them out of doors, or elle hide themselves out of their fight, and so farregonethey be and dangerously sick, that they seel not their own swisnesse; semblably of those who sinne and do amisse, such be incorrigible and uncurable, who are grievously offended and angry, yea, and immortall hatred with those who seem to admonish and reprove them for their mis-behaviour; but such as will abide them, and are content to receive and entertain them; be in better state and in a readier way to recover their health: mary he that yeeldeth himlelf to fuch as rebukehim, confelling unto them his errors, discovering of his own accord his poverty and nakednesse, unwilling that any thing as touching his state should be hidden, not loving to be unknown and secret, but acknowledging and avowing all that he is charged with, yea, and who prayeth a manto check, to reprove, to touch him to the quick; and fo crave in for help; certainly herein he sheweth no small sign of good progresse and amendment is according to that which Diogenes was wont to fay: He that would be faved (that is to fay) become an honest man, had need to seek either a good friend or a sharp and bitter enemy, to the end that either by gentle reproof and admonition, or elle by a rigorous cure of correction; he may be delivered from his vices. But how much soever a man in a glorious bravery sheweth to those that be abroad either a foul and thred-barecoat or a fleined garment, or a rent shoo , on in a kind of prefumptuous humility mocketh himself, in that peradventure he is of a very low stature, crooked or bunch-backed and thinketh herein that he doth a worthy and doughty deed but in the mean while covereth and hideth the ordures and filthinesse of his vile life, cloaketh, the villanous enormities of his manners, his envy, maliciousnesse, avarice, sensuall voluptuousnesse, as if they were beastly botches or ugly illcers, suffering no body to touch them, nay, nor so much as to see them, and all for fear of reproof and rebuke, certes, such a one bath profited but a little, or to speak more truly, never a whit at all, but he that is ready to encounter and fet upon these vices, and either is willing and able (which is the chief and principall) to chaftife and condemn, yea, and put himself to forrow for his faults; or if not fo, yet in the fecond place at the least can endure patiently, that another man by his reprehensions and remonstrances should cleanse and purge himscertes evident it is that such an one hateth and detelleth wickedness indeed, and is in the right way to shake it off and verily, we ought to avoyd the very name and appearance onely thereof, and to be ashamed for to be thought and reputed wicked; but he that grieveth more at the substance of vice it self, than the infamy that cometh thereof, will never be afraid, but can very well abide both to speak hardly of himself, and to hear ill by others, so he may be the better thereby. To this purpose may very well be applyed a pretty speech of Diogenes unto a certain yonker, who perceiving that Diogenes had an eye on him within a Tayern or Tipling-house, withdrew himself quickly more inward, for to be out of his fight: Never do fo (quoth he) for the farther thou fliest backward the more shalt thou be still in the Tavernieven to a man may say of those that be given to vice for the more that any of them feemeth to deny his fault, the farther is he engaged, and the deeper funk in fin; like as poor men, the greater shew that they make of riches, the poorer they be, by reason of their vanity & bragging of that which they have not. But he that profiteth indeed, hath for a goodprefident & example, to follow that famous Physician Hippocrates, who both openly contessed and also put down in writing, that he was ignorant in the Anatomie of a mans head, and namely, as touching the seames or futures thereof; and this account will he make, that it were an unworthy indignity: if (when such a man as Hippocrates thought not much to publish his own error and ignorance, for fear that others might fall into the like) he who is willing to fave himself from perdition, cannot endure to be reproved, nor acknowledge his own ignorance and folly. As for those rules and precepts which are delivered by Pyrrho and Bion in this case are not in my conceit the signes of amendment and progresse so much, as of some other more perfect and absolute habit rather of the mind; for Bion willed and required his scholars and familiars that conversed with him, to think then (and never before) that they had proceeded and profited in Philosophie, when they could with as good a will abide to hear men revile and rail at them, as if they spake unto them in this man-

Of Proceeding in Vertue.

Good fir, you feem no perfon lend, nor foolish fot, iwis : All hail, Fair chieve you and adien, God send you alwayes bliss.

And Pyrrho (as it is reported) being upon a time at Sea, and in danger to be cast away in a tempest. shewed unto the rest of his fellow passengers a porket feeding hard upon barley cast before him on Ship-boord Lo, my mafters (quoth he) we ought by reason and exercise in Philosophie, to frame our selves to this passe, and to attain unto such an impassibility, as to be moved and troubled with the accidents of fortune no more than this pig. But consider furthermore, what was the conceit and opinion of Zeno in this point for he was of mind that every man might and ought to know whether he profited or no in the School of vertue, even by his very dreams; namely, if he took no pleasure to see in his sleep any filthy or dishonest thing, nor delighted to imagine that he either intended, did or approved any lewd, unjust or outragious action:but rather did behold (as in a fetled calm, without wind, weather and wave; in the clear bottom of the water) both the imaginative and also the passive faculty of the foul, wholly overspread bottom of the water) both the imaginative and also the passive faculty of the foul, wholly overspread between the contract of the water) both the imaginative and also the passive faculty of the foul, wholly overspread between the contract of the water) between the contract of the water water and water wat and lightened with the bright beams of reason: which Plate before him (as it should seem) knowing well enough, hath prengured and represented unto us, what fantasticall motions they be that proceed in fleep from the imaginative and fenfuall part of the foul given by nature to tyrannize and overrule the guidance of reason; namely, if a man dream that he seeketh to have carnall company with his own mother, or that he hath a great mind and appetite to eat all strange, unlawful and forbidden meats; as it then the faid Tyrant gave himself wholy to all those sensualities and concupiscences, as being let loose at such a time, which by day the law either by sear or shame doth represse and keep down. Like as therefore beafts which serve for draught or saddle, if they be well taught and trained albeit their Governors and Rulers let the Reins loote and give them the head, fling not out nor go afide from the right way, but either draw or make pace forward fill, and as they were wont ordinarily keep the same train and hold on in one course and order, even so they whose sensual part of the foul is made trainable and obedient, tame, and well-schooled by the discipline of reason, will neither in dreams nor ficknesses eafily suffer the lusts and concupifcences of the sless, to rage or break out unto any enormities punishable by law; but will observe and keep still in memorie that good discipline and custome which doth ingenerate a certein power and efficacy unto diligence, whereby they shalland will take heed unto themselves; for if the mind hath been used by exercile to refilt passions and temptations, to hold the body and all the members thereof as it were with bit and bridle under subjection, in such fort that it hath at command the eyes, not to shed tears for pitty; the heart likewise not to leap and pant in fear; the naturall parts not to rife nor stirre but to be fill and quiet without any trouble at all, upon the fight of any fair and beautiful perion, man or womans how can it otherwise be but that there should be more likelihood that exercise having seized upon the sensual part of the soul and tamed it, should polish, lay even, reform, and bring unto good order all the imaginations and motions thereof, even as farre as to the very dreams and fantafies in fleep: as it is reported of Srilps the Philosopher, who dreamed that he law Neptane exposulating with him in anger, because he had not killed a beer to facrifice unto him as the manner was of other priests to do, and that himself nothing astonyed or dismay'd at the said vision should answer thus again: What is that thou failt O Nepeune? comest thou to complain indeed like a child (who pules and cries for not having a piece big enough) that I take not up some money at interest, and put my felfin debt, to fill the whole City with the fent and favor of roll and burnt, but have facrificed unto thee such as I had at home according to my ability and in a mean? wherereupon Neptune (as he thought) should merrily imile and reach forthunto him his right hand, promiting that for his lake and for the love of him he would that yeer fend the Megarians great store of rain and good soilon of fea-loaches or filhes called Aphya by that means coming unto them by whole failles. Such then,, as while they lie afleep have no illusions arising in their brains to trouble them, but those dreams orvitions onely as be joious, pleasant, plain and evident, not painfull, nor terrible, nothing rough, maligne, tortious and crooked; may boldly fay that their fantafies and apparitions be no other then the reflexions and rayes of that light which rebound from the good proceedings in Philosophie; whereas contrariwise the furious pricks of lust, timorous frights, unmanly and base flights, childish and excessive joyes, dolorous forrowes, and dolefull mones by reason of some piteous illusions, strange and absurd visions appearing in dreams, may be well compared unto the broken waves and billowes of the Sea beating upon the rocks and craggy banks of the shore; for that the foul having not as yet that setled perfection in it self which should keep it in good order, but holdeth on a course still according to goodlawes onely and sage opinions, from which when it is farthest sequestred and most remote, to wit, in sleep, it suffereth it sell to return again to the old wont and to be let loofe and abandoned to her passions: But whether these things may be ascribed unto that profit and amendement whereof we treat, or rather to some other habitude, having now gathered more frength and firm constancy, not subject by means of reasons and good inflruction to shaking,I leave that to your own consideration and mine together.

But now for a funch as this totall impassibility (if I may to speak) of the mind, to wit, a state so perfeet that it is void of all affections, is a great & divine thing: & feeing that this profit and proceeding whereof we write consistent in a kind of remission and mildnesse of the said passions, we ought both to consider each of them apart, and also compare them one with another, thereby to examine and judge the difference: conferre we shall every passion by it selfe, by observing whether our lusts and defires bemore calme and leffe violent than in former time, by marking likewise our fits of seare and anger, whether they be now abated in comparison of those before, or whether when they be up and enflamed, we can quickly with the help of reason remove or quench that which was wont to fer them on worke or a fire: compare we shall them together, in case we examine our selves whether we have now a greater portion of grace and shame in us than of seare; whether we find in our felves emulation and not envy; whether we cover honour rather than worldly goods; and In one word, whether after the manner of musicians we offend rather in the extremity and excelle of harmony called Dorins, which is grave, folemne, and devout, than the Lydian, which is light and galliard-like, that is to say, inclining rather in the whole manner of our life to hardnesse and severity, than to effeminate fortnesse; whether in the enterprise of any actions we shew timidity and flackness, rather than temerity and rashnesse, and last of all, whether we offend rather in admiring too highly the fayings of men and the persons themselves, than in despising and debasing them too low: for like as we say in physick, it is a good signe of health when diseases are not diverted and translated into the noblemembers and principall parts of the body; even so it seemeth that when the vices of fuch as are in the way of reformation and amendment of life change into passions that are more mild and moderate, it is a good beginning of ridding them away cleane by little and

The Lacedamonian Ephori, which were the high controllers of that whole State, demanded of the Musician Phrynis, when he had let up two strings more to his seven stringed-instrument, whether he would have them to cut in funder the trebbles of the bases, the highest or the lowest? but as for us, we had need to have our affections cut both above and beneath, if we defire to reduce our actions to a meane and mediocrity. And lurely this progresse or proceeding of ours to perfection, profesfeth rather to let down the lightest first, to cut off the extremity of passions in excesse, and to abate the acrimony of affections before we do any thing elfe, in which as faith Sophocles:

Folke foolish and incontinent, Most furious be and violent.

As for this one point, namely, that we ought to transfer our judgement to action, and not to suffer our words to remaine bare and naked words fill in the aire, but reduce them to effect, we have already faid, that is the chiefe property belonging to our progresse and going forward: now the principal arguments and signes thereof be these; if we have a zeale and servent affection to imitate those things which we praise; if we be forward and ready to execute that which we so much admire, and contrariwise will not admit nor abide to heare of such things as we in our opinion dispraise and condemne. Probable it is and standeth with great likelihood that the Athenians all in generall praised and highly efteemed the valour and prowesse of Miltiades; but when Themistocles said; that the victory and Trophee of Miliades would not give him leave to sleep, but awakened him in the night, plaine it is and evident, that he not only praised and admired, but had a desire also to imitate him, and do as much himselfe; femblably, we are to make this reckoning, that our progresse and proceeding in vertue is but small, when it reacheth no farther than to praise only, and have in admiration that which good men have worthily done, without any motion and inclination of our will to imitate the same and effect the like. For neither is the carnall love of the body effectuall, unlesse some little jealousse be mixed withall, nor the praise of vertue servent and active, which doth not touch the quick, and prick the heart with an ardent zeale instead of envy, untogood and commendable things, and the same desirous to performe and accomplish the same fully. For it is not sufficient that the heart should be turned upside down only as Alcibiades was wont to say by the words and precepts of the Philosopher reading out of his chaire, even untill the teares gush out of the eyes: but he that truly doth profit and go forward, ought by comparing himselfe with the works and actions of good men, and those that be perfectly vertuous, to teele with all in his own heart, as well a displeasure with himselse, and a griese in conscience for that wherein he is short and defective, as also a joy and contentment in his spirit upon a hope and defire to be equall unto them, as being full of an affection and motion that never refleth and lieth still, but refembleth for all the world (according to the similitude of Simonides:)

The sucking foale that keeps just pace,

Affecting and defiring nothing more than to be wholly united and concorporate with a good man, by imitation. For furely this is the passion peculiar and proper unto him that truly taketh profit by the fludy of Philosophy; To love and cherish tenderly the disposition and conditions of him whose deeds he doth imitate and desire to expresse, with a certaine good will to render alwaies in words, due honour unto them for their vertue, and affay how how to fashion and conforme himfelie like unto them. But in whomsoever there is instilled or insused (I wot not what) contentious humour, envy, and contestation against such as be his betters, let him know that all this proceedeth from an heart exulcerated with jealousie for some authority, might, and reputation, and not upon any love, honour, or admiration of their vertues. Now, when as we begin to love good men in such fort, that (as Place faith) we esteem not only the man himself happy who is temperate; or those blesfed who be the ordinary hearers of such excellent discourses which daily come out of his mouth; but also that we do affect and admire his countenance, his port, his gate, the cast and regard of his eye, histmile and manner of laughter, infomuch as we are willing, as one would fay, to be joyned. fodered, and glued unto him; then we may be affored certainly that we profit in vertue; yea, and to much the rather, if we have in admiration good and vertious men, not only in their prosperity, but alio (like as amorous folke are well enough pleased with the liping or stammering tongue; yea, and do like the pale colour of these whom for the flower of their youth and beauty they love and think it beseemeth them, as we read of Lady Panthea, who by her teares and sad silence, all heavy, afflicted and blubbered as she was, for the dolor and forrow that she tooke for the death of her husband, leized Arafter loas he he was enamoured upon her) in their advertity, fo as we never flare back for feare, nor dread the banishment of Aristides, the imprisonment of Anax agor as, the poverty of Socrates, or the condemnation of Phocion, but repute their vertue, defirable, lovely, and amiable even with all their calamities, and run directly toward her for to kiffe and embrace her by our imitation, having alwaies in our mouth at every one of these crosse accidents this notable speech of Euripides:

Oh how each thing doth well become, Such generous hearts both all and some!

For we are never to feare or doubt that any good or honest thing shall ever be able to avert from vertue this heavenly inspiration and divine instinct of affection, which not only is not grieved and troubled at those things which seeme unto men most full of misery and calamity, but also admireth and defireth to imitate them. Hereupon also it followeth by good consequence, that they who have once received so deep an impression in their hearts, take this course with themselves: That when they begin any enterprise, or enter into the administration of government, or when any similar accident is presented unto them, they set before their eyes the examples of those who either presently are, or heretofore have been, worthy perions, discoursing in this manner: What is it that Plate would have done in this case? What would have Epaminondas said to this? How would Lyongus or Agefilaus have behaved themselves herein? After this fort (I say) will they labour to frame, compole, reforme, and adorne their manners, as it were, before a mirrour or looking-glasse, to wit, in policy retorning and unicenelly freech that they have let fall, or reprefing any patient that hat rice in them. They that have learned the names of the demi-gods called Idea Dastyli, know how to me them as counter-charmes, or preservatives against sudden frights, pronouncing the same one after another readily and ceremoniously; but the remembrance and thinking upon great and worthy men reprefented juddenly unto those who are in the way of perfection, and taking hold of them in all passions and complexions which shall encounter them, holdern them up and keepeth them up right, that they cannot fall; and therefore this also may go for one argument and token of proceeding in

Over and besides, not to be so much troubled with any occurrent, nor to blush exceedingly for shame as before-time, nor to seeke to hideor otherwise to alter our countenance or anything else about us, upon the fudden comming in place of a great or fage personage unexpected, but to per-fift resolute, to go directly toward him with bare and open sace, are tokens that a man seeleth his conficience fetled and affured. Thus Alexander the Great feeing a meffenger running toward him apace with a pleafant and imiling countenance, and stretching forth his hand afar off to him: How now good tellow (quoth he) what good news canst thou bring memore, unlesse it be tidings that Homer is rilen againe? Esteeming in truth that his worthy acts and noble deeds already archieved wanted nothing elfe, nor could be made greater than they were, but only by being confectated unto immortality by the writings of some noble spirit; even so a young man that groweth better and hetter every day, and hath reformed his manners, loving nothing more than to make himselfe known what he is unto men of worth and honour: to shew unto them his whole house and the order thereof, histable, his wife and children, his studies and intents; to acquaint them with his sayings and writings; infomuch as otherwhiles he is grieved in his heart to thinke and remember, either that his father naturall that begat him, or his master that taught him, are departed out of this life, for that they be not alive to see in what good estate he is in and to joy thereat; neither would he wish or pray to the gods for any thing so much as that they might revive and come againe above ground, for to be speckatours and eye-witnesses of his life and all his actions. Contrariwise, those that have neglected themselves and not endeavoured to do well, but are corrupt in their manners, cannot without seare and trembling abide to see those that belong unto them, no not so much as to dreame of them. Adde moreover if you please, unto that which hath been already said, thus much also for a good roken of progresse in vertue: When a man thinketh no sin or trespasse small, but is very carefull and wary to avoid and shun them all. For like as they who despaire ever to be rich, make no account at all of faving a little expense; for thus they think; That the sparing of a small matter can adde no great thing unto their flock to heap it up; but contrariwife hope when a man fees that he wanteth but a little of the marke which he shooteth at, causeth that the nearer he commeth thereto, his coveroninesse is the more seven so it is in those matters that pertaine to vertue: he who giveth not place much, nor procedeth to these speeches: Well, and what shall we have after this? Be it so now: It will be better again for it another time, and fuch like : but alwaies taketh heed to himselse in every thing; and whenfoever vice infinuating it selfe into the least fin and fault that is, seemeth to pretend and suggest some colourable excuses for to crave pardon, is much discontented and displeased; he (Isay) giveth hereby good evidence and proofe that he hath a house within cleane and near, and that he would not endure the leaft impurity and ordure in the world to defile the same: For (as Æschlus faith) an opinion conceived once, that nothing that we have is great and to be esteemed and reckoned of, cauleth us to be carelesse and negligent in small matters. They that make a pallifado, a rampier, or rough mud wall, care not much to put into their work any wood that commeth nexthand neither is it greatly material to take thereto any rubbish or stone that they can meet with, next and ment into their eye, yea, and if it were a pillar fallen from a monument or fepulchre; femblably do wicked and leud folke, who gather, thrumble, and heape up together all forts of gaine, all actions that be in their way, it makes no matter what; but such as profit in vertue, who are already planted, and whose golden soundation of a good life is laid (as it were) for some sacred temple or royall palace, will not take hand over head, any stuffe to build thereupon, neither will they worke by aime, but every thing shall be couched, laied, and ranged by line and levell, that is to say, by the square and rule of reason: which is the cause (as we thinke) that Polycletus the famous imager was wont to fay: That the hardest peece of all the worke remained then to do, when the clay and the naile met together ; fignifying thus much ! That the chiefe point of cunning and perfection was in the up-shot and end of all,

Of Superstition.

The Summary.

I Thould feeme that Plutatch composed this book in mockery and deristin of the Jews whom he toucheth and gradeth at in one place, and whose religion he mingleth with the superstition of Pagans; to as much purpose (I wis) as that which he delivereth in a discourse at the table, where he compareth the feast of the Tabernacles ordained by the eternall and almighty God, with the Bacchanales and fuch stinking ordures of idolaters; thinking verily that Bacchus was the god of the Jews. This slander of his and false calumniation ought to be imputed unto that ignorance of the true God, wherein Plutarch did remaine inwrapped: yes is not he the man alone who hath derided and flouted the religion of the Jews: but such scoffes and deressons of the sages and wese men of this world especially and above all when they are addressed against Gods fall upon the head of the authors and devilers thereof, to their inter confusion. Moreover as touching this point what some have thought this present discourse wherein he endeavoureth and laboureth to prove superstition to be more perilous than Atheisme is dangerous to be road, and containeth false doctrine; for that superstition of the twaine is not so bad; I say that in regard of the foolish devotion of Plutarch, and such as himselfe, which in no wise deserves to the name of religion, but is indeed a derission and profanation of true pery and godlinesse, it were not amisses assume that superstition is more wretched and miserable than Asheifmes confidering that lesse burifull and dangerous it is for a man not to kave his mind and soule troubled at all and disguieted with a fant afticall illusson of idolls and Chimaxa's in the aires than to seare shonour and serve them in such fort as justice and humanity should in manner be abolished by such superstitious idolaters. To be short, that it were better to defeat and overthrow at once all false gods, than to lodge any one in his head, for to languish thereby in perpetuall misery. Concerning true religion and the extremities thereof, the case is otherwise, and the question disputable, which we leave to Divines and Theologians to scan upon, to discourse and determine, since our intention and purpose urgeth us not at this time to discourse here-

But to returne unto our author, confidering that which we come to touch's Atheists cannot find how to prevaile and maintaine their opinion: for sufficient processe and accusation against themselves they carry every minute of an houre in their cauterized and seared conscience but he sheweth that to worship and serve many idols, is a thing without comparison more deplerable than to disavow and disclaime them all. But to prove this, after he had discovered the course of superstition and Atheism, and declar eat he difference of these two extremities, he saith in the sirst place, that superstition is the most unworthy and unseemed of all the passions of the soule, proving the same by divers reasons, to wit. That the superstitions man is in continual per plexity, he dreadeth his own idoll no leffe than a cruell tyrant, and imagineth a thoufand evils even after his death. After this he taketh a view of the Atheifs, and opposeth him against the superstitions, resolving upon this point; that the superstitious person is more miserable of the twaine, as well in adversity as prosperity and to confirme and satisfie his affertion, he setteth down many arguments and notable examples. Moreover he showeth that the superstitious person is an enemy to all deity or goodhead, he putteth cleane out of his heart, and treadeth under foot all humanity and righteousnesses for to please his idols, and in one word, that he is the most wretched caitife in the world. And for a conclusion he exhorteth us so to flie superstition that we hold our selves from falling into Atheism keeping in the middle between; of which point every good man ought to consider and thinke upon well, and in good earnest in these latter times of the world, ale beit he who advertiseth as thereof in this place never knew what was true religion.

Of Superstition.

He ignorance and want of true knowledge, as touching the gods, divided even from the beginning into two branches, meeting on the one fide with flubborneand obstinate natures, as it were, with a churlish peece of ground, hath in them engendred Impiety and Atheisme; and on the other side, lighting upon gentle and tender spirits like a moist and foftfoile, hath bred and imprinted therein superflition: now as allerrour in opinion and judgment, and namely in these matters, is hurtillt and dangerous enough; to if it be accompanied with some passion or the mind it is most permitions. For this we must thinke, that every one of these passions resembleth a deception that is seaverous and instanted; and like as the dislocations of any joynts in a mans body out of their place joyned with a wound be worse than others to be cured; even so the diltortions and errours of the mind meeting with some passion are more difficult to be reformed. As for example, set case that one do thinke that the little mores and indivisible bodies called Atomia together with voidnesse and emptinesse, be the first elements and principles whereof all things are made; certainly this is an erroneous and falle opinion of his; howbeit the fame breedeth no ulcer, no feaver causing difordinate pulte in the arteries, nor yet any pricking and troublefome paine. Doth tome one hold that riches is the loveraign good of man? This errour and falle opinion hath a ruft, or canker, and a worme that eateth into the foule and transporteth the same befides it felle, it fuffereth it not to take any repote it flingeth, it pricketh it and letteth it agadding, it it throweth it down head ong (as it were) from high rocks, it stifleth and strangleth it, and in one word it bereaveth it of all liberty and franke speech. Againe, are there some perswaded, that vertue and vice be subfrances corporall and material? This haply is a grosse ignorance and a soule errour, howbeit not lamentable nor worthy to be deplored; but there be other judgements and opinions like unto this:

O vertue wretched and miserable, Nought elfe but words and wind variable; Thee ferv'd I daily with all reverence, As if thou hadft been somereall essence: Whereas injustice neglected I have, Which would have made me a man rich and brave ; Intemperance ike have I cast behind, Of pleasures all, the mother de are and kind.

Such as these verily we ought to pitty, yea, and withall to be offended at, because in whose minds they are once entered and fetled they engender many maladies and pattions like unto wormes and such filthy vermine. But now to come unto those which at this present are in question: Impiety of Atheisme, being a false perswasion and lewed beliefe, that there is no soveraigne Nature most happy and incorruptible, seemeth by incredulity of a God-head to bring miscreants to a certaine stupidity, bereaving them of all sense and seeling, considering that the end of this mis-beliefe that there is no God is to be void altogether of feare: As for inperflition, according as the nature of the Greek word (which fignifieth Fenre of the Gods) doth imply, is a pathonate opinion and turbulent imagination, imprinting in the leart of man a certain fearefulness, which doth abate his courage and humble him down to the very ground whiles he is perswaded that they be gods indeed, but such as be noysome, hurtill, and doing mitchiefe unto men: In such fort, that the impious Atheist having no motion at all as touching the Deity and Divine power, and the superstitious person moved and affected thereto after a per ene fort and otherwise than he should, are both out of the right way. For ignorance as it doth ingenerate in the one an unbeliefe of that foveraigne Nature which is the cause of all goodnesse; so it imp. inteth in the other a misbeliefe of the Deity, as being the cause of evill; so that as it should steme. Impiety or Atheisme is a false judgement and opinion of the Godhead; and superstition a passion proceeding from an erroneous perswasion. True it is, that all maladies of the foule are foule and the passions naught; howbeit in some of them, there is a kind of (I wot not what) alacrity, haughtinesse, and jollity, proceeding from the lightnesse of the mind; and to sayin a word, there is in a manner not one of them all, destitute of one active motion or other, serving for action; but a common imputation this is, and a blame laid generally upon all passions, that with their violent pricks (as it were) they incite, provoke, urge, compell, and force reason; only seare, which being no leffe void of audacity and boldnesse, than of reason; carrieth with it a certaine blockishnesse or supidity, destitute of action, perplexed, idle, dead, without any exploit or estect whatfoever; whereupon it is named in Greeke Δαμα, that is to fay, a Bond, and Tágg@, that is to fay, Trouble, for that it both bindeth and also troubleth the mind. But of all forts of feare, there is none so full of perplexity none so unfit for action as that of superstition. The man who failethnot is not afraid of the fea; neither feareth he the wars who followeth not warfare; no more than he who keepeth home and flirreth not out of doores is afraid of thieves that rob by the high way fide; or the poore man who hath nought to lose of the Sycophant or promoter; nor he that livethin meane estate of envy; no more (I say) than he that is in Calatia feareth earth-quake, or in Athiopinthunder and lightning: but the superstitious man that stands in seare of the gods, searchall things, the land, the sea, the aire, the skie, darknesse, light, filence, and his very dreames. Servants whiles they be afleep, forget the rigour and hardnesse of their masters. Sleep easeth the chaines, gives and fetters of those that lye by the heeles bound in prison; dolorous inflammations, smart wounds, painfull ulcers, and morimals that eate and confinme the flesh, yeeld some ease and alleviation unco patients whilesthey be afleep, according as he faith in the Tragedy:

Of Superstition.

O (weet repole, O fleep fo gracious, That doth allay our maladies; How welcome art thou unto us, Bringing in season remedies?

Thus faid he: But superficion will not give aman leave thus to say: For it alone maketh no truce during fleep; it permitteth not the soule at any time to breath and take rest, no nor suffereth it to pluck up her spirits and take heart againe by removing out of her the unpleasant, tart and troubletome opinions as touching the divine power; but as if the fleep of superflitious solke were a very hell and place of damned persons, it doth present unto them terrible visions and monstrous sansies; it raiseth devils, fiends, and furies, which torment the poore and miserable soule; it driveth her out of her quiet repole by her own fearefull dreames, wherewith the whippeth, scourgeth, and punitheth her felle (as if it were) by some other, whose cruell and unreatonable commandements she doth obey; and yet here is not all; for, that which worse is, such superstitious persons after they be awakened out of their sleep and risen, do not as other men, despise their dreames, and either laugh thereat or take pleasure therein, for that they see there is nothing true in all their visions and illusions which should trouble and terrifie them; but being escaped out of the shadow of those false illusions, wherein there is no harme or hurt at all, they deceive and trouble themselves in good earnest, spending their substance and goods infinitely upon magicians, juglars, enchanters, and such like deceivers whom they light upon, who beare a man in hand and thus say unto him:

Iffrighted thou be with fansies in sleep, Or haunted with Hecate that beneath doth keep.

Call for an old trot that tends thy backhouse, and plungethy selfe in the sea-water, and sit a whole day upon the ground,

O Greeks, you that would counted be most wife, These barbarous and wicked toies devise.

Namely, upon a vaine and foolish superstition, enjoyning men to begrime and bewray themselves with durt, to lie and wallow in the mire, to observe Sabbaths and cease from worke, to lie prostrate and groveling upon the earth with the face downward, to fit upon the ground in open place, and to make many strange and extravagant adorations. In times past the manner was, among those especially who would entertaine and observe lawfull musick, to command those that began to play upon the harpe or citterne, to fing thereto with a just mouth, to the end they should speake no dishonest thing; and even we also require and thinke it meet to pray unto the gods with a just and right mouth, & not to pry in the beaft facrificed, to look into the intrails, to observe whether the tongue thereof be pure and right, and in the meanetime perverting and polluting our own tongues with ftrange and abfurd names, infecting and defiling the fame with barbarous tearmes, offending thereby the gods, and violating the dignity of that religion which is received from our ancestors, and authorized in our own Countrey. The Comicall Poetsaid pleasantly in one Comedy, speaking of those who laid their bedsteds thick with gold and filver: Why do you make your fleep deare and costly unto your felves, which is the only gift that the gods have given us freely? Even to may a man very wellfay (and with great reason) unto those that are superstitious: Seeing that the gods have beflowed upon us fleep, for the oblivion and repose of our miseries, why makest thou it a very hell and place of continual and dolorous torment to thy poore soule, which cannot flye nor have re-course unto any other sleep but that which is troublesome unto thee? Heraclinu was wont to fay: That men all the whiles they were awake, enjoyed the benefit of no other world, but that which was commonunto all; but when they flept every one had a world by himselse: but surely, the superstitious person hath not so much as any part of the common world, for neither whiles he is awake hath he the true use of reason and wisdome, nor when he sleepeth is he delivered from feare and secured; but one thing or other troubleth him still: his reason is asleep, his seare is alwaies awake; so that neither can be avoid his own harme quite, nor find any meanes to put it by, and turne it off, Polycrates the tyrant was dread and terrible in Samos, Periander in Corinth, but no man feared either the one or the other who withdrew himselse into any free city or popular State; as for him who standeth in dread and seare of the imperial power of the gods, as of some rigorous and inexorable tyranny, whither shall he retire and withdraw himselse? Whither shall he siye? Where shall he find a land, where shall he meet with sea, without a god? Into what secret part of the world (poore man) wilt thou betake thy felfe, wherein thou maiest lye close and hidden, and be affured that thou art without the puissance and reach of the gods? There is a law that provideth for milerable slaves, who being so hardly intreated by their masters, are out of all hope that they shall be enfranchised and made free, namely, that they may demand to be fold againe, and to change their matter, it haply they may by that means come by a better and more easie servirude under another: but this superstition alloweth us not that liberty to change our gods for the better, may, there is not a god to be found in the world, whom a superstitious person doth not dread, considering that he search the tutelar gods of his native countrey, and the very gods protectors of his nativity: he quaketh even before those gods which are known to be faviours propitious and gracious; he trembleth for feare when he thinketh of them at whose hands we crave riches, abundance of goods, concord, peace, and the happy successe of the best words and deeds that we have. Now if these thinke that bondage is a great calamity, faying thus:

O heavy crosse and woefull misery, Man andwoman to be in thrall-estate: Andnamely, if their slavery Be under Lords unfortunate.

How much more grievous, thinke you, is their fervitude which they endure, who cannot flye, who cannot run away and elcape, who cannot change and turne to another. Altars there be, unto which bad servants may flye for succour; many Sanctuaries there be and priviledged Churches for theeves and robbers, from whence no man is so hardy as to pluck and pull them out. Enemies after they are defeated and put to flight, if in the very rout and chase they can takehold of some image of the gods, or recover some temple and get it over their heads once, are secured and assured of their lives; whereas the superstitious person is most assignment, and put in searchy that, wherein all others who be afraid of extremest evils that can happen to man repose their hope and trust, Never go about to pull perforce a superstitious man out of sacred temples, for in them he is most affliched and tormented. What needs many words? In all men death is the end of life; but it is not for in superstition, for it extendeth and reacheth farther than the limits and uttermost bounds thereof, making scare longer than this life, and adjoyning unto death an imagination of immortall miseries; and even then, when there seemeth to be an end and cessation of all sorrows and travels, be superfittious men perswaded that they must enter into others which be endlesse and everlassing: they dreame of (Iwot not what) deep gates of a certaine Plate or infernal God of hell, which open for to receive them; of fiery rivers alwaies burning; of hollow gulphs and flouds of Stry to gape for them; of ugly and hideous darknefle to over-fpread them, full of fundry apparitions; of gathy ghosts and forrowful spirits, representing unto them grizly and horrible shapes to see, and as searcfull and lamentable voices to heare: what should I speake of judges, of tormentors, of bottomless pits, and gaping caves, full of all forts of torture and infinite miferies. Thus unhappy and wretched superflition, by fearing overmuch and without reason, that which it imagineth to be nought, never taketh heed how it submitteth it selfe to all miseries; and for want of knowledge how to avoid this passionate trouble, occasioned by the seare of the gods, forgeth and deviseth to it selfe an expectation on of inevitable evils even after death. The impiety of an Atheift hath none of all this geere; most true it is, that his ignorance is unhappy, and that a great calamity and mifery it is unto the foule, either to see amisse, or wholly to be blinded, in so great and worthy things, as having of many eyes, the principall and clearest of all, to wit, the knowledge of God extinct and put out; but furely (as Isaid before) this passionate seare, this ulcer and sore of conscience, this trouble of spirit, this servile abjection is not in his conceit; these go alwaies with the other, who have such a superstitious opinion of the gods. Plate faith that mulick was given unto men by the gods, as a fingular means, to make them more modest and gracious, yea, and to bring them, as it were, into tune, and cause them to be better conditioned, and notfor delight and pleasure, nor to tickle the eares: for falling out as it doth many times, that for default and want of the Mules and Graces, there is a great confusion and disorder in the periods and harmonies, the accords and consonances of the mind, which breaketh out other whiles outragiously by meanes of intemperance and negligence; musick is of that power that it letteth every thing againe in good order and their due place; for according as the Poet Pin-

> To what foever from above, God Jupiter doth caft no love, To that the voice melodious Of Misses seemeth odious.

Infomuch as they fall into fits of rage therewith, and be very fell and angry; like as it is reported of tygers, who if they heare the found of drums or tabors round about them, will grow furious and ftarke mad, untill in the end they reare themselves in peeces: so that there commeth lesse harme unto them who by reason of deatenesse or hard hearing, have no sense at all of musick, and are nothing moved and affected therewith: a great infortunity this was of blind Tirefies, that he could not fee his children and friends, but much more unfortunate and unhappy were Athamas and Agave, who feeing their children, thought they faw lions and stags. And no doubt when Hercules fell to be enraged and mad, better it had been and more expedient for him, that he had not feen nor known his own children, than to to deale with those who were most deare unto him, and whom he loved more than all the world befides as if they had been his mortall enemies. Thinke you not then that there is the same difference between the passions of Atheists and superstitious folke? Atheists have no fight nor knowledge of the gods at all, and the superstitious thinke there are gods, though they be perswaded of them amisse; Atheists neglect them altogether as if they were not; but the superstitious esteeme that to be terrible, which is gracious and amiable ; cruell and tyrant-like, which is kind and father-like; hurtfull and dammageable unto us, which is most carefull of our good and profit; rough, rigorous, favage and fell of nature, which is void of choler and without passion, And herent frough, figorous, and see the frafte-founders, cutters in stone, imagers, gravers and workers in wax, who shape, and represent unto them the gods with bodies to like nesse of mortal men, for such they who shape, and represent unto them the gods with bodies to like nesse of mortal men, for such they imagine them to be, such they adorn, adore and worship, whiles in the mean time they despise Philoiophers and grave personages of State and Government, who do teach and shew that the Majesty of God is accompanied with bounty, magnanimity, love and carefull regard of our good: So that as in the one fort we may perceive a certain sencelesse stupidity & want of belief in those causes from whenceproceed all goodnesse; so in the other we may observe a distrustfull doubt and fear of those which cannot otherwise be than profitable and gracious. In lum, impiery and Athelim is nothing else but a meer want of feeling and sense of a deity or divine power, for default of understanding and knowing the loveraign good; and superfittion is a heap of diverspassions, suspecting and supposing that which is good by nature to be badifor superfittions persons fear the gods, and yet they have recourse unto themsthey flatter them, and yet blashheme and reproach them; they pray unto them, and yet complain of them. A common thing this is unto all men, not to be alwayes fortunate, whereas the gods are void of sicknesse, not subject to old age, neither taste they or labour or pain at any time: and as Pindarus laith, Escape they do the passage of the firth Ofroaring Acheron, and live alway in mirth.

But the passions and affairs of men be intermedled with divers accidents and adventures which run as well one way as another. Now confider with mefirst and formost the Atheist in those things which happen against his mind, and learn his disposition and affection in such occurrences: if in other respects he bea temperate and modest man, bear he will his fortune patiently without saying a word; seeke for aid he will and comfort by what means he can; but if he be of nature violent, and take his misfortune impatiently, then he directeth and opposeth all his plaints and lamentations against fortune and casualty then he crieth out that there is nothing in the world governed either by justice or with providence, but that all the affairs of man run confusedly head-long to destruction: but the fashion of the superstitious is otherwise; for let there never so small an accident or mishap befall unto him, he sits him down forrowing, and thereto he multiplyeth and addeth other great and grievous afflictions, such as hardly be removed; he imagineth fundry frights, fears, suspicions, and troublesome terrors, giving himself to all kind of wailing, groaning, and dolefull lamentarions for he accused not any man fortune, occasion, or his own selfs but he blameth God as the cause of all, giving out in plain terms, that from thence it is that there falleth and runneth over him such a celestiall influence of all calamity and misery, contesting in this wise, that an unhappy or unlucky man he is nor, but one hated of the gods, worthily punished and afflicted, yea, and infering all deferredly by that divine power and providence: now if the godlesse Atheist be fick, he discourseth with himself and callent to mind his replections and full feedings, his furfeiting upon drinking wine, his diorders in diet, his immoderate travell and pains taken, yea, and his unusual and abfurd change of air, from that which was familiar, unto that which is strange and unnaturall: moreover, if it chance that he have offended in any matter of government touching the State, incurred diffrace and an evill opinion of the People and Countrey wherein he liveth, or been falfly accused and slandered before the Prince or fovereign Ruler, he goeth no farther than to himself and those about him, imputing the cause of all thereto and to nothing else, and thus he feasoneth:

puting triecause of all tricted and to nothing encountries for terms for terms and what have I not done?

Where have I been? what good have I done? and what have I not done?

whereas the superstitious person will think and say, that every disease and instruity of his body, all his losses, the death of his children, his evill successe and infortunity in managing civill affairs of State, and his repulses and difgraces, are so many plagues inflicted upon him by the ire of the gods, and the very affaults of the divine justice; insomuch as he dare not go about to seek for help and fuccour, nor avert his own calamity; he will not prefume to feck for temedie, nor oppose himself against the invasion of adverse fortune, for fear (forforth) lest he might feem to fight against the gods, or to refift their power and will when they punish him: thus when he lyeth fick in bed, he driveth his Physician out of the chamber, when he is come to visit him, when he is in sorrow, he flutteth and locketh his door upon the Philosopher, that comert hor omfore him and giveth him good counfeil. Let me alone (will he say) and give me leave to suffer punishment as I have deserved, wicked and profane creature that I am, accuried, hated of all the gods, demi-gods, and saints in heaven. Whereas if a man (who doth not beleeve nor is perswaded that there is a God) be otherwise in exceeding grief & forrow, it is an ordinary thing with him to wipe away the tears as they gush out of his eyes, and trickle down the cheeks, to cause his hair to be cut, and to take away his mourning weed. As for a superstitious persons how should one speak unto him, or which way succour and helphim? without the doors he fitsclad in fackcloth, or elfegirded about his loines with patched clothes and tattered rags; oftentimes he will welter and wallow in the mire, confeshing, and declaring (I wot not) what finnes and offences he hath committed; to wit, that he hath eaten or drunk this or that, which his god would not permit; that he harh walked or gone some whither against the will and leave of the divine power. Now, say he be of the best fort of these superstitious people, and that he labour but of the milder superstitions, yet will he at least wife sit within house, having about him a number of all kinds of facrifices and facred aspersions; ye shall have old witches come and 218 bring all the charmes, spels, and sorreries they can come by, and hang them about his neck or other parts of his body (as it were) upon a stake, as Bian was wont to say.

It is reported that Tyribasus, when he should have been apprehended by the Persians, drew his Cymiter, and (as he was a valiant man of his hands) defended himselfe valiantly; but so soone as they that came to lay hands on him cried out and protested that they were to attach him in the Kings name, and by commission from his Majesty, he laid down his weapon aforesaid immediately, and offered both his hands to be bound and pinnioned. And is not this whereof we treat the semblable case? Whereas others withfland their advertity, repell and put back their afflictions, and work all the means they can for to avoid, escape, and turne away that which they would not have to come upon them. A superstitious person will heare no man, but speake in this wise to himselfe: Wretched man that thou art, all this thou sufferest at the hands of God, and this is befallen unto thee by his commandement, and the divine providence; all hope he rejecteth, he doth abandon and betray himfelfe, and looke whofoever come to fuccourand help him, those he shunnerh and repelleth from him. Many crosses there be and calamities in the world, otherwise moderate and tolerable, which superstition maketh milchievous and incurable.

That ancient King Midus in old time being troubled and disquieted much in his mind (49it should seeme) with certaine dreames and visions, in the end fell into such a melancholy and despaire, that willingly he made himselfe away by drinking buls bloud. And Aristodemus King of Messenians, in that war which he waged against the Lacedamonians, when it hapned that the dogs yelled and houled like wolves, and that there grew about the altar of his house the herbe called Dent de China or Dogs graffe, whereupon the wilards and foothfayers were afraid (as of some tokens presaging evil) Conceived such an inward griese, and tooke to deep a thought, that he fell into desperation and killed himselfe. As for Nicias the Cenerall of the Athenian Army, haply it had been far better that by the examples of Midas and Aristodemus he had been delivered and rid from his superstinion, thanfor feare of the shadow occasioned by the eclipse of the moone to have sitten still as he did and do nothing, untill the enemies environed and enclosed him round about; and after that forty thousand of Athenians were either put to the sword or taken prisoners, to come alive into the hands of his enemies, and lose his life with shame and dishonour: for in the darkenesse occasioned by the opposition of the earth just in the midst, between the sun and the moon, whereby her body was shadowed and deprived of light, there was nothing for him to seare, and namely at such a time, when there was cause for him to have stood upon his seet and served valiantly in the field; but the darknesse of blind superstition was dangerous to trouble and consound the judgement of a man who was possessed therewith, at the very instant, when his occasions required most the use of his wit and understanding:

The sea already troubled is With billows blew within the found. Up to the capes and clifs arise Thick misty clouds which gather round About their tops, where they do feat, Fore-shewing shortly tempests great.

A good and skilful Pilot feeing this, doth well to pray unto the gods for to escape the imminent duger, and to invocate and call upon those Saints for help, which they after call Saviours: but all the while that he is thus at his devout prayers, he holdeth the helme hard, he letteth down the cross faile-yard,

Thus having struck the maine faile down the mast, He scapes the sea, with darknesse overcast.

Hesiodus giveth the husbandman a precept, before he begin to drive the plough or sowhis

To Ceres chafte his vows to make, To Jove likewife god of his land, Forgetting not the while to take The end of his plough-taile in hand.

And Homer bringeth in Ajax being at the point to enter into combat with Hetter, willing the Greeks to pray for him unto the gods; but whiles they prayed, he forgat not to arme himselfe at all pieces. Semblably, Agamemnon after he had given commandement to his fouldiers who wereto

Each one his launce and speareto whet His Shield likewife fitly to fet. Then, and not before, prayeth unto Jupiter in this wile:

O Jupiter wouch fafe me of thy grace,
The frately hall of Priamusto race.

For God is the hope of vertue and valour, not the pretence of floth and cowardife. But the Jews were so superstitious, that on their Sabbath (sitting still even whiles the enemies reared their scaling ladders and gained the wals of their City) they never firred foot norrole for the matter, but remained fast tied and inwrapped in their superstition as it were in a net. Thus you see what superstition is in those occurrences of times and affaires which succeed not to our mind, but contrary to our will (that is to fay) in advertity: and as for times and occasions of mirth, when all things fall out to a mansdefire, it is no better than impiety or atheilme; and nothing is so joyous unto man. as the folerantity of feathvall holidaies, great feaths, and lactifices before the temples of the gods, the mythical and facred rites performed when we are purified and cleanfed from our fins, the ceremoniall service of the gods when we worship and adore them; in which all, a supersitious man is no better than the Atheist: formarke an Atheist in all these, he will laugh at them until he be ready to go beside himselfe; these toyes will set him (I say)into a fit of Sardonian laughing, when he shall see their vanities; and otherwhiles he wishnot stick to say softly in the eare of some samiliar friend about him: What mad tolke be these? How are they out of their right wits, and entaged, who suppose that such things as thesedo please the gods? Setting this aside, there is no harme at all in him. As for the superflitious person, willing he is, but not able, to joy and take pleasure: for his heart is much like unto that City which Sophocles describeth in these verses:

Which at one time is full of incenfe weet, Resounding mirth with load triump, ant songs And yet the same doth shew in every street All signes of griefe, with plaints and groanes among.

He looketh with a pale face, under his chaplet of flowers upon his head; he facrificeth, and yet quaketh for feare; hemaketh his prayers with a trembling voice; he putteth incense into the fire, and his hand shaketh withall; to be short, he maketh the speech or sentence of Pythagoras to be vaine and foolish, who was wont to say: That we are then in best case when we approach unto the gods and worship them. For verily even then it is when superstitious people are most wretched and miferable, to wit, when they enter into the temples and lanctuaries of the gods, as if they went into the dens of beares, holes of ferpents and dragons, or caves of whales and fuch moniters of the fea. I marvell much therefore at them, who call the miscreance and sin of Atheists, Impiety, and give not that name rather to superstition. And yet Anaxagoras was accused of impiety; for that he neld and said that the sun was a stone: whereas never man yet called the Cimmerian impious or godlesse, because they suppose and beleeve there is no Sun at all. What say you then? Shall he who thinketh that there be no gods at all be taken for a profane person and excommunicate? And shall not he who beleeveth them to be such as superstitious solke imagine them, be thought insected with more impious and wicked opinions? For mine own part, 1 would be better pleated and content, if men should say of me thus: There neither is nor ever was in the world a man named Plat arch, than to give out of me and fay: Plutarch is an unconstant man, variable, cholerick, full of revengeser the least occasion that is, or displeased or given to grieve for a small matter; who if when you invite. others to supper he be left out and not bidden, or it upon some businesse you be let and hindered, so that you come not to his doore for to visit him, or otherwise do not salute and speake unto him friendly, will be ready to eate your heart with falt, to fet upon you with his fangs, and bite you, will not flick to catch up one of your little babes and worry him, or will keep some milchievous wild beast of purpose to put into your come-fields, your vineyards or orchards, for to devoureand spoile all your fruits. When Timotheus the musician one day in an open Theater at Athens chanted the praises of Diana, giving unto her in his song the attributes of Thyas, Phabas, Manas, and Ly sas, that is to fay, Furious, Possessed, Enraged, and Starke mad; as Poets are wont to do Cine sias another minstrell or musician, rose up from out of the whole audience, and said thus aloud unto him : Would God thou hadft a daughter of those qualities. And yet these superflicious solke thinke the same of Diana, yea, and worse to: neither have they a better opinion of Apollo, Juno, and Venus; for all of them they feare and tremble at. And yet what blasphemy uttered Niobe against Latona, like unto that which superstition hath perswaded foolish people to believe of that goddesse? to wit, that she being displeased with the reproachfull words that Niobe gave her, killed with her arrows all the children of that filly woman,

Even daughters sixe, and sons as many just,

Of ripe yeares all, no hetp but dye they must. fo insatiable was she of the calamities of another, so implacable was her anger. For grant it were so, that this goddesse was full of galland choler; say, that she tooke an hatred to lewd and wicked perfons, or grieved and could not endure to heare her selfe reproached, or to laugh at humane folly and ignorance; certes she should have been offended and angry, yea, and discharged her arrows upon these, who untruly impute and ascribe unto her that butternesse and exceeding cruelty, and flick not both to deliver in words, and also to set down in writing such things of her. We charge Hecuba with bealtly and barbarous immanity, for faying thus in the last booke of Homers Iliads, > Othat I could his liver get Amids his corps, to bite and eat.

As for the Syrian goddelle, superfittious folke are perswaded, that if any one do câte Enchoife or such little fish as Aphye, she will likewise gnaw their legs, fill their bodies with tilcers, and putrifie or not their liver. To conclude therefore, it is impioufly done to blaipheme the gods and speake badly of them; and is it not impious to thinke and imagine the same, considering that it is the opinion and conceit of the blasphemer and foule-mouthed profane person which maketh his speech to be reputed naught and wicked? For even we our selves detest and abhor soule language, for nothing so much as because it is a signe of a malicious mind, and those we take for to be our enemies who give out bad words of us, in this relpect, that we suppose them to be faithlesse and not to be trulted, but rather ill affected unto us, and thinking badly of us. Thus you fee what judgement superstition folke have of the gods, when they imagine them to be dull and blockish, treacherous and difloyall, variable and fickle minded, tull of revenge, cruell, melancholick, and apt to fret at every little matter: whereupon it must needs follow, that the superstitious man doth both hate and also dread the gods; for how canit otherwise be, considering that he is perswaded that all the greatest calamities which either he hath endured in times past, or is like to luffer herealter proceed from them; now who foever hateth and feareth the gods he is no doubt their enemy; neither is it to be wondred at for all this, that although he stand in dread of them, yet he adoreth and worshippeth them, he prayeth and sacrificeth unto them, frequenteth duly and devoutly their temples, and is not willingly out of them; for do we not see it ordinarily that reverence is done unto tyrants, that men make court unto them, and cry, God fave your grace; yea, and erect golden statues to the honour of them? howbeit as great devotion and divine honour as they do unto them in Outward appearance, they hate and abhor them fecretly to the heart. Hermolaus courted Alexander. and was ferviceable about him: Paufanias was one of the squires of the body to King Philip, and so was Charcas to Caligula the Emperour; but there was not of these but even when he served them faid thus in his heart, > Certes in case it did now lie in me, Of thee (thoutyrant) revenged would I be.

Thus you see the Atheist thinketh there be no gods; but the superstitious person wishest that there were none; yet he beleeveth even against his will that there be, nay, he dare not otherwise do for feare of death. Now if he could (like as Tantalus defired to go from under the stone that hung over his head) be discharged of this feare which no lessed oth presse him down, surely he would embrace, yea, and thinke the disposition and condition of an Atheist to be happy, as the state of freedome and liberty : but now the Atheist hath no sparke at all of superstition, whereas the superstitious person is in will and affection a meere Atheift, howbeit weaker than to beleeve and shew in opinion that of thegods which he would and is in his mind. Moreover, the Atheist in no wise giveth any cause, or ministreth occasion that superstition should arise: but superstition not only was the first beginning of impiety and Atheilme but also when it is sprung up and grown doth patronize and excuse it, although not truly and honeftly, yet not without some colourable pretence: for the Sages and wife men in times past grew not into this opinion, that the world was wholly void of a divine power and deity, because they beheld and considered any thing to be found fault withall in the heaven, some negligence and disorder to be marked, some confusion to be observed in the starres, in the times and seasons of the yeare, in the revolutions thereof, in the course and motions of the sun round about the earth. which is the cause of night and day, or in the nurture and food of beasts or in the yeerely generation and encrease of the fruits upon the earth; but the ridiculous works and deeds of superstition, their passions worthy to be mocked and laughed at, their words, their motions and gestures, their charmes, sorceries, enchantments, and magicall illusions, their runnings up and down, their beating of drums and tabours, their impure purifications, their filthy cafilmonies and beastly fanctifications, their barbarous and unlawfull corrections and chaftiements, their inhumane and shamefull indignities practized even in temples; these things (Isay) gave occasion first unto some for to say, that better it were there had been no gods at all, than to admit such for gods who received and approved these abuses, yea, and tooke pleasure therein, or that they should be so outragious, proud, and injurious, so base, and pinching, so easie to fall into chelerupon a small cause, and so has d to be pleased againe. Had it not been far better for those Galatians. Scythians, or Tartarians in old time to have had no thought, no imagination, no mention at all delivered unto them in histories of gods; than to thinke there were gods delighting in the bloudshed of men, and to beleeve that the most holy and accomplished sacrifice and service of the gods was to cut mens throats, and to spill their bloud: and had it not been more expedient for the Carthaginians by having at the first for their law-givers either Critias or Diagoras, to have been periwaded that there was neither God in heaven, or devill in hell, than to facrifice so as they did to Saturne, who not (as Empedocles faid) reproving and taxing those that killed living creatures in

The fire lifts up his deere beloved fon, Who first some other forme andshape did take: He doth him slay, and sacrifice anon, And therewith vows and foolish praiers doth make.

But witting and knowing killed their own children indeed for facrifice: and looke who had no iffue of their own, would buy poore mens children, as if they were lambes, young calves, or kids, for the faid purpole. At which facrifice the mother that bare them in her wombe would fland by without any flow at all of being moved, without weeping or fighing for pirty and compaffion; for otherwifei fine the either fetched a figh or fleed a reare, the mult lofe the price of herchild, and yet notwich danding juffer it to be flaine and facrificed. Moreover, before and all about the Image or Idoll to which the facrifice was made, the place refounded and rung againe with the noife of flutes and hauthoies, with the found also of drums and timbrels, to the end that the pitifull cry of the poore infants should not be heard. Now if any Tryphones or other such like giants, having chafed and driven out the gods, should usurpe the Empire of the world and rule over us: what other factifices would they delight in, or what offerings elle and service besides could they require at mens hands? Anosthiet thewise of the great Monarch Xerves, buried quick in the ground twelve persons, and offered them for the prolonging of her own life unto Pluto; which god (as Planosith) was named Pluto, Die, and Haden, for that being full of humanity untomankind, wise and rich besides, he was able to entertaine the soules of men with personner speeches and reasonable re-

Memphanes the Naturalith, feeing the Egyptians at their folemne feashs knocking their breashs, and lamenting pitiously, admonished them very fitly in this wife: Mygood friends, if these (quoth he) be gods whom you honour thus lament not for them; and if they be men, fastisce not unto them. But there is nothing in the world so full of errours, no malady of the mind so passionate and mingled with more contrary and repugnant opinions, as this of superstition; in regard whereof, we ought to shun and avoid the same, but not as many who whiles they section in the assaurate of theeves by the high-way side, or the invasion of wild beasts out of the forrest, or the danger of fire, are so transported and carried away with searchtatthey look not about them, nor see what they do, or whether they go, and by that means light upon by-waies, or rather places having no way at all, but instead thereof bottomlessie pits and gulphs, or clie steep down-sals most perious; even so, there be divers that seeking to avoid superstition, full headlong upon the cragged rock of perverse and stiffen-necked Impiery and Atheisme, leaping overtrue religion which is seated just in the midst besween both.

Of Exile or Banishment.

The Summary.

There is not amon, how well foever framed to the world and felled therein, who can promise unto him-felfe any peaceable and assured state, throughout the course of his whole life; but according as it see-meth good to the eternall and wise providence of the Almighty (which governesh all things) to chastise our faults, or to try our constancy in faith; he ought intime of a calme to prepare himselfe for a tempest, and not to attend the midst of a danger, before he provide for his safety, but betimes and long before to fortiste and furnish himselfe with that whereof he may have need another day in all occurrences and accidents what soever. Our Author therefore in this Treatise writing to comfort and encourage one of his friends, cost down with anguish occasioned by his banishment, sheweth throughout all his discourse, that vertue it is which maketh su happy in every place, and that there is withing but notice that can but and endamage su.

Now as touching his particularifing of this point; in the first place he treateth what kind of friends we have need of in our assistion, and how we ought then to serve our turns with them: and inregardof exile more particularly he adjoyneth this advertisement alove all other things, to see unto those goods which we more particular, and to oppose them against the present griefe and sorrow, Afterwards he proveth may enjoy during the same, and to oppose them against the present griefe and sorrow, Afterwards he proveth by sundry and divers reasons that kanshmens is not inis selfe simply naught; he discovereth and layeth open the folly and mifery of those who are too much addicted unto one country, shewing by notable examples that awife man may live at ease and contentment in all places; that the habitation in a strange region, and the same limited and confined straightly within certaine precincts, doth much more good ordinarily than karme; that a large countrey lying out far every away, maketh a manner awhit the more happy: whereas contrariwife to be enclosed and pent up bringeth many commodities with it, declaring that this is the only life; and that it is no life at all to be evermore flitting to and fro from place to place. Now when he hath beautified this theame above said with many faire similitudes and proper industions, he comforeth those who are debarred and excluded from any City or Province; refuting with very good and found arguments certaine persons who held banishment for a note of infamy; shewing withall, that it is nothing else but sin and vice which bringeth a man into a lamentable state and condition: concluding by the examples of Anaxagoras and Socrates, that neither imprisonment, nor death can enthrall or make miserable the man who loveth vertue. And contrarmife, he giveth us to understand by the examples of Phaeton and Ica-rus, that vicious and sinful persons fall daily and continually one way or other into most grievous calamities through their own audaciousnesse and folly.

Of Exile or Banishment.

Emblable is the case of wife fentences, and of good friends; the best, and most, and assured; be those reputed, which are present with us in our calamities, not in vaine, and for a shew, but to aid and fuccour us: for many there be who will not flick to prefent themselves, year and be ready to conferre and talke with their friends in time of advertity; howbrit, to no good purpose at all, but rather with some danger to themselves, like as unskilful Divers, when they go about to helpe those that are at point to be drowned, being classed about the body, sinke together with them for company, Now the speeches and discourses which come from friends, and such as would seeme to be helpers, ought to tend unto the consolation of the party afflicted; and not to the defence and justification of the thing that afflicteth: for little need have we of fach perions as should weep and lament with us in our tribulations and distresses, as the manner is of the Chori or quires in Tragerdies, but those rather who will speake their minds frankely untous, and makeremonstrance plainly: That for a man to be sad and forrowfull, to afflict and cast down himselfe, is not only every way bootlesse and unprofitable, but also most vaine and soolish: but where the adverie occurrents themselves being well handled and managed by reason, when they are discovered what they be, give a man occasion to say thus unco himselie:

Thou hast no cause thus to complaine, Unlesse thou be dispos'd to faine.

A mee reridiculous folly it were to aske either of body and flesh, what it aileth, or of soule, what it suffereth, and whether by the occurrence of this accident it fare worse than before; but to have recourse unto strangers without, to teach us what our griefe is by wailing, forrowing, and grieving together with us: and therefore when we are apart and atone by our felves. we ought each one to examine our own heart and toule, about all and every milhap and in ortunity, yea, and to poize and weigh them, as if they were so many burdens, for the body is presed down only by the weight of the fardell that loadeth it; but the soule oftentimes of it selfegiveth a surcharge over and above the things that molest it. A stone of its own nature is hard, and yee of it selfe cold; neither is there any thing without that giveth casually to the one the hardnesse to resist, or to the other the coldnesse to congeale; but banishments, disgraces, repulse, and losse of dignity, as also contrariwise, crowns, honours, loveraigne magistracies, pre-eminences, and highest places, being powerfull either to afflict or rejoyce hearts, in some measure more or lesse, not by their own nature, but according to judgement and opinion, every manmaketh to himselfe light or heavy, easie to be borne or contrariwife intolerable: whereupon we may heare Polynices answering thus to the demand made unto him by his mother;

How then? Is it a great calamity, To quit the place of our nativity? Polynices. The greatest crosse of all it is doubtlesse. And more indeed then my tongue can expresse.

But contrariwise, you shall heare Aleman in another song, according to a little Epigram written of him by a certaine Poet

At Sardis, where mine ancestors somtime abode did make, If I were bred and nourished, my surname I should take Of some Celmis or Bacelas, in robes of gold arai'd, And jewels fine, while I upon the pleasant tabour plat d. But now Alcman I cleped am and of that Spatta great A Citizen and Poet : for in Greekijh muse my veine Exalts me more than Dascyles or Gyges tyrants twaine.

For it is the opinion, and nothing else, that causeth one and the same thing to be unto some good and commodious, as current and approved money, but to others, unprofitable and hurtfull,

But set case, that exile be a grievous calamity, as many men do both say and sing; even so, among those meats which we eate, there be many things bitter, sharpe, hot and biting in taste, howbeit, by mingling therewith somewhat which is sweet and pleasant, we take away that which disagreeth with nature; like as there be colours also offensive to the fight in such fort, as that the eyes be much dazled and troubled therewith, by reason of their unpleasant hew or excessive and intolerable brightnesse. If then, for to remedy that in convenience by such offensive and relplendent colours, we have devised meanes, either to intermingle shadows withall, or turne away our eyes from them unto some green and delectable objects; the temblable may we do in those finister and crosse accidents of fortune; namely, by mixing among them those good and definable bleffings which a mandoth presently enjoy, to wit, wealth, and abundance of goods, a number of friends. and the want of nothing necessary to this life: for I do not thinke that among the Sardinians there be many who would not bevery well content with those goods and that estate which you have even in exile, and chuse rather with your condition of life otherwise, to live from home and in a strange countrey, than (like snailes, evermore sticking saft to their shels) be without all good things else, and enjoy only that which they have at home in peace, without trouble and moleflation. Like as therefore in a certaine Comzdy, there was one who exhorted his friend being fallen into some adversity, to take a good heart, and fight against fortune; who when he demanded of him againe how he should combate with het, made aniwer: Mary after a Philosophicall manner; even so let us also maintaine battell, and be revenged of advertity, by following the rule of Philosophy, and being armed with patience as becommeth wife men. For after what fort do we defend our felves against raine? Or how be we revenged of the North wind? Mary we feeke for fire, we go into a flouph, we make provision of cloaths, and we get an house over our heads; neither do we sit us down in the raine, untill we be thorowly wet to the skin, and then weep out fill; and even so have you also in those things which the prefendy about you good meanes, yea, and better than any other, to revive, refreth, and warme this part of your life which feemeth to be frozen and benimmed with cold, as having no need at all of any other helps and fuccoins so long as you will nie the foresaid means, according as reason doth prescribe and direct. For true it is, that the ventoles or cupping glasses that Physcians nie, drawing out of mans body the worst and most corrupt bloud, do disburden and preience all thereft. But they that are given to heavinesse and forrow, who love also evermore to whine and complaine, by gathering together and multiplying continually in their cogitations the work matters incident unto them, and effloones confuming themselves with the dolorous accidents of their fortune, cause those meanes to be unprofitable unto them, which otherwise are wholsome and expedient, and even at such a time especially when they should do most good. As for those two tuns, my good friend, which Homer faith to be fet in heaven full of mens definies, the one replenished with good and the other with bad, it is not Jupiter who fitteth to dispense and distribute them abroad, sending unto somemild and pleasant fortunes intermingled alwaies with goodnesse, but unto others continuall freames (as a man would fay) or meere misfortunes without any temperature or any goodnesse at all: but even among our own selves as many as be wise and are of any sound understanding, draw out of their happy fortunes whatloever crosse and adverse matter is ming ed therewith, and by this meanes make their life the pleasanter, and, as a man would say, more portable; whereas contrariwife, many men do let their fortunes run (as it were) through a colander or streiner, wherein the worlt flick and remaine in the way behind, whiles the better do passe and run out; and therefore it behoveth that although we be fallen into any thing that is in truth naught and grievous unto us, we fet a cheerefull countenance on the matter, and make the best supply and recompence that we can by those good things that otherwise we have and do remaine with us besides, lenifying and polishing the strange and adverse accident which hapneth without by that which is mild and fami-

But as touching those occurrents that simply of their own nature be not ill, and wherein whatfoever doth trouble and offend us, arifeth altogether and wholly upon a vaine conceir and roolifh imagination of our own; we ought to do as our manner is with little children that be afraid of maskes and difguiled vilours; for like as we hold the same close and neareunto them, handle and turne them in our hands before them every way, and so by that meanes acquaint them therewith, untill they make no reckoning at all of them; even so by approaching neare, by touching and perufing the faid calamities with our understanding and discourse of reason, we are to consider and discover the falleapparence, the vanity and feigned tragedy that they pretend; like to which is that present accident which now is befallen unto you, to wit, the banishment out of that place, which according to the vulgar errour of men you suppose to be your native country. For to say a truth, there is no such distinct native soyle that nature hath ordained, no more than either house, land, fmiths forge, or chirurgions shop is by nature, as Ariston was wont to say; but every one of these and such like according as any man doth occupy or use them, are his, or to speake more properly, are named and called his: forman, according to the faying of Plate is not an earthly plant, having the root fixed fast within the ground and unmoveable, but celestiall and turning upward to heaven, whose body from the head, as from a root that doth strengthen the same, abideth streight and upright. And hereuponit is that Hercules in a certaine tragady faid thus:

What tellyoume of Argive or Thebain, I do not vaunt of any place certain, No Burrough towne, nor City comes amiss Throughout all Greece, but it my country is.

And yet Socrates faid better than fo; who gave it out; That he was neither Athenian nor Grecian, but a citizen of the world; as if a man should say for examples sake, that he were either a Rhodian or a Corinthian; for he would not include himselse within the precincts and limits of the promontories Sunium or Tanarus, nor yet the Ceraunian mountaines,

But feeft thou this ftarry firmament, So high above and infinitely vaft, Inbosom moist of water element, The earth beneath how it encloseth fast.

These are the bounds of a native country within the pourprise and compasse whereof whosoever is, ought not to thinke himselfe either banished pilgrime, stranger, or forreiner; namely, whereas he shall meet with the same fire, the same water, the same aire, the same magistrates, the same governours and presidents; to wit, the sun, the moone, and the morning-star; the same laws throughout, under one and the selfe-same order and conduct; the solftice and tropick of summer in the north; the folitice and tropick of winter in the fourth; the aquinoxes both offpring and fall, the stars Pleiadesand Areturus; the scasons of seednesse, the times of planting; one King, and the same prince of all, even God, who hath in his hand the beginning, the midft, and the end of the whole and universall world; who by his influence goeth according to nature, directly through and round about all things, attended upon with righteouinefie and juitice, to take vengeance and punishment of those who transgresse any point of divine Law: which all we likewise that are men do exercise and use by the guidance and direction of nature against all others, as our citizens and subjects. Now say that thou dost not dwell and live in Sardis, what matter is that? Surely it is just nothing: No more do all the Athenians inhabite in the burroughs or tribe Colyttus; nor the Corinthians in the freet Cranium; neyet the Lacedamonians in the village Pytane: are those Athenians then to be counted strangers, and not inhabitants of the City, who have removed out of Melite into Diomea: confidering that even there they do solemnize yet the month of their transmigration, named thereupon, Metageitnion; yea, and do celebrate a feltivall holiday and facrifice, which immemoriall of that removing they call Metagetnia, for that this passage of theirs into another neighbourhood, they received and enterrained right willingly with joy and much contentment? I suppose you will never say so. Now tell me what part of this earth habitable, or rather of the whole globe and compasse thereof, can be said far diltant or remote one from the other, leeing that the Mathematicians are able to prove and make demonstration by reason, that the whole in comparison and respect of heaven or the firmament is no more than a very prick which hath no dimension at all? But we, like unto pismires, driven out of our hole; or, inmanner of bees, dispossessed of our hive, are cast down and discomforted by and by, and take our felves to be forreiners and strangers, for that we know not how to esteeme and make all things our own, familiar and proper unto us, as they be. And yet we laugh at the folly of him who faid: That the moone at Athens was better than at Corinth; being in the meane while after a fort in the same errour of judgement, as if when we are gone a journey from the place of our habitation, we should mittake the earth, the tea, the aire, and the skie, as if they were others and far different from those which we are accustomed unto: for Nature hath permitted us to go and walkethrough the world loofe and at liberty: but we for our parts imprison our felves, and we may thanke our selves that we are pent up in streight roomes, that we be housed and kept within wals; thus of our own accord we leap into close and narrow places; and notwithstanding that we do thus by our selves, yet we mock the Persian Kings, for that (if it be true which is reported of them) they drink all of the water only of the river Choaspes, by which meanes they make all the continent befides waterlesse, for any good they have by it: whereas, even we also, when we travell and remove into other countries, have a long dei re after the river Cephisus or Eurotas; yea, and a mind unto the mountaine Taigetus, or the hill Parnassus; whereby upon a most vaine and soolish opinion, all the world besides is not only void of water, but also like a delart without city, and altogether inhabitable unto us. Contrariwife, (erraine Egyptians by occasion of some wrath and excellive opptefling of their King, minding to remove into Ethiopia, when as their kinssolke and friends requested them to turne back againe, and not to for take their wives and children, after a shamelesse manner shewing unto them their genitall members, aniwered them: That they would neither want wives nor children, so long as they carried those about them. But surely a man may avouch more honestly, and with greater modelty and gravity; that he who in what place loever feeleth no want or misse of those things which be necessary for this life, cannot complaine and say: That he is there out of his own countrey, without city, without his own house and habitation, or a stranger at all; so as he only have as he ought, his eye and understanding bent hereunto, for to stay and governe him in manner of a sure anchor, that he may be able to make benefit and use of any haven or harbour what soever he arriveth unto. For when a man hath lost his goods, it is not so easte a matter to recover them soon againe; but furely every city is firaightwaies as good a native countrey unto him, who knoweth and hath learned how to ule it; to him (Lfay) who hath fuch roots as will live, be nourithed and grow in every place, and by any meanes, such as Themsstocles was furnished with; and such as Demetrius the Phalerian was not without; who being banished from Athens, became a principall perfon in the Court of King Prolomaus in Alexandria, where he not only himselfe lived in great abundance of all things but also sent unto the Athenians from thence rich gitts and presents. As for Themiffacles living in the effate of a Prince, through the bountifull allowance and liberality of the King of Perfia, he was wont (by report) to fay unto his wife and children: We had been utterly undone for ever, if we had not been undone. And therefore Diogenes furnamed the Dog, when one brought him word and faid, the Sinopians have condemned thee to be exiled out of the Kingdome of Pontsu: And I (quoth he) have confined them within the countrey of Pontus with this charge,

Stratonius, being in the Isle Seriphos, which was a very little one, demanded of his hoft, for what crimes the punishment of exile was ordained in that countrey; and when he heard and understood by him, that they used to banish such as were convicted of falshood and untruth. Why then (quoth he againe) hast not thou committed some false and leud act, to the end that thou mightest depart out of this straight place and be enlarged ? Where, as one Comicall Poet said: A man might gather and make a vintage (as it were) of figs with flings, and foilon of all commodities might be had, which an Island wanted. For it one would weigh and consider the truth indeed, setting aside all vain opinion and foolish conceits, he that is affected unto one city alone is a very pilgrim and stranger in all others; for it ieemeth neither meet, honeft, nor reasonable, that a man should abandon his own for to inhabite those of others. Sparta is fallen to thy lot (faith the proverbe) adorne and honour it, for fo thou art bound to do; be it that it is of small or no account; say that it is seated in an unwholiome aire, and subject to many diseases, or be plagued with civil diffentions, or otherwise troubled with turbulent affaires. But who loever he be whom fortune hath deprived of his own native countrey; certes she hath granted and allowed him to make choice of that which may please and content him. And verily the precept of the Pythagoreans ferveth to right good flead in this case to be practised: Choose (saythey) the best life; use and custome will make it pleasant enough unto thee. To this purpose also it may be wisely and with great profit said : Make choise of the best and most pleasant city, time will cause it to bethy native countrey, and such a native countrey as shall not distract and trouble thee with any businesse, not impose upon thee these and such like ex-actions: Make payment and contribute to this levy of money: Go in embassing to Rome: Receive fuch a captaine or ruler into thine house, or take such a charge upon thee at thine own expenses, Now he that calleth these things to remembrance, if he have any wit in his head, and be not overblind every way in his own opinion and ielie-conceit, will with and choose, if he be banished out of his own countrey, to inhabite the very Isle Gyaros, or the rough and barren Island Cinarus, where trees or plants do hardly grow, without complaining with griefe of heart, without lamenting and breaking out into these plaints and womanly mounes, reported by the Poet Simonides in these

The roaring noise of purple sca, Resounding all about, Doth fright me much and so inclose,

That I cannot get out.

But rather he will beare in mind and discourse with himselfe the speech that Philip King of Macedonie sometime delivered: for when his hap was in the wrestling place to fall backward and lye along onthe ground; after he was up againe upon his feet, and faw the whole proportion and print of his body in the dust of the floore: O Hercules (quoth he) what a small deale of the earth is out portion by the appointment of nature, and yet fee how we will not rest, but cover to conquer the whole world that is habitable ! You have feen (I suppose) the Isle Naxos; if not, yet at leastwife the Island Thuria neare by; of which twaine, this was in old time the habitation of Ocion; but in the other there dwelt Ephialtes and Osus: as for Alemaon, he made his abode and residence upon the muddy banke, which the river Achelous had newly gathered and cast up, after it was a little dried and compact together, to avoid the purfuit (as the Poets fay) of the Furies; but in my conceit rather because he would decline the offices of State, civill Magistracies, feditious broiles, and biting calumniations fibro furies in hell, he chose such a straight and narrow place to inhabite, where he might lead a life in quietnesse and repose secured from all such busie affaires. And Tiberius Cafar in his latter daies, lived sevenyeares (even untill his death) in the little Island Caprea, in such wise, as the very temple and imperiall throne of the whole world retired and drawn in (as it were) into the heart, for all that time never went out from thence; and yet for his part, the ordinary cares incident unto the Empire, which were brought from all parts and came upon him to amule his head continually, on every side, would not permit him to enjoy clearely without turbulent angusth of mind, that intended rest and quietnesse of his, in the said Island. But even that man, who may by his departure into some little Mand be freed and delivered from no small troubles and calamities, is notwithstanding miterable, if he do not eftsoones say unto himselse when he is apart, yea, and chant oftentimes there verses of Pindarus:

Love well the place where Cypres trees do grow, But thin and small. The forrest great let go Of Candy Ifle about the Ida hill: As for my selfe, small lands I hold and till, By fortune given and those without an oake; My heart likewise no griefes nor cares do you'ce.

Exempt I am from civill tumults and feditions; I am not subject to the command of Princes and Governours; my hand is not in the charge and administration of State affaires, nor in any publike ministries or services, which hardly admit excuse or refusall. For considering that Callimachus seemeth not unwifely in one place to say thus: Measure not wildome by the Persian Schoene: why 60. Stadia. then should we (meting felicity with Schanes and Parasanges) complaine, lament, and torment our 30. felves, as if we were unhappy, if our fortune be to dwell in alittle life which is not in circuit above two hundred furlongs, and nothing neare foure daies failing about, as Sieily is? For what good can a spacious and large region do, for to procure selicity, or make a man to lead a quiet and peaceable life? Heate you not how Tantalus in the Tragady crieth out, and saith thus?

The spacious land and countrey large, Call'd Berecynthian plaine, Daies journeys twelve right out, I for Tearely with corne and graine.

And a little after he proceedeth to this speech; But now my foule, sometime an heavenly power, Descended ti ence into this earthly lower, Speake thus to me: Learne and betimes take heeds Love not this world too much, I do thee reed.

And Naufithous leaving the wide and large countrey Hyperia, for that the Cyclopes were so neare neighbours unto it, and departing into an Island far remote from other men, where he lived alone by himselfe without conversing with any people:

From other mortall men apart,

Of furging sea within the heare provided for his citizens and subjects a most pleasant life. As for the Mands called Cyclades, they were at first (by report) inhabited by the children of Minos, and afterwards the off-spring of Codrus and Neleus held the same, into which foolish persons now-adaies thinke themselves fore punished and undone for ever, if they be confined. And yet, what Island is there destined and appointed for exiled and banished people, but it is larger than the territory Scilluntia, wherein Xenophon after that renowned expedition and voyage of his into Perfia, passed his old age in elegancy and much happinefle? Semblably, the Academy, a little pingle or plot of ground, the purchate whereof cost nor above three thousand drachmes, was the habitation of Plato, Xenocrates, and Polemon, wherein they kept their schooles, and lived at repose all their life-time: and yet I must needs except one day every yeare, upon which, Xenocrates was wontto go down to the City, for to see the plaies and passimes exhibited with new Tragadies at the feat called Bacchanales, only to honour (as folke faid) and countenance that solemnity with his personall presence. Also, Theocritus of Chios challenged and reproached Arifforle many times, for that to live in the Court of Philip and Alexan-

> Upon the mouth of Borborus to dwell He chose, and Academy bad farewell,

Now was this Borborus a river so called by the Macedonians, which ran along the City of Pella in Macedonie. As for Islands, Homer the Poet doth of purpose and expresly recommend unto us, and celebrate them with heavenly and divine praises, in this wife:

At Lemnos he arrived then, Whereas the City Stood. In which sometime that prince divine, King Thoas made abode: And what soever Lesbos Iste, The pallace and the feat Of gods above containes enclos'd Within her pourpris great. When won he had the stately Iste, Which Scyros fometime hight, The native place and town of Mars, The god of armes and fight. Likewife, And those came from Dulichium, And eke the facred Ifles, Against Elis, Echinades, Within sea many miles.

Moreover it is faid, that of famous and renowned men, devout Eolus, and best beloved of the gods, dwelt in one Isle; the most prudent and wise Wysses in another; Ajaxlikewise, that right valiant and hardy wariour; and Aleinous the most curteous prince for hospitality and entertainment of strangers were Islanders. Zeno the Philosopher, when news was brought unto him, That the ship of his which remained alone of all the rest was drowned in the sea with all the fraight and merchandise therein: Thou hast done well Ofortune (quoth he) to drive us to our studying gown and Philosophers life againe; even so, in my opinion, there is no reason that a man (unlesse he be very much beforted and transported with the vaine wind of popularity) when he is confined and inclosed within an Island, should complaine of sortune therefore, but rather praise her forthat she hath ridhim of much anguish of spirit and trouble of his head, delivered him from tedioustravell and wandring pilgrimages up and down in the world from place to place; freed him from the perilsof fea, removed him from the tumultuous stirs of the multitude in judiciall courts and publike affemblies of the City; and reduced him to a fetled and stated life, full of rest and tranquillity, not distracted with any superfluous and needlesse occupations, wherein he may live irdeed properly to himfelfe, being ranged within the center and circumference of those things which are required only for necessity. For what Island is there that hath not houses, walking places, stouphs and baines, or that is without fishes or hares, if a man be disposed to passe the time in fishing or hunting; and that which is the greatest matter of all, you may oftentimes there enjoy fully your rest and repose, which others do so much thirst and hunger after; for whereas when we are haply playing at dice, or otherwife keeping close at home, there will be some of these sycophants or busic priers and curious searchers into all our actions, ready to draw us out of our houses of pleasure in the suburbs, or out of our delightsome gardens, to make our appearance judicially in the common place, or to perform our fervice or give attendance in the court : there will be none such about to faile into the Island where thou art confined for to trouble thee; none will come to thee to demand or crave any thing, to borrow money, to request thy juretiship, or the albidance for to second himin the fute of any office and magistracy; unlesse perudventure some of thy best friends only and nearest kinssolke, of meere love and affectionate defire to fee thee, faile over for thy fake; for the reft of thy life befides is permitted to be as free and fafe as a fanctuary, not fubject to any ipoile, trouble, or moleftation if thou be willing and canst skill to use thy liberty and repose. As for him who thinketh those to be happy who renden and down in the world abroads ipending most part of their time out of their own houses, either in common inves and hostelries, or elie in terrying from place to place, he is much like unto him that supposeth the wandring Planets to be in a better state than the other stars which be fixed in the firmament and remove not; and yet there is not one of the faid planets but is carried round in a peculiar and proper sphære of its own, as it were in a certaine life, keeping alwaies a just order in their revolution: for according as Herachtus faith; The very fun himlelfe will never paffe beyond his bounds; and if he do, the furies which are the ministers of justice will find him our and be ready to encounter him. But these and all such hike reasons, my good triend, we are to alledge upto them and fing in their cares, who being fent away and confined to fome one Hie, cannot poli-thly change for another country, nor liave commerce and dealing in any place elle whatfoever, those I say, April of hor

Whom surging waves of Sea both night and day Enclose perforce, and cause them there to stay.

As for you unto whom no certaine place is limited and affigned for to inhabit, but who are debarred and excluded only out of one, are thus to thinke, that the exclusion out of one City alone, is an overture and ready way made unto all others.

Now if any man will object and fay; In this case of exile and banishment we are disabled for bearing rule and office of State, went not at Councell table in the Senate houle; we are not prefidents in the publike plaies and folemnities. Scc. You may answer and reply againe in this manner; neither are we troubled with factions and civill diffentions; we are not called upon, nor charged with paiments in publike levies and exactions; neither be we bound to make court unto great governous, and to give attendance at their gates inor to take case and regard whether he who is chofen to succeed us in the government of our Province, be either hasty and cholerick, or otherwise given to oppression and hard dealing: but as Architochus, making no account at all' of the fruitfull come-fields and planteous vineyards in Thasas, despised and contemned the whole Isle, because of fome other rough, hard, and uneven places in it, giving out thereof in these termes,

This Island like an affer back dorb sticke,

All overspread with woods so wild and thicke.

Even so we casting our eyes and fixing them upon that part only of exile which is the worst and vileft of the rest, do contempe and make no reckoning of the repose from businesse, the liberty also and leiture which it doth afford. And yet the Kings of Persia be reputed happy, in that they passe their winter time in Babylon, the summer in Media, and the most sweet and pleasant part of the spring at Sufa. May not he likewise who is departed out of his own native countrey, during the solemnity of the mysteries of Ceres, make his abode within the city Elensine; all the time of the Bacchanales, celebrate that feast in Argos; and when the Pythian games and plaies are exhibited, go to Delphos; as allo when the Ishmian pastimes be represented, make a journey likewise to Corinth? In case he be a man who taketh pleasure in the diversity of shews and publike spectacles, if not then either sit still and reft, or else walke up and down, read somewhat, or take a nap of sweet sleep without molestarion or interruption of any man: and according as Diogenes was wont to fay, Aristotle dineth when it pleaseth King Philip; but Diogenes taketh his dinner when Diogenes thinketh it good himselfe, without any bufinesse and affaires to distract him, and no Magistrate, Ruler, or Captaine there was to interrupt his ordinary time and manner of diet. This is the reason why very few of the wisest and most prudent men that ever were, have been buried in the countries where they were borne; but the most part of them without any constraint or necessity to enforce them, have willingly weighed anchor, and of their own accord failed to another rode or haven to harbour in, and there to lead their life; for some of them have departed to Athens, others have for saken Athensand gone to other places: for what man ever gave out fuch a commendation of his own native countrey, as did Euripides in these verses in the person of a woman:

Our people all, at first not strangers were, From forraine parts who hither did arrive; Time out of mind those that inhabit here, Were borne in place, and foremain'd alive. All Cities else and Nations at one word With aliens people be, who like to men At table play, or else upon chesse-boord Removedhave, andlept some now, some then. If women we may be allow dro grace
Our native forte, and with proud words exalt,
Pressume we done to lay that in this place,
A temperate aire we have without default,
Where neither heast nor cold excession is;
If ought there be that noble Greece doth yeeld,
Or Aliarich, of best commodities,
And daintiess frists, by river or by field,
We have it here, in soft on plentifull
To hunt, to catch, to reape, to crop and pull,

And yet even he who hath set such goodly praises upon his native countrey, lest the same, went into Macedonia, and there lived in the court of King Archelaus, You have heard likewise (I suppose) this little Epigram in verie:

Enterred and entombed lieth here, Euphorians son the Poet Ækhylus (In Athens town though born sometime he were) To Gelas neere, in corne so plenteous.

For he also abandoned his own countrey, and went to dwell in Sicily, like as Simonides did before him. And whereas this title or inscription is commonly read (This the History written by Herodous the Halicarnassea) many there be who correct it and write in this manner; Herodous the Thurians, for that he removed out of the countrey wherein he was borne, became an inhabitant among the Thurians, and enjoyed the freedome of that colony. As for that heavenly and divine spirit in the knowledge of Muies and Poetry, Homerus, who with wordrous pen, Set forth the battels Phrygien.

What was it that caused so many Cities to debate about the place of his nativity, challenging every one unto themselves, but only this; that he seemed not to praise and extoll any one City above the reft? Moreover, to Jupiter furnamed Hospitall, know we not that there be many, and those right great honours done. Now if any one shall say unto me, that these personages were all of them ambitious, aspiring to great honour and glory, do no more, but have recourse unto the Sages, and those wife schooles and learned colledges of Athens,; call to mind and consider the renowned clarkes and famous Philotophers, either in Lycaum or the Academy: go to the gallery Stoa, the learned schoole Palladium, or the Musick-schoole Odaum. If you affect, love, and admire above all other the fe & of Peripateticks, Ariftotle the Prince thereof was borne in Stagira, a City of Macedonia; Theophrastus in Eressus; Strate came from Lampsacus; Glycon from Treas; Ariston from Chies; and Critolaus from Phaselus. If your mind stand more to praise the Stoicks, Cleanthes was of Assos; Zeno was a Citiean; Chryfippus came from Soli; Diogenes from Babylon; and Antipater from Tharfus; and Archidamus, being an Athenian borne, went to dwell among the Parthians, and left behind him at Babylon in succession the Stoick discipline and Philosophy. Who was it that chased and drave these men out of their native countries? Certes none, but even of their own accord and voluntary motion they fought all abroad for their contentment and repose, which hardly or not at all canthey enjoy at home in their own houses who are in any authority and reputation; so that as they have taught us very well out of their books other good sciences which they professed; so this one point of living in quietnesse and rest they have shewed unto us by practise and example. And even in these daies also, the most renowned and approved clarkes, yea, and greatest men of marke and name live in strange countries; far remote from their own habitations; not transported by others, but of themselves removing thither; not banished, sent away, and confined, but willing to flie and avoid the troublesome affaires, negotiations, and businesse which their native countries amuse them with, That this is true it may appeare by the most approved, excellent, and commendable works and compositions which ancient writers have left unto posterity; for the absolute finishing whereof it seemeth that the Musequied the help and means of their exile. Thus Thursdides the Athenian penned the war between the Peloponnesians and the Athenians whiles he was in Thracia, and namely, neare unto a place called the Forest of the Fosse. Xenophon compiled his story at Scillos in Élea; Philip wrote in Epirus; Timaus who was borne at Taurominum in Sicily, became a writer in Athens; Androini the Athenian at Megara, and Bachilides the Poet in Peloponnesus; who all and many others besides, being banished out of their countries, were never discouraged nor cast down, but shewed the vivacity and vigour of their good spirits, and tooke their exile at fortunes hands as a good maintenance and provision of their journey; by meanes whereof they live in same and renown now after their death: whereas on the other fide there remaineth no memoriall at all of those by whose factions and fidings they were driven out and exiled. And thereforehe deferveth to be well mocked, who thinketh that banishment carrieth with it some note of infamy and reproach, as necessarily adherent thereto. For what fay you to this? Is Diagenes to be counted infamous, whom when King Alexander saw sitting in the sun she approached neare, and standing by him, demanded whether he stood in need of any thing or no? He had no other answer from him but this, that he had need of nothing elle, but that he should stand a little out of the sun-shine, and not shadow him as he did; whereupon Alexander wondring at his magnatimity and haughty courage, faid prefently unto those friends that were about him; If I were not Alexander I would be Diagenes. And was Camillus disgraced any way for being banished out of Rome, considering that even at this day he is reputed and taken for the second founder thereof? Neither lost Themissocles the glory which he had won among the Greeks by his exile, but rather acquired thereto great honour and estimation with the Barbarians. And no man is there so base minded and carelesse of honour and credit, but he would choose rather to be Themissocles banished as he was, than Leobases his accuser, and the cause of his banishment; yea, and to be Ciero who was exiled, than Cledius who chased him out of Rome; or Timothess, who was constrained to abandon and toriake his native country, than Artisophon who endited him, and caused him to leave the same. But for that the authority of Eswipules, who seement mightily to defame and condemne banishment, moverth many men; let us consider what he his several questions and answers to this point:

Jocasta. How then lis it a great calamity Tologe the place of our nativity? Polynices. The great of crosse I hold it is doubtlesse, And more indeed than my tongue can expresse. Jocasta. The manner would I gladly understand, And what doth grieve man shut from native land? Polynices. This one thing first, the forest griefe must be, That of their speech they have not liberty. Tocalta. A spight it is no doubt, and that of servile kind, For men to be debar'd to fpeake their mind. Polynices. Besides, they must endure the fool shnesse, Andignorance of rulers, more or leffe.

But herein I cannot allow of his sentence and opinion as well and truly delivered. For first and formost, not to speake what a man thinketh, is not the point of a slavish and base person, but rather he is to be counted a wise and prudent man, who can hold histongue at those times, and in such occassons as require tacitumity and silence; which the same Poet hath taught us in another place more wilely, when he saith, > Silence is good when that it doth availe; Likewife to speake in time and not to faile.

And as for the folly and ignorance of great and mightyperfons, we must abide no lesse when wetarry at home than in exile; nay, it falleth out many times, that men at home feare much more the calumniations and violence of those who unjustly are in high places of authority within Cities, than if they were abroad and out of their own Countries. Againe, this also is mot falle and abourd, that the laid Poet depriveth banished persons of their liberty and franke speech. Certes, this were a wonderfull matter that Theodorus wanted his freedome of tongue, considering that when King Lysimachus iaid unto him: And hath thy Countrey chaied and cast thee out, being so great a personamong them; Yea, (quoth he againe) for that it was no more able to beare me, than Semele to beare Bacchus: neither was he daunted and afraid, not with standing that the King shewed unto him Telefphorus en losed within an iron cage, whose eyes he had cauled before to be pulsed out of his head, his nose and earesto be cropt, and his tongue to be cut, adding withall these words: See how I handle thoie that dipleate and abuse my person. And what shall we say of Diogenes? Wanted he (think you) his liberty of speech? Who being come into the Campe of King Philip, at what time as he made an expedition against the Grecians invaded their countrey, and was ready to give them battel, was apprehended and brought before the King as a spie, and charged therewith: I am indeed (quoth he) come hither to spie your insatiable avarice, ambition, and folly, who are about now to hazard in one houre (as it were) with the cast of a die, not only your crown and dignity, but also your life and person; sembiably what thinke you of Annibal the Carthaginian? Washe tongue-tied before Antiochus, banished though himselse were, and the other a mighty Monarch? For when he advised Antiochus to take the opportunity presented unto him, and to give battell unto the Romans his enemies, and the King having secrificed unto the gods answered again that the entrailes of the beast killed for sacrifice, would not permit, but forbad him so to do: Why then (quoth he by way of reproofe and rebuke) you will do the belike which a peece of dead flesh biddeth you, and not that which a man of wildome and understanding counselleth you unto. But neither Geometricians, nor those that the lineary demonstrations, if haply they be banished, are deprived of their liberty, but that they may discourse and speake frankely of their art, and science of such things as they have learned and known: how then should good, honest, and honourable persons be debarred of that freedome, in case they be exited? But in truth, it is cowardise and basenesse of mind, which alwaies stoppeth the voice, tieth the tongue, stifleth the wind-pipe, and causeth men to be speechlesse. But proceed we to that which followeth afterwards in Europides:

Jocasta. But thus we say those that are banished With bopes alwaies of better daies be fed. Good eyes they have, afar off they do see, Staying for things that most uncertaine be.

Certainly, these words imply rather a blame and reprehension of folly, than of exile. For they be not those who have learned and do know how to apply themselves unto things present, and to use their cliate such as it is, but such as continually depend upon the expectance of suture fortunes, and cover evermore that which is absent and wanting, who are tossed to and fro with hope as in a little punt or boat floating upon the water; yea, although they were never in their lifetime without the walls of the City wherein they were botne: moreover, whereas we read in the same Euripides,

Of Banishment.

Thy fathers friends and allses have not they Been kind and helpfull to thee, as they may? Polynices. Looke to thy felfe, from troubles God thee bleffe, Friendshelp is nought, if one be in distresse. Tocasta. Thy noble blood, from whence thou art descended: Hathit not thee advanc'd and much amended? Polynices.

I hold it ill to be in want and need, For parentage and birth do not men feed.

These speeches of Polynices are not only untrue, but also bewray his unthankfulnesse, when he seemeth thus to blame his want of honour and due regard for his nobility, and to complaine that he was destitute of friends by occasion of his exile, considering that in respect of his noble birth, banished though he were, yet so highly honoured he was that he was sthought worthy to be matched in marriage with a Kings daughter, and as for friends, allies, and confederates, he was able to gather a puissant army of them, by whose aide and power he returned into his own countrey by sorce of arms, as himselie testifieth a little after in these words:

Many a Lord and Captaine brave here stands With me in field, both from Mycenæ bright, And Cities more of Greece, whose helping hands (Though loath) I must needs use in claime of right. Much like also be the speeches of his mother lamenting in this wise;

No nuptiall torch at all I lighted have To thee as doth a wedding feast befeeme, No marriage fong was fung nor thee to lave Was water brought from faire Imenus ftreame.

Whom it had become and behoved rather to rejoyce and beglad in heart, when she heard that her fon was fo highly advanced and married into fo royall an house; but in taking griefe and forrow her selfe that there was no wedding torch lighted, and that the river Ismenns affordeth no water to bathe in at his wedding; as if new married bridegroomes could not be furnished either with fire or water in the City Argos; she attributeth unto exile, the inconveniences which more truly proceed from vanity and folly But some man will say unto me; That to be banished is a note of ignominy and reproach: true it is indeed, but among fooles only, who thinke likewise that it is a strame to be poore, to be bald, to be small of stature, yea, and to be a stranger for sooth, a tenant, inmate, or alien inhabitant: For certes such as will not suffer themselves to be carried away with these vaine perswasions, nor do subscribe thereto, esteeme and have in admiration good and honest persons, never respecting whether they bepoore, strangers, and banished or no: Do we not see that all the world doth honour and reverence the temple of Thefens as well as Parthenon and Eleufinium, Temples dedicated to Minerva, Cres, and Proferpina? And yet was The few banished from Askens; even that The few by whose meanes the same City was first peopled, and is at this day inhabited; and that City lost he which he held not from another, but sounded first himselse. As for Elemis, what beauty at all would remaine in it? If we dishonour Eumolpus, and be ashamed of him, who removing out of Thracia, instituted at first among the Greeks the religion of sacred mysteries, which continueth in force and is observed at this day: what shall we say of Codrus who became King of Athens? Whose son I pray you was he? Was not Melanthius his father a banished man from Messina. Can you chuse but commend the answer of Antisthenes to one who said unto him; Thymother is a Phrygian: So was (quoth he) the mother of the gods: why answer you not likewise when you are reproached with your banishment ¿ Even so was the father of that victorious conquerour Hercules: the grand-fire likewise of Bacchus, who being sent out forto seeke Lady Europa, never returned backe into his own native Countrey:

For being a Phanician borne, At Thebes he after did arrive, Far from his native foile beforne, And there begat a son belive, Who Bacchus did engender tho, That moves to fury women, hight Mad Bacchus running to and froz

In service. Such is his delight. As for that which the Poet Ejehylus would feeme covertly by these darke words to infinuate, or rather to shew a far off, when he faith thus:

And chafte Apollo facred though he were,

Tet banished a time, heaven did forbeare. I am content to passe over in silence, and will sorbeare to utter according as Herodot w saith: and whereas Empedacles in the very beginning of his Philosophy maketh this præface:

An ancient law there stands in force, Decreed by gods above, Grounded upon necessity, And never to remove: That after man hath stein'd his hands In bloudshed horribles And in remorfe of sinis vext With horror terrible. The long-liv'd angels which attend In heaven, shall chase him quites For many thousand yeares from view Of every bleffed wight : By vertue of this law, am I From gods exiled now, And wander here and therethroughout The world I know not how.

This he meaneth not of himfelfe alone, but of all us after him, whom he declareth and sheweth by thele words to be meere strangers, passengers, forreiners, and banished perions in this world. For it is not bloud (quoth he) O men, nor vitall spirit contemperatetogether, that hath given unto us the substance of our soule and beginning of our life; but hereof is the body only composed and framed, which is earthly and mortall; but the generation of the soule which commeth another way, and descendesh hither into these parts beneath, he doth mitigate and feeme to diguife by the most gentle and mild name that he could device, calling it a kinde of pilgrimage from the naturall place; but to use the right terms indeed, and to speake according to the very truth. The doth vague and wander as banished, chafed, and driven by the divine laws and statutes to and fro, untill such time as it feeleth to a body, as an oyster or shell sish to one rockor other in an Island beaten and dashed upon with many winds and waves of the sea round about, (as Plato faith) for that it doth not remember nor call to mind from what height of honour, and from how bleffed an estate it is translated, not changing, as a man would say, Sardisfor Athens, nor Corinth for Lemnos or Serros, but her refiance in the very heaven and about the moone, with the abode upon earth, and with a terrestrial life; whereas it thinketh it strange and as much discontented here for that it hath made exchange of one place for another not farre distant; much like unto a poore plant that by removing doth degenerate and begin to witheraway: and yet wefee, that for certaine plants some soyle is more commodious and sortable than another, wherein they will like, thrive, and prosper better: whereas contrariwise there is no place that taketh from a man his felicity, no more than it doth his vertue, fortitude, or wildome: for Anaxagoras during the time that he was in prison wrote his Quadrature of the Circle, and Sacrates, even when he dranke poylon, discourted as a Philosopher, exhoring his friends and familiars to the study of Philosophy, and wasby them reputed happy; but contrastwife Phaeton and Icarus, who (as the Poets do report) would needs mount up into heaven, through their owne folly and inconsiderate rashnesse, sell into most grievous and woesfull cala-

That we ought not to take up Money upon Usury.

The Summary.

He coverous defire of earthly goods is a passion incurable, but especially after that it kath cottentie mastery of the soule, in such fort, as the advertisements which are made in regard of covetous men be not proposed for any thing else but for the profit and benefit of those persons who are to keep themselve from the nets and frares of these enemies of humans society. Now among all those who have need of good counfels in this behalfe, we must range them that take up money upon interest, who serving as a prey and booty to these greedy and hungry hunters, ought so much the rather to locke unto their own preservation, if they would not be cruelly devoured. And as this infortunity hath been in the world ever fince the entry of fin, that alwaies some or other, yea, and great numbers have endeavoured to make their commodity and ins, that alwates joint or other stea, and great numbers have endeavoured to make their commodity and gaine by the left and dammage of their neighbours is to be may fee here, that in Plutarchs time thing; were grown to a wonderfull confusion, the which is nothing diminished since, but contraviwise it seemed that in these our dailes it is come to the very height. And forto apply some remedy hereto, our duthous leaveth users slogesther absorption are always and engaged to go all remonstrance, and always about of all remonstrance, and always about of all remonstrance, and always about of all remonstrances, and always and lay open unto them the snares and netsing the state of to which they plunge themselves; and this he dosh without specifying or particularising over-neare of usury, because there is no meane or measure limited, nor any end of this furious desire of gathering and heaping upthings corruptible. Confidering then that covetous folke have neither nerve nor veine that reacheth or tendeth to the pity of their neighbours, meet it is and good reason that borrowers should have some mercy and compassion of themselves to weigh and ponder well the grave discourses of this Author, and to mercy and companies of the life of legist therefore, that the principal meanes to keep and fave the apply the fame unto the right use. He faith therefore, that the principal meanes to keep and fave the selves from the teeth of usury, it to make the best of their own, and shift with those things that they have about them, before they approach unto the denne of this hungry and greedy beaft, and that men ought to make an hand and quicke dispatch of that which is not very necessary, before they come thither; where be taxeth those who had lever lay to gage and paren their goods, and remaine under the burden of ulury, than to sell up all and diseage themselves at once. After this, he presenteth the true remedy of this misconstoled up an august and frend in measures and so cause up to be more wary and better advised, be proposed the lively image of this borrible monster, whom we call an Usurer, describing hims in discolored with all his practices and p stone. Which done, he sheweth the source of borrowing meney upon intense, and the way to stop the same; he directeth his pen particularly first unto the poore, giving them a goodly leffon, and then unto the richer fort, teaching the one as well as the other, how they are to demeane and carry themselves, that they be not exposed to the clutches of usurers. And for a conclusion, he exhortesh them to behold the example of certaine Philosophers by name, who chose rather to abandone and forsate. all their goods, than to undo themselves in the possession and holding thereof.

That we ought not to take up Money upon Usury.

Lato in his books of Lawes, permitteth not one neighbour to make bold with anothers water, before he have digged and funkea pit fo deep in his own ground, that he is come to a veine of clay or potters earth; untill (I,fay) he have founded thorowly, and found that the plot of ground is not apt to ingender water, or yield a fprings; I for the faid potters clay being by nature fatty, folid, and ftrong, reteineth that motiture which it hath once received, and will not let it foake or paffe thorow: I but allowed they are, and ought to furnish themfelves with water from others, when they have no meanes to find any of their own, foras finish as the Law intendeth to provide for mens necessity, and not to favour their idlenesse; even for there ought to be an ordinance and act for touching money; That it might not be lawfull for those to borrow upon usury, nor to go into other mens puries (as it were) to draw water at their wells or pits, before they have cast about all meanes at home, searched every way, and gathered (asit were) from every gutter and springstrying and assaying how to draw and come by that which may serve their own turns, and supply their present necessities. But now it falleth out contrariwise, that many therebe, who to sumish their solids and riotous expences, or else to accomplish their superstuous and chargeable delights, never serve their own turns, nor make use of those things which they have, but are ready to seeke unto others, even to their great cost, though they shad inno need at all:

for an undoubted and certaine proofe hereof, marke how Usurers do not ordinarily put forth their money unto those who are innecessity and distresse, but to such as be defrous to purchase and get that which is superfluous, and whereof they stand not in need; infomuch as that which is credited out and delivered unto him that borroweth, is a good proofe and sufficient restimony, that he hath somewhat to take to of his own; whereas indeed he ought (since he hath wherewith) to looke unto it, that he take not upon interest, and contrariwise, not to be credited, nor to be in the niteres book, is an argument that such an one is needy.

Why dost thou repaire and make court (asit were) obsequiously to a banker or merchant: goethy waies and borrow of thine owne banke, make a friend of thine owne flocke; flaggons thou haft, and pots, chargers, balons, and dishes all of filter plate 5 imploy the same about thy necessities, for to supply thy wants, and when thou hast disfurnished thy table and cup-boord, the gentle town Autis, or elethe Isle Tenedos, will make up all again with faire vessels of earth and pottery, which is much more neat and pure than those of filver; for these carry not the strong smell, nor unpleasant sent of usury, which like rust or canker, every day more and more, suitieth, fretteth, and eateth into thy costly magnificence; these will not put thee in mind daily of the calends and new moones, which being in it felfe the most facred and holy day of the month, is by meanes of the usurers, become odious and accursed. For as touching those, who choose rather to lay their goods to gage, and to pawne them for to borrow money thereupon and pay for use, than to fell them right out, I am verily persivaded that god Jupiter himselfe iurnamed Ctefius, that is, Possessor, cannot save them from beggery. Abashed they are to receive the price and value of their goods to the worth; but they be not ashamed to pay interest for the lone of money. And yet that wise and politike Perioles caused the costly robe and attire of the statue of Minerva, weighing forty talents in fine gold, to be made in such fort, that he might take it off and put it on as he would at his pleasure; To the end (quoth he) that when we stand in reed of money for maintenance of warre, we may ferve our turnes therewith forthetime, and afterwards put in the place agains another of no leffe weight and worth; even to we likewife in our occafions and affaires, like as in the befigging of a City, ought never to admit the garrison of an Uforer or enemy, nor to endure to before our eyes our own goods de ivered out for to continue in perpetuall fer fitude, bushather to cut off from our Table all that is neither profitable nor necessary; likewife from our beds, from our couches, and our ordinary expense; in diet whatsoever is needlesse, thereby to maintaine and keepe our selves free, in hope and with full intent to supply and make amends againe for it, if fortune afterwards smile upon us. Certes, the Roman dames in times past were willing to part with their jewels and ornaments of gold, yea, and give themaway as an offering of first fruits to. Apollo Pythina, whereof was made a golden cup, and the same sent to the City of Delphi. And the Matrons of Carthage shore the haire of their heads, to make thereof twisted cords for to wind up and bend their engines and instruments of artillery in the defence of their country, when the City was befreged. But we, as if we were a-fnamed of our owne fufficiency, and to stand upon our owne bottomes, seeketo enthrallour felves by gages and obligations; whereas it behooved us much more by reflraining our felves, and reducing all to such things only as be profitable and good for us, of thoseneedlesse, unprofitable, and superfluous vessels which we have, after they be either melted, broken in peeces, or fold, to build a priviledge chappell of liberty, for our felves, our wives and children. For the goddesse Diana in Ephesus yeelded sanctuary, franchise, and saveguard unto all debtors against their creditors, who fled for succour into her temple. But the farictuary indeed of parsimony, frugality, and moderate expense, into which no usurers can make entry, for to hale and pull out of it any debtor prisoner, standeth alwaies open for those that are wise, and affordeth unto them a large space of joyous and honourable repose. For like as that Prophetesse which gave oracles in the temple of Pythius Apollo, about the time of the Medians warre, made answer unto the Athenian Embassadours: That God gave unto them for their safety a wall of wood; whereupon they leaving their lands and possessions, abandoning their City, and forsaking their houses and all the goods therein, had recourse unto their ships for to save their liberty; even so, God giveth unto us woodden tables, earthen vessels, and garments of course cloath, if we would live in freedome:

> Sct not thy mind upon steeds of great price, And chariots brave in silver harnesse dight, With clashes, with hooks, and studs by fine device Twrought, in race to shew a goodly sight.

For how fwift foever they be, these ulurers will some overtake them and run beyond. But father get upon the pext afte thou meetest with, or the first pack-horse that commeth in thy way, to flie from the surer, as sometimes did that barbarous King of Media: but that which worse is, toucheth thy liberry, as sometimes did that barbarous King of Media: but that which worse is, toucheth thy liberry, woundeth thine honour and credit by proscriptions, writs, and open proclamations. If rhou pay him not to his content, he is ready to trouble thee; if thou have wherewish to faitssic himshe will not receive thy payment unsessed by the commentation of the will have them under their worsh; at thou not disposed to make a sale of them? he will store thee to it; dost thou sue him for his extreame dealing, he will seem to offer parley of agreement; if thou several unto him that thou wilt make payment, he will impose upon thee hard conditions, and have thee at command ; if thou go to his house for tol peake and conferre with him, he will lock the gates against thee; and if thou stay at home and keep house thou shalt have him rapping at thy doore; he will not away but take up his lodging there with thee. For in what stead served the law of Solon in Athens, wherein it was ordained, that among the Athenians mens bodies should not be obliged for any civil debt? Confidering that they be in bondage and flavery to all banquers and usurers, who force men to keep in their heads; and that which more is, not to them alone (for that were not such a great matter) but even to their very flayes, being proud, infolent, barbarous, and outragious, fuch as Plato describeth the devils and nery executioners in hell to be, who torment the foules of wicked and godleffe persons. For surely their curied usurers make thy hall and judicial place of justice no better than a very hell and place of torment to their poore debtors, where after the manner of greedy geirs and hungry griffons, they flay mangle, and eate them to the very bones,

Andof their beaks and talons keene, The markes within their flesh be seene.

And some of them they stand continually over not suffering them to touch and taste their own proper goods, when they have done their vintage and gathered in their come and other fruits of the earth, making them fast and pine away like unto Tantalus. And like as King Darius sent against the City of Athens his Lieutenants Generall Datis and Artaphernes with chaines, cords, and halters in their hands, therewith to bind the prisoners which they should take; semblably these usurers bring into Greece with them their boxes and caskets full of schedules, bils, hand-writings and contracts obligatory, which be as good as to many irons and fetters to hang upon their poore debtors; and thus they go up and down leaping from City to City, where they fow not as they passe along good and profitable feed, as Tripidemus did in old time; but plant their roots of debts, which bring forth infinite troubles and intolerable uturies, whereof there is no end, which eating as they go and spreading their spurns round about, in the end cause whole Cities to stoope and sinke, yea, and to be ready to inflocate and thranglethem. It is reported of hares, that at one time they fuckle young the debts of these barbirous, wicked, and crueilusurers do the generated with all to conceive affects but the debts of these barbirous, wicked, and crueilusurers do the generated with all to conceive. For in putting out their money they redemand it presently; in laying it down they take it up, they deliver that againe for interest which they received and took in consideration for lone and use. It is faid of the Messenians City,

Gate after gate amanshall here find, And yet one gate there's alwaies behind. But it may better be faid of usurers:

Usury here upon wary doth grow, And end thereof you never (hall know,

And herewithall in some fort they laugh at natural Philosophers, who hold this Axiome, That of nothing can be ingendred nothing: for with them usury is bred of that which neither is, nor ever was; of that, I say, which never had subsistence nor being. Howbeit these men thinke it a shame and reproach to be be a publicane, and take to farme for a rent the publike revenews, notwithstanding the laws do permit and allow that calling whereas themselves against all the laws of the world exact a rent and custome for that which they purforth to usury; or rather to speake a truth, in lending their money they defraud their debtors as bankrupts do their creditors. For the poore debtor who receiveth leffe than he hath fet down in his obligation, is most fallely couzened, deceived, and cut short of that which he outgh to have. And verily the Persians repute lying to be a sin but in a second degree: for in the first place they reckon to owe money and be indebted; inatmuch as leasing followeth commonly those that be in debt. But yet usurers lye more than they neither are there any that practice more falshood and deceit in their day debt-books wherein they write, that to such a one they have delivered to much, whereas indeed it is far leffe; and to the motive of their lying is faire avarice, and neither indigence nor poverty, but even a milerable covetoulnesse and defire ever to have more and more; the end whereof turneth neither to pleasure nor profit unto themselves, but to the losse and ruine of those whom they wringand wrong: for neither till they those grounds which they take away from their debtors, nor dwell in the houses out of which they turne them, nor eate their meat upon those tables which they have from them, ne yet clad themselves with their apparell of which they spoile them; but first one is destroyed, then a second followeth after, and is allured as a prey by the other. And this is much like to wild-fire, which still confumeth, and yet encreaseth alwaies by the utter decay and destruction of all that salleth into it, and devoureth one thingafter another. And the uturer which maintaineth this fire, blowing and kindling it with the ruine of so many people gaineth thereby no more fruit than this that after a certaine time he taketh his booke of accounts in hand, and there readeth what a number of debtors he hath bought out of house and home, how many he hath dispossessed of their land and living, from whence he hath come and whither he hath gone in turning, winding, and heaping up his filver. Now I would not, that you should thus thinke of me, that I speake all this upon any deadly war and enmity that I have fworne against usurers,

For God be praifed they neither horfes mine Have driven away nor oxen ne yet kine.

But only to shew unto them who are to ready to take up money upon usury, what a villanous, shamefull, and base thing there is init, and how this proceedeth from nothing else but extreame folly and timidity of heart. If thou have therewith to weild the world, never come into the usurers book, confidering thou hast no need to borrow. Hast thou not wherewith, yet take not money up and pay not interest, because thou shalt have no meanes to make payment. But let us consider the one and the other apart by it selfe. Old Caro said unto a certaine aged man, who behaved himselfe very badly: Myfriend (quoth he) considering that old age of it selle hath so many evils, how commeth it to paffe that you adde thereto moreover the reproach and shame of lewdnesseand mildemeanour? Even fo may we say, seeing that poverty of it selfe hath so many and so great miseries, do not you over and above go and heap thereupon the troubles and anguishes that come of borrowing and being indebt; neither take thou from penury that only good thing wherein it excelleth riches, to wir, the want of carking and penfive cares; for otherwife thou shalt be subject unto the mockery implied by this common proverbe:

Agout alone when beare unneth I may, An one upon my shoulder you do lay.

Semblably you being not able to fulfaine poverty alone, do fur harge your felfe with an usurer, a burden hardly iupportable eventor a rich and wealthy man. How then would you have me to live? Haply some man will say: And dost thou indeed askethis question, having hands and feet of thise own? Having the gift of speech, voice, and being a man, unto whom it is given both to love and also to be loved; as well to do a pleasure, as to receive a cuttesie with thanklyiving. Thou maiest teach Grammar, bring up young children, be a porter or doore-keeper; thou maiest be a failer or marriner, thou maielt row in a barge or galley: for none of all these trades is more reproachfull, odious, or troublesome, than to heare one say unto thee: Pay me mine own, or dish harge the debt that thou owest me, Ruilius that rich Roman comming upon a time at Ronic to Musonius the Philosopher, said unto him thus in his eare: Musonius, Jupiter surnamed Saviour, whom you and such other Philosophers as you are, make profession to imitate and follow, taketh up no money at interests but Mulonius smiling againe, returned him this present answer: No more doth he putforth any money for use.

Now this Ratilius, who was an uturer, reproached the other for taking money at interest, which was a foolish arrogant humour of a Stoick: for what need hadst thou Revilius to meddle with Jupires Savon, and alledge his name, confidering that a man may report the felf lame by those very things which are lamiliar and apparent? The swallows are not in the usurers book the pitinires pay not for use of money and yet to them hath not nature given either hands or reason, or any art and mystery; whereas she hath endued man with such abundance of understanding, and aptnesset learne and practice, that he canskill not only to nourish himselfe, but also to keep horses, hounds, partridges, hares, and jayes: why dost thou then disable and condemnethy lesse, as if thou wert lesse docible and semble than a jay, more mute than a partridge, more idle than a dog, in that thou canst make no meanes to have good of a man, neither by double diligence, by making court, by observance and service, norby maintaining his quarrell, and entring into combate in his defence? Seetl thou not how the earth doth bring forthmany things, and how the sea affordeth as many for the use of man? And verily as Cratesfaith:

If an my felfe how Mycilus wooll did card, And how with him his wife the rolls did fin: Thus, during war, when times were extreame hard,

Both joyntly wrought, to keep them from famine.

King Antigonus when he had not of a long time feen Cleanthes the Philosopher, meeting him one day in Athens, spake unto him and said : How now Cleanthes, dost thou grind at the mill, and turne the querne-stone still? Yea fir (quoth Cleanthes againe) I grind yet, and I do it for to earne my living; howbeit for all that, I give not over my profession of Philosophy. O the admirable courage and high spirit of this man, who comming from the mill, with that very hand which turned about the stone, ground the meale and kneaded the dough, wrote of the nature of the gods, of the moon, of the stars, and the sun! But we do thinke all these to be base and servile workes; and yet verily; because we would be free (God wot) we care not to thrust our selves into debt, we pay for the use of money, we flatter vile and base persons, we give them presents, we invite and feast them, we yeeld (asit were)tribute under-hand unto them; and this we do not in regard of poverty, (for no man useth to put forth his money into a poore mans hand) but even upon a superfluity and riotous expence of our own: for if we could content our felves with thole things that are necessary for the life of man, there would not be an usurer in the world, no more than there are Centaures and monstrous Gorgones. But excesse it is and daintinesse which hath ingendred usurers; like as the same hath bred gold-imiths, filver-fmiths, confectioners, perfumers, and diers of gallant colours. We come not in debt to bakers and vintners for our bread and wine; but we owe rather for the price and purchase of faire houses and lands, for a great number and retinue of slaves, of fine mules of trimme halls and dining chambers of rich tables, and the costly furniture belonging thereto, besides other foolish and excessive expenses, which we oftentimes are at, when we exhibite plaies and solemne pastimes into whole cities for to gratifie and do pleasure unto the people; and that upon a vaine ambition and defire of popular favour; and many times we receive no other truit of all our cost and labour, but ingratitude. Now hethat is once envrapped in debt, remaineth a debtor flill all the daies of his life; and he fareth like to an horle, who after he hath once received the bit into his mouth, changeth his rider eftoones, and is never untilden, but one or other is alwaies on his back. No way and meanes there is to avoid from thence, and to recover thotefaire pallures and pleatain meadows, out of which those indebted persons are turned; but they wander aftray to and fro, like to those cursed fiends and malign spirits, whom Empedactes writeth to have been driven by the gods out of heaven:

For fuch the keazenly power first chaid down to the sea beneath; The sea againe, up to the earth did cast them by and by; Thin asserwards, the earth them did unto the beames bequeath Of restless sum, and then at lost sent them to starry skie.

* Or Co rinthian againe.

Thus fall they into the hands of uturers or bankers, one after another; now of a Corinthian, then of aPatrian, and after of an * Athenian; to long, until when all of them have had a fling at him, he become in the end wasted, eaten out, and consumed with usury upon usury: for like as he that is flepped into a quavemire must either at first get forth of it, or else continue still there, and not remove at all out of one place; for he that firiveth, turneth and windeth every way, not only doth wet and drench his body, but mireth it all over, and bewrayeth himselfe more than he was at first. with filthy durt; even to they that do nothing but change one banke for another, making a transcript of their name out of one ulurers book into anothers, loading their shoulders estsoones with new and fresh usuries, become alwaies overcharged more and more; and they reiemble for all the world those persons who are diseased with the cholerick passion or fluxe, who will not admit of any perfeet cure to purge it at once, but continually taking away a certaine portion of the humour make roome for more and more still to gather and engender in the place; for even so these are not willing to be rid and cleanfed at once, but with dolour, griefe, and anguish pay usury every season and quarter of the yeare; and no sooner have they discharged one, but another distilleth and runneth down after it, which gathereth to an head; and so by that meanes they are grieved with the head-ache and paine of the head; whereas it behoved that they should make quick dispatch, and give order to be cleare and free once or all; for now I direct my speech unto those of the better fort, who have wherewith above their sellows, and yet be nicer than they should be; and those commonly come in with fuch like words and excuses as these: How then, would you have me unsurnished of slaves and servants? To live without fire, without an house and abiding place? Which is all one as if he that were in a dropfie and swolve as bigas a tun should say unto his Physician: What will you do? Would you have meto be leane, lanke, spare bodied and empty; and why not? Or what shoulds not thou be contented to be, so thou maiest recover thy health and be whole againe? And even so may it besaid unto thee: better it were for to be without slaves than to be a slave thy selfe; and to remaine without heritage and possessions, that thou maiest not be possessed by another. Hearken a little to the talke that was between two geires or vultures as the tale goes; when one of them digorged fo strongly, that he said withall, I thinke verily that I shall call up my very bowels: the other being by, answered in this wife : What harme will come of thy vomiting, so long as thou shalt not cast up thine own entrailes, but those only of some dead prey which we tare and devouredrogether but the other day; Semblably every one that is indebted felleth not his own land, nor his own house; but indeed the usurers house and land of whom he hath taken money for interest, confidering that by the law the debtor hath made him lord of him and all. Yea, mary will he fay anon; but my father hath left me this peece of land for mine inheritance: I wot well and believe it; so hath thy father lest unto thee freedome. good name and reputation, whereof thou oughtest to makemuch more account than of land and living. He that begat thee made thy hand and thy foot, and yet if it chance that one of them be mortified he will give a good fee or reward to a Chirurgian for to cut it off. Lady Calipso clad Ulysses with a vesture and robe senting sweet like balme, yeelding an odour of a body immortall, which the prefented unto him as a gift and memoriall of the love that the bare unto him; and this he did weare for her take; but after that he fuffered thipwrack and was ready to finke, being hardly able to float above water, by reason that the said robe was all drenched, and to heavy that it held him down, he did it off and threw it away; and then girding his naked breast underneath with a certaine broad fillet or swadling band he saved himselfe by swimming, and recovered the banke: now when he was past this danger, and seemed to be landed, he seemed to want neither raiment nor nutriment: and what fay you to this? May not this be counted a very tempest, when as the usurer after a certaine time shall come to assaile the poore debrors, and sayunto them ? Pay,

Which word once faid, therewith the clouds above, He gathereth thicke, and lea with waves doth move: For why, the winds anon at once from ecft, From fouth, from west do blow and give no rest.

And what be these winds and waves? Even usuries upon usuries, putting, blowing and rolling one after another; and he that is overwhelmed therewith and kept under with their heavy weight, is not able to swim forth and escape, but in the end is driven down and sinketh to the very bottome where he is drowned and perished together with his friends, who entred into bonds, and became sureties and pledges for him.

Crates the Philosopher of Thebes therefore did very well, who being in danger and debt to no man, only wearied with the cares and troubles of house-keeping, and the pensive thoughts how to hold his own, left all, and gave over his estate and patrimony which amounted to the value of eight talents; tooke himselfe to his bag and wallet to his simple robe and cloake of course cloath, and fled into the fanctuary and liberties of Philosophy and Poverty. As for Anaxagoras he torsook his fair lands and plenteous pastures: but what need I to alledge their examples? Considering that Philoxenus the Musician being sent with other to people and possesse a new Colony in Cicily, and having befallen to his lot a goodly house and living to it, enjoying (I say) for his part a good portion wherewith he might have lived in fulnesse and plenty; when he law once that delights, pleasures, and idlenesse, without any exercise at all of good letters reigned in those parts; Par die (quothhe) thesegoods here shall never spoile and undo me, but I will rather (I trow) make a hand and havock of them; leaving therefore unto others his portion that fell unto him by lot, he tooke sea againe and failed away to Athem. Contrariwise those that be in debt are evermore sued in the law, become tributaries and very slaves, bearing and indusing all indignities, like unto those variets that dig in silver mines, nourishing and maintaining as Phinem did the ravenous winged harpies: for surely these plurers alwaies flie upon them, and be ready to fnatch and carry away the very food and fuffenance; neither have they patience to stay and attend times and seasons; for they buy up their debtors corn before it be ripe for the harvest; they make their markets of oyle before the olives fall from the tree, and likewise of wine: For I will have it at this price (quoth the uturer ;) and withall the debror giveth him presently a bill of his hand for such a bargaine; meane while the grapes hang still upon the vine, waiting for the month of September, when the flar Arlturus rifeth and sheweth the time of vintage.

That a Philosopher ought to converse especially with Princes and great Rulers, and with them to discourse.

The Summary.

F there be any in the world who have need of good company, they are Princes and great Lords i for that I their affaires being of such consequence as every manknoweth the feeblenesse of bodie and insufficieney of spirit, not able to furnish them throughly; great reason they have to see by the eyes, and to worke with the hands of others. Now in this case, three sorts of men there be who fault very much: In the first place, Princes and Rulers themselves, who instead of drawing and training neare unto their persons such as can aide and affift them, give accesse rather unto flatterers and other like postilent members, who are ready to corrupt and ruinate their estates: Secondly, those (whose number at all times hath been very [mall) whom we call Philosophers, (that is to say) men of authority, wife, sage, learned, friends to vertue, levers of the good of Princes and their subjects; who being of great power and able to do much, yet nowwithstanding recule and drew backs, or being advanced to high place, here not alwais that respect and consideration, nor such contage as appertaineth; suffering themselves otherwhiles to be carried away to the emertainment and maintenence of the greatest opinion, and mingling a little too much of worldly we dome with the apand manufactured to their true duty, whereas sheir conficience being lightned in fundry forts advertises them fufficiently. The last, (and those as permicious and execuable as the thought of man is not able to devise and comprehend) be the enemies of vertue (towit) ignorant teachers, and profane schoolemissers and professional teachers. fors, mockers, scorners, jesters, flatterers; in sum, all the ministers of vanities and filthy pleasures, who do instinuate and intrude themselves by most level and wicked meanes into the service of Princes; and in recompence of the honour and rich gifts which they receive at their hands do deceive and undo their simple lurds and wasters, according as an infinite number of examples in Histories do verific and give evidence unto us. Plutarch therefore in consideration of these inconveniences, is desirous in this treatise to encourage those who wish that all things were well and in good order; and exhorteth them to approach neare unto Princes. But for a much as ignorance and levelvessee canfeth men to become shamelesse, whereas wisdome and boursty maketh su modess and considerate in all our actions he sheweth in the first place, that is is no point of ambition for a wife and learned man to joyne him selfe unto Grand seigneurs and to fort with them? but that it is their duty so to do, considering that such receive konour, pleasine, and profit by him. And this he provethly reasons, similitudes, examples, all singular and notable. Afterwards he condemneth those who enter into Princes Courts, only because they would be great and powerfull, shewing that wise men indeed do aime cleane at another marke. And for the last point of all, he treateth of the contentment which they receive, who by their service to one alone, help by that meanes an infinite nilmber of others, who remaine bound and obliged unto them for fo great a be nefit.

That a Philosopher ought to converse especially with Princes and great Rulers, and with them to discourse.

O embrace a common love, to find out, accept, entertaine and maintaine that amity which may be profitable and commodious to many in particular, and yet to more in generall, is' the part of honest men, politike, wife, and affectionate to the publike good; and not as some thinke, of those that be ambitious and vaine glorious. But contrariwise, he is to be reputed vaine-glorious, or rather timorous and wanting courage, who doth thun and is alraid to heare himselse called a follower, waiter, and servitor to those that are in highest place. For what faith one of these personages, who, having need to be cured, is desirous to learn and to be acquainted with some Philosopher? Othat I were Simon the Souter, or Dionysius the Pedante, instead of Periof the Interest of Cato, that a Philosopher might discourse and dispute with me, that he might fit by my side, as Socrater did sometime by those. And verily Ariston of Chios being reproved and blamed by the Sophisters in his time, for that he used to devise and discourse with all those that were disposed to heare him: I could wish (quoth he) in my heart, that the very beasts themselves were able to give eare and understand those discourses that do excite and move unto vertue. Do we then avoid the meanes and occasions to converse and conferre familiarly with great personages and mighty men, as if they were wild and favage perions? The doctrine of Philosophy is not like unto an imager who casteth dumbe and dease idoll statues, without any sense, only for tostand upon a base as Pindarus was wont to fay but is willing to make whatfoever it toucheth active, operative, and lively; it imprinteth therein affections and motions, judgements also in iting and leading to things profitable; intentions defirous of all honefly, haughty courage also and magnanimity, joyned with meeknefle, relolution, and affurance; by meanes of which good parts men of State and Policy, are more ready and forward to converse and devise with persons of great pulssance and authority, and not without good cause; for an honest and gentle physician will take alwaies more pleasure to heale an eye that seeth formany, and which doth guard and looke to many; and even so a Philosopher will be more affectionate to take care for that foule and spirit which he seeth to be vigilant for many, and which ought to be wife prudent, and just for many: for fuch an one it he were skilfull and cunting in the art of finding, gathering, and conducting of waters (as we read in Histories that Hercules and many other in old time were) would not take delight to go into some desercorner, fare remote from the frequency of men, and to dig or finke pits there, neare to the Ravens rock (as the Poet faith) and to open that Swine-heards marish Arethusa, but would fludy rather to discover the lively fources and ever-running prings of a river to serve some great City of Campe, or to water the Or-chards, Gardens and Groves of Kings. According as we heare that Homer called Minos, Jupiters Oa ifer, which is as much to fay, (as Plate himselfe doth interpret the word) his Familiar and Difciple; for he never meant that the disciples of the gods were private persons, home-keepers, and such as meddle in nothing but house matters, keeping in and living id.ely without any action; but Princes and Kings who being wife, jult, debonaire and magnanimous, as many as be under their government and command shall live inblisse and happinesse.

An herbe there is called Eringium or Sea-holly, which hath this property, that no sooner one goat taketh it in his mouth, but the herfell first, and afterwards all the rest of the flock will stand still, untill such time as the goat-heard come and take away out of the flock which he will; in like manner, the defluxions which proceed from persons of great power and authority, have the same swiftnesse and celerity, which doth dilate and spread it selfe in one moment, and in manner of fire seiseth upon what soever is neare thereto on every side. And verily the speech and remonstrance of a Philosopher. if it be addressed and directed unto a private man, and that loveth to live in repose, and who doth limit and circumfcribe himfelfe, as within a center and circumference geometricall, with the necessities of his own body the same speech is not distributed and divided unto others, but after it hath in that one man alone composed and wrought a great tranquillity and calme of all perturba-tions, it fadeth, vanisheth away, and so doth end incontinently; but on the contrary side, if the said remonstrance meet with a man of State and Government, a Magistrate, a Politician, and one that dealeth in great affaires, and by the effectuall vertue thereof, replenish him with goodnesse and honefly, by the meanes of that one person, the benefit will be imported unto many. In this wise Anaxagoras kept company with Pericles; Plato conversed with Dion, and Pythagoras did affociate himselfe to the Princes and Lords of Italie; and as for Caro he departed alone from the Campe, and failed to Athenodorus; Scipio likewife laid for Panatius, and fought after him, at what time as the Senate fent him forth with commission for to go in visitation (as it were) and survey, to see what right and wrong what justice and injustice reigned in the world, according as Postdonius maketh report. What then ought Paraisus forto say? If you were either Castor or Pollux, or some other private person describes to flye and avoid the frequency of great Cities, and retire your selle into some corner of a schoole apart, there at your leisure and full repose to sold and unfold, to resolve and compound the syllogumes of Philosophers, I would willingly accept your proffer, and be defirous to converse and stay with you; but seeing you are the son of Paulus Emylius, who had been twice Confull, and the nephew of Scipio Africanus, who defeated Anniball the Captaine of the Carthaginians, I will not reason and dispute with you. Moreover, to say that speech is twofold; the one interior or inward, the gift of Mercury in named Hegemon, that is, Guide; the other pronounced and uttered forth, which is inftrumentall, and a very interpreter to give notice of our conceptions, is a meere vaine and stale position, and may well be comprised under this old proverbe: Thus much I knew before Theognis was borne. But let not this distinction trouble or impeach us in that which we are about to fay; for as well of that which is contained within the secret mind, as of the other which is pronounced and uttered, the end is all one; to wit, Love or amity of this, in respect of a mans ownielle, and of that, in regard of others: for that speech which by the precepts of Philosophy, bendeth unto vertue, and there doth end, maketh a man in tune and accordant with himselse, never repining and complaining of ought, sull of peace, sull of love and content-

In all hie limites is no fedicion,

No shift-no war no strange dissention,

No passion rebellious and disobedient to reason, no combate of will or appetite against will asid appetite, no repugnancy and contrariety of reason against reason; there is no impleasant hitternesse or turbulent dilorder mixed with joyes and pleatures, as it falleth out in the confines of defire, repen-tance and forrow; but all things there be uniforme, delight ome, and amiable, which cauleth each one to content himsele, and joy as in abundance of all goods. As for the other kind of speech that is pronounced, Pindarus saith: That the Muse thereof was never in old time coverous, greedy of gaine, or meeremercenary; neither beleeve I that it is fo at this day; but rather, through the ignorance and negligence of men who be carelelle of their own good and honour, Mercury, who before was free and common, is now become an occupier and merchant, willing to do nothing without a fee and reward. For it is not likely or probable, that Venns in times palt was to deadly offended and angry with the daughters of Profolus, because they devised first to sow hatred and enmity among young folke, and that Wrania, Clio and Calliope take pleasure in them who debase the dignity of speech and literature, by taking silver; but in mine opinion, the workes and gifts of the Muies ought to bemore amiable than those of Venus: for time and honour, which some propose for the object to the end of their fpeech and learning, hath been held deare and highly beloved, for that it is the viery beginning and feminary of friendlinj; and that which more is, the common fort of people measure honour by good-will & benevolence, efteeming that we ought to praise those only whom we affect and love; but certainly these men fare like unto Ixion, who in love following after the goddesse Juno, fell upon a cloud; for even so they, instead of amity embrace a vaine image of popularity, deceitfull, pompous, wandring, and uncertaine: howbeit, a man of good conceit and judgement, if he mannage State-affairs, or intermeddle in government of the common-weale, will feeke for honour and reputation to far forth only, as to maintaine his authority and credit in all his actions; for the better management of publike affaires: for it is no pleasure, neither is it easie; to do them good who are not willing to profit and receive good; and the disposition of the will proceedeth from beliefe and confidence. Like as the light doth moregood unto them that fee, than to those who are seene; even so is honour more prostable unto them who perceive and seele the same; thatto the same reglected and contemned. But he who dealeth not in affaires of State, who sweet is the same and seele the same that the same state. himselle and letteth down his selicity in such a life, apart from others, in relt and repole, saluteth a far off vaine-glory and popularity, which others joy in, who be converfant in the view and fight of people, and in frequent aftemblies and theaters, much like unto Hippolynus, who living chafte, faluted the goddesse Venus a great way off, but as for the other glory which proceedeth from men of worth and honour, he neither refuseth nor disdaineth it. Now when as the question is of amity, we are not to leek for it and to contract friendship only with such as be wealthy, have the glory; credit, and authority of great Lords, no more than we ought to avoid these qualities, if the same be joyned with a gentle nature, which is of faire and honest conditions. The Philosopher seeketh not after beautifull and well-favoured youngmen, but fuch as be docible, tractable, well disposed, and defirous of knowledge; but if withall they be endued with beautifull vilage, with a good grace, and are in the flower of youth, this ought not to fright him from thence, neither must the lovely casts of their countenance and amiable aspects drive him from comming necreunto those, norchase him away if he fee them worthy paines taking and for to be regarded. Thus when power, riches, and princely authority shall befound in men of good nature; who be moderate and civill; the Philosopher will not forbeare to love and cherish such, neither be afraid to be called a courtier or follower ofgreat personages:

They that strive most dame Venus to eschew, Do fault as much, as they who her pursue.

Even so it is with the amity of Princes and great Potentates: and therefore the contemplative Philosopher who will not deale at all inaffaires of weale-publike, must not avoid and shun such ; but the civill Philosopher who is busied in managing of the common weale ought to seeke for them and find them out, not forcing them after a troublesome manner to heare him, nor charging their eares with reports and discourses that be unleasonable and sophisticall; but framing himse fe willingly to joy in their company; to discourse, to passe the time with them when they are willing and so disposed: Tricke

He that faid this, if he had loved men as well as he affected husbandry and tillage, would more willingly have ploughed and sowed that ground which is able to maintaine and feed so many men, then that little cloie or pindie of Antishbenes, which hardly was sufficient to find himselfe alone.

Certes Epicurus, who placed the loveraigne good and felicity of man in most found rest and deep repose, as in a sure harbour or haven, desended and covered from all winds and surging waves of the world; faith, That to do good unto another, is not only more honest and honourable, thanto receive a benefit at anothers hand, but also more pleasant and delectable; for there is nothing that begetteth so much joy as doth beneficence, which the Greeks terme by the name of xdees, that isto say, Grace. Well advised he was therefore and of wife judgement who imposed these names upon the three Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosine, and Thalia; for without ail question, the joy and contentment is far greater and more pure in him who doth a good turne and deserveth a thanke, than in the party who receiveth the same: and therefore it is that many times men do blush for shame when a good turne is done unto them, whereas alwaies they rejoyce when they conferre abenefit or favour upon another. Now do they a benefit unto a whole multitude or nation, who are the meanes to make those good, whom the people and multitude cannot misse but have need of : whereas contrariwife, they that corrupt and spoile Princes, Kings, and great Rulers (as do these flatterers, falle fycophants, and slanderous promoters) are abominable unto all, are challed out and punished by all; like unto those that cast deadiy poyton, not into one cup of wine, but into a fountaine or spring that runneth for to serve in publike, and whereof they see all persons use to drinke. Like as therefore (according to Eup lis) it islaid only by way of mockery concerning those flatterers and comicall parasites who haunted the table of rich (all.as, that there was neither fire, braffe, nor steele, that could keep them out but they would come to sup with him: but as for the minions and favourites of tyrant Ap-lledorus, Phalaris, or Dienyfius alter the decease of their Lords and Masters, the people fell upon them, did beat them with cudgels, torture upon the rack, burne at a stake, and range them with the accurred and damned crew; for that they before named did wrong to one alone, but these did injury unto many by the meanes of corrupting one who was their Ruier; even to those Philotophers that on vericand keepe company with private persons, do cause them to be well contented, plealant gravious and harmelesse to their own selves and no more: but who loever reformeth some evill conditions in a great Ruler or foveraigne Magistrate, framing and directing his will and intentionto that which he ought; this man, I say, after a fort is a Philotopher to the publike State, in that he doth correct the mould and amend the patterne to which all the subjects becomposed, and according to it governed. The Cities and States which be well ruled, decree and yeeld honour and reverence to their Prices; for that they do pray unto the gods for good things, not in regard of themselves nor of their kinsfolke and friends alone, but universally in the behalfe of all the citizens and yet these Priess do not make the gods good not the givers of good things, but being such already of themselves, to them they powre their prayers and make invocations. But Philosophers who live and converte with Princes and great Lords, cause them to be more just and righteons, more moderate and better affected to wen-doing; by meanes whereof it is like that they receive more joy and contentment. And if I should speake my conceit, it seemesh unto me that the harpmaker wrought and made his harpe more cheerefully and with greater pleasure, when he knew that the master and owner of the said harpe should build the walls about the City Thebes, as Amphies did, or to stay and appeale the great civill sedition of the Laceda monians by singing to the said harp and by sweet exhortations, as sometimes Thales did; semblably the carpenter or shipwright, who maketh the helme to a ship or galley, will joy more when he shall know that the said helme shall serve to guide and rule the admiras ship, within which Themistocles shall fight against the Persians in the defence of the liberty and freedome of Greece: or that of Pompeius, with which in a navall battell at fea he defeated and vanquished the army of the pirats. What suppose you then will a Philosopher thinke of his ownspeech and doerrine, when he shall come to discourse with himselfe; that he who shall receive the same being a man of authority, a Prince or great Lord, shall therebydo good unto the Common weare in ministring right and justice indifferently to every man; shall pumiss the wicked, and advance those that be good and vertuous. I am verily perswaded (for my part) that a good and gentie ship wright will more willingly make an helme, when he shall know that it must serve to rule the great ship 2700, renowned throughout the world : likewise a carpenter or wheele-wright will not with to good a will lay his hand to make a plough, or a chariot, as he would to frame those tables or boords in which he wilt that Solon was to engrave his laws. And (I assure you) the diffourles and reasons delivered by Philotophers if once they be well and surely imprinted in the hearts of great personages, who have in their hands the government of States . if they once get sure sooting and takegood root in them, they become as for tible and effectuall as positive laws. Hereupon it was that Plato failed into Sicily, in hope that the grave fentences and principles of his Philosophy would be as good as laws, and worke wholsome and profitable effects in the affaires of Dionifius, But he found that Dionifius was like writing tables all raied, and full of blurs and blots, and that he could not leave off the tineture and deepe die of tyranny, being so surely set on, and having by continuance of time entred and pierced deepe, so that it could not be washed out; whereas ir behooved that thole who are to make their profit by good advertisements and tage lessons, should still be in motion and so continue.

The Summary.

A Sinthe former discoints he sollicited Sages and Philosophers to joyne themselves in acquaintance fame; by reason of some this he despreth one point, whereof he dareth we assigned the some institutions to have the solliculties therein before A. For requiring in Princes thus much that they should be well instituted, for it is be capable of good counsell: he showeth withall that it is a very hard thing to bring; them observes, and to have them is that order for certaine materiall and pertinent reasons which be settled the personal proceedate four her is proving that the law and lively feasion oughts to command Kingi and Princes; and for to cause them to condescend thereto, he declareth involvent, that the thing which they wish for and desire so ardently to procure; namely, to maintaine them showeth purpose that and involvent procure in the pointest one with his shore so some showeth in the disiderances that divert and terms away Princes from so suff anaccest. This consideration. Alleinhabitants of the City Cyrens, requested Plato on a time to leave unto them by writing certaine good laws; and withall to set them down an order in the government of their State, which he refused to do saying: That it was a very hard matter to give lawes unto the Cyrenians being fo rich and wealthy as they were: for there is nothing fo proud and infolent, fo rough and intractable, for lavage and hard to be tamed, as a man perfuaded well of his fortunate efface. This is the cause that it is no easie enterprise to give counsell unto Princes and Rusers; and to advise them as touching their government. For they be affraid to receive and admit reason as a master to command them; for leare it should take away and abridge them of that, which they effecte to be the only good of their grandeur and puillance, in case they were subjeched once to their duty. Which is the cause also that they cannot skill to heare the discourses of Theopompias King of Sparea, who was the first that brought into that City the Ephore, and mingled their authority with the government of the Kings. For when his wife reproached him for leaving unto his children the royall power and dignity, lesse than he received it of his predecessors: Nay, mary (quoth he) but rather far greater, in that it shall be more firme and assured: for in remitting and letting down a little that which in absolute royalty was over-stiffe, straight, and rigorous, he avoided by thatvery meanes all envy and perill. And verily Theopompus deriving unto others from his owne authority, as from a great river, a little rill or rivulet; looke how much he gave unto the Ephori, so much he cut off from himselse: but the reason and remonstrance of Philosophy, beinglodged (as it were) with the Prince himselfe, for to assist him and preserve his person, taking from his puissance, as in a full plight and plethoricke constitution of the body, that which is excessive and over-much, leaveth that behind which is found and healthfull. But the most part of Kings, Princes, and loveraigne Rulers, who are not wile and of good understanding, resemble unskilfull cutters in stone and imagers, who are of opinion that the enormous and huge statues, called Colosies, which they cut, will seeme more vaste and mighty, if they frame them stradling with their legs, with their armes foread abroad and firetched forth, as also with their mouths gaping wide open; for even for these Princes and Rulers by their big commanding voice, their grim and sterne vilage, fierce lookes, and regard of their eye, their odious behaviour, and living apart without fociety of any other perion, weene and suppose to counterfeit a kind of gravity, greatnesse, and majesty that is required in a mighty Potentare; but they differ nothing from the forefaid Coloffes, which without do represent the forme of some god or demi-god; but all within are stuffed full of earth, ftone rubbish, and lead: this only is the difference, that the weight and heavinesse of those monstrous statues, counterposseth and keepeth them standing in some sort upright, stediast, and not enclining one way or other; but ignorant and unlearned Princes, Rulers, and generall Captaines, by reason of their ignorance which is within them, oftentimes do wag and totter to and tro, yea, and be over-turned and laid along; for comming to build their puissance and licentious power aloft upon a base that is not laid directly to the plumbe, they recle and tumble down withall. But like as a rule or square, being of it selfe even, straight, and levell, not turning or twining any way, doth direct and let streight all other things, and make them like it selfe, by being laid thereto; even to ought a Prince, when he hath first established in himselse his principallity and power, that is to fay, composed his own life and manners, to accommodate and frame his subjects accordingly, and to make them semblables for neither libeh it in him who is ready to stamble and fall himselfe, to fulfaine and keep up another, nor he who is ignorant and knoweth nothing, is fit to be a teacher, no more than he who is diforderly, meet to redreffe and reforme, or who is irregular, able to range and fet in order, or who knoweth not how to obey, like for to command. But the most part of men are herein deceived, and thinke not aright, who imppose that the first and principall good incommanding and rulingsis not to be ruled and commanded. And thus the King of the Persons imagined all his jubjects to be flaves, unleffe it were his wife alone, of whom especially above all other, he should have the mastry and Lordship.

Who is it then, that shall command a King or Prince & even the law, which is the Lady and Queen of all aswell mortali men, as immortall gods, according as Pindarus faith: I meane nor the written law in books or upontables of wood, but the lively reason imprinted in his own heart, remaining alwaies with him, his continual resident-keeper, and never leaving his soule abandoned and forlorne without conduct and government, And verily the Perhan King had evermore about him one of his Chamberlaines ordained for this office; namely, to fay unto him every morning as he entred into his Chamber 1. Arife my Lord, and have regard to those affaires for which Meloromaides (that is to say, The Great God) mould have you to provide. But it a Prince be wife and well-instructed, he hathalwaies within him this monitor and remembrancer, to refound the same into his eares, and pur him in mind of his daty. Polemon was wont to fay: That love was a ministry of the gods in young perions, such as they had care of, and were minded to preserve: but more truly a man might say: That Princes be the Ministers of the gods to provide for the affaires and fafety of men; to the end that of those good things which God hath bestowed upon them, they should distribute some, and preferve other; for this is it, that by influence leadeth down the principles of those seeds which be fit and someone entry which afterwards the earth produceth and yeeldets forth, whereof some grow by slicewes of rainer others by winds i some also gather warmthand heat by the stars and the moone, but it is the am who culeth and governeth all, he inspireth and insuleth into them from himselfe, the graciinstability of love, Now, all the goods and gifts (formany and fogreat) which the gods endow menythali, there is no meanes to eggy and use stight, without Law, without Judice, without Prince or Ruler: Judice is the end of Law, Law is the more of Prince, and the Prince is the image of Goodgovernour of all knings: and this Prince or loversigne Majesty hath no need either of Phi-diasor of Polycletter and Myrain, to cut, east, or formed him! but himselfe it is, who doth frame his own person to the patterne and similitude of God, and by meanes of vertue, worketh and setteth up the most pleasant, excellent, and divine statue that may be seen : and like as God hath placed in heaven (as a most beautiful image of himselfe and his divinity) the fun and the moone; even such a representation and lighe is in a City and Realme, a Prince or Magistrate, so long as he hath in his heart imprinted the feare of God, and the observation of Justice; that is to say, allwhile he hath divine reason, which is understanding; not a scepter in his hand, nor a thunderbolt and lightning or a three-forked mace as some foolish Princes cause themselves to be pour traied and painted, making their folly odious, in affecting that which they never can attaine unto: for God indeed hateth and punisheth those who will seeme to imitate thunder, lightning, sun-beames, and such like; but contrariwise, those that be zealous followers of his vertue, and who endeavour to conforme themselves to his bounty, goodnesse, and elemency, he loveth and advanceth, to them he willingly doth impart his own equity, loyalty, justice, verity, and clemency. These qualities are fuch as there is nothing in the world more divine and heavenly, not fire nor light, not the course of the funne, neither the rifings or apparitions, nor the fettings and occultations of the Stars, no nor eternity it selfe and immortality: for God is not counted happy and blessed in regard of longlife, but for that he is the Prince of all vertue: and as this is divinity indeed, so it is true beauty to be ruled thereby. Anaxarchus for to give comfort and consolation unto Alexander, who was cast downe and in despaire, for the bloudy murder which he had committed upon the person of Clytun, faid unto him: That the goddeffes Dice and Thenis (that is to say) Justice and Equity, fat as assistants to * Jupiter, to shew (quoth he) that whatsoever is done by a Prince, is to be thought just and righteous; but he offended herein grossy, and faulted much, to the hurt of Alexander, in that he went about to remedy the forrow and griefe which this Prince conceived in remorfe of conficience and repentance for his hainous fin, by giving him heart and affurance to commit the like againe. And if it be meet and lawfull in this cale to project our conjectures; Jupiter hath not equity and justice for his affesiours, but himselfe is justice and equity; he(I say) is the most ancient and perfecteft Law that is: thus peake, write and teach all ancient authors; That even Jupiter himselfe cannot well command and rule without justice, which is the virgin (as Hesiodus saith) not touched and defiled, but pure and immaculate, lodged alwaies with shamefastnesse, modesty, pudicity, and utility. Hereupon it is, that men ordinarily give this addition unto Kings and Princes. calling them distores, that isto fay, Reverend and venerable: for meet and convenient it is, that those who seare least should have most majesty and honour. And verily a Prince and Ruler ought to be afraid much more to do ill, than to receive and fustaine harme, foralmuch as the one is the cause of the other. And this is a civill and generous seare, proper and peculiar to a good Prince, namely, to be afraid left his subjects should (ere he be aware) take wrong or be hurtany way;

In like manner, Epaminondas, when the Thebanes fell dissolutely to drinke and make good cheare at a certaine fellivall time, himfelfe went all alone to survey the armour and walls of the City, saying: That he would fast and watch, that all the rest might quaffe the while, and sleep with more lecurity. Cato likewise at Usica proclaimed by found of Trumpet, to fend away by fea all those who escaped alive upon the overthrow which there happened; and when he had embarqued them all, and made his praiers unto the gods to you hafe them a boon voyage, he returned into his own lodging and killed himselfe; shewing by this example what a Prince or Commander ought to seare, and what he should contemne and despile. Contrariwise, Clearthus the tyrant of Pontus, shutting himselfe within a cheft, slept there as a serpent within her hole: and Ar stodemus the tyrant of Argos went up into a hanging chamber aloft, which had a trap doore, whereupon he caused a little bed or pallet to be fet, and there he slept and lay with his Concubine and harlot which he kept, and when he was gotten up thither, the mother of the faid Concubine came ordinarily to take downe the ladder, and brought it thither againe every morning. How thinke you, did this Tyrant tremble for feare, when he was in a frequent theater in the Palace, in Councillhoule and Court of Julice, or at a feast, considering that he made a prison of his bed-chamber? To say a very truth, good Princes are afraid for their subjects sake, but Tyrants seare their Subjects; and therefore as they augment their puissance, to do they encrease their own seare; for the more persons that they command and rule over, the greater number they stand in dread of: for it is neither profitable nor feemely as some Philosophers affirme: That God is invisibly subsistent and mixed within the first and principall matter, which sufferest all things, receiveth a thousand constraints and adventures, yea, and is subject to innumerable changes and alterations: but he sitteth in regard of us above, and there is refiant continually in a nature alwaies one, and ever in the same estate, seated upon holy foundations (as Plato faith) where he infuseth his power, and goeth through all, working and finishing that which is right according to nature: and like as the sun in heaven, the most goodly and beautifull image of him, is to be feen by the reflection of a mirrour, by those who otherwife cannot endure to behold himfelfe as he is; even so God ordaineth in Cities and Societies of men, another image of his, and that is the light of Justice and reason accompanying the same ; which wife and bleffed men describe and depaint out of tentences philosophicall, conforming and framing themselves to that which is the fairest and most beautifull thing in the world; and nothing is there that doth imprint in the foules and spirits of mensuch a disposition, as reason drawn and learned out of Philosophy, to the end that the same should not befall unto us which King ilexander the Great did; who having seen in Corinth Diagines how generous he was, esteemed highly and admired the haughty courage and magnanimity of theman, infonuch as he brake forth into these words; Were I not Alexandra surely I would be Diageness! which was all one in manner as if he should have said; That he was troubled and incumbred with his wealth, riches, glory, and puissance, as impeachments and hinderances of vertue, and beare an envious and jealous eye to the homely courie cloake of the Philosopher, to his bag and wallet, as if by them alone Diogenes was invincible and impregnable, and not (as himselfe) by the meanes of armes, harnes hories, speares, and pikes : for surely he might with governing himselse by true philosophicall reason have been of the disposition and affection of Diogenes, and yet continue neverthelesse in the state and fortune of Alexander; and to much the rather be Diogenes because he was Alexander; as having need against great fortune, (like a tempest raised with boysterous winds, and full of surging waves) of a stronger cable and anchor, of a greater helme also, and a better pilot : for in meane persons who are of a low estate, and whose puissance is small, such as private men be, folly is harmelesse; and tottish though such be, yet they do no great hurt, because their might is not answerable thereto; like as it falleth out in soolish and vaine dreames: there is a certaine griefe (I wot not what) which troubleth and disordereth the mind, being not able to compasse and bring about the execution of her defires and lusts: but where might and malice are met together, there power addeth folly unto passions and affections; and most true is that speech of Denns the tyrant, who was wont to fay; That the greatest pleasure and contentment which he enjoyed by his tyranny was this that what loever he would was quickly done, and prefently executed; according to that verse in Homer :

No sooner out of mouth the word was gone, But presently withall, the thing was done.

A dangerous matter it is for a man to will and defire that which he ought not, being not able to performe that which he willeth and defireth: whereas malicious mitchiefe making a fwift course through the race of puissan eard might, driveth and thrusteth forward every violent passion to the extremity, making choler and anger to turne to murder, love to prove adultery, and avarice to grow into condication of goods; for no fooner is the word spoken, but the party once in subjection is undone for ever and prefently upon the least surmise and impuration ensueth death. But as the naturall philosophers do hold, that the lightning is shot out of the cloud after the clap of thunder (like as bloud illucth after the wound is given and incision made) and yet the said lightning is seen before, for that the eare receiveth the sound or crack by degrees, whereas the eye meetech at once with the slash; seen so in these great rulers and commanders, punishments often times go before accusations, and sentences of condemnation before evident proofes:

For wrath in fuch may not long time endure, No more than flooke of anchor can affure A flip in forme, which take th flender hold On fand by shore, where of none may be bold.

Unlesse the weight of reason do represse and keep downsitementous power, whiles a Prince or great Lord doth after the manner of the sun, who at what time as he is most high mounted in the septement of the sun, who are that time as he is most high mounted in the septement of the sun that the septement of the sun that the septement of the sun that the services in great persons should remaine covert and hidden; but like as those who are subject to the falling sicknesse, for some as ever they be surprised with outward cold, or turne round never so little, presently sail into a dimnesse or septement with outward cold, or turne round never so little, presently fall into a dimnesse or significant with outward cold, or turne round never so little, presently fall into a dimnesse or significant which had and ready to stagger, which passions do bewray and detect their malady; even so ignorant persons and such as want instruction and good bringing up, no sooner are listed up by fortunes favour to wealth and riches, to dignities, promotions, and places of high authority, but presently sike as a man can hardly know whether vessels be sooned or saluty, so long as they be empty, but in case you powre into them any liquor, it appeares the whether they leake and run or no: even io, the soules of men that be putified and corrupt, cannot containe and holdsture their might and authority, but run out by meanes of their sulfs and desires, their cholerick fits, their vanities and absurd demeanors. But what need we draw forth the discourse hereof more at large? Considering that great men and noble personages are exposed to calumniations and reproaches for the least delinquency and fault that they commit, Cimon was blamed for his good wine; Scipio for his sleep, and because he loved his bed well; and Lucuslius grew into an illname in regard of his bountiful table and liberall fare that he kept.

That Vice alone is sufficient to make a man wretched.

The Summary.

A Lthough this Treatife be so described but in the beginning and the end, that to this present we know fragment remaining thereof, sufficiently discover the unention of the Auber. And like as by the vaines of some ancient royall palace, there is in some fort represented to our thought and conceit the beamty thereof whiles it should entire and upright; even so, this remnant which is less under those the beamty thereof whiles it food entire and upright; even so, this remnant which is less under the web side loss. But albeit the malice and ninny of the time had beginning to several abensite, and of many others semblads; yet now with suding, that which remained may profit us, mainted and imperfeit as it is and suffice to range and containe us in our day. In the beginning, our Author discorpsite of the misery of a courtous person, and one that solkoweth the Court. Then be added according to his principall designe and purpose: I that vice is the absolute work-missive over the best could be an instead of the contingent of instruments to cause a man to be misserable where upon he date culted and gether, that there is no danger nor calamity, but we ought to choose rather than be sinfull and vicious. Assertant he answereth those objections which are made to the country, and conclude the, that adversity cannot preside or hore us any thing, so long as it is not accompanied with vice or hore us any thing, so long as it is not accompanied with vice or hore.

That Vice alone is sufficient to make a man wretched.

E abideth much who hath his body fold for a dowry (as Emipides faith) to wir, small availes he hath thereby, and those very uncertain. But unto him who passeth not through much ashes, but a royall fire (as one would say) wherewith he is storched and burnt round about, who continually draweth his wind thick and short, and is full of eare and sweat bytrudging over-sea forgaine, the giveth in the end a certaine Tantalian riches, (that is to say) such as he is not able to enjoy by reason of the continuall occupations wherewith he is ensurabled. For very wisely did that Sieyonian who bred and kept a race of horses, when he gave unto Agamemnoot the King of the Achaans as a present, a notable swiit mare for a courser, because he might be dispensed with for going in warfareto Troy:

I has unto Troy that flately towne,
He might not with him go
To ferve in armers; but flay at home,
Andreft there for from woe;
Where he might live in folace much;
Enjoying all his own;
For Jupiter in measure great,
Had wealth on him bessowne.

To the end, that he flaying behind at home, might roule and welter at ease in a depth of riches, and give himselfte much time and leiture for assured reposevoid of all paine and trouble. However, the control of the state of th

And the husband is carried here and there wandring in the world, drawn on with certaine hopes which oftentimes in the end deceive him and worke his shame. But if peradventure he obtaine fomething that his heart defired, after a certaine time that he hath been turned round about with the wheele of fortune, so long until his head be dizzy, and mounted on high in the aire, he wisheth and feeketh nothing more than evafion and meanes to elcape, deeming and calling those happy, who lead a private lite, without exposing themselves to such perils: and they againe reputehim bleffed and fortunate, seeing him to highly advanced above themselves. Thus in one word you see how vice doth disposement unto all forts of infelicity, being of it lesses a perfect artisan of infortunity, and needs none instruments and ministers besides. As for other tyrauts, who study nothing more, than to make those most wretched and miserable whom they pinch, do maintaine executioners and tormentors, devile red-hot fearing irons to burne, and invent racks and other inftruments for to put the reasonlesse soule to extreame torture; but vice without any such preparation of engins, so soone as it seiseth upon the soule, presently overturneth and bringeth it to ruine and destruction, filleth a man with dolour and griefe, with lamentations, fortows, and repentance. For a certaine proofe hereof, you shall see many endure to have their sess mangled and cut, without saying one word; abide to be whipped and stourged patiently; who being pur to the racke and other tortures by their cruell maffers or tyrants, will not give one creeke or cry, folong as the foule repressing the voice by reason, as with the hand keepeth it downe, and containeth it from breaking out: whereas contrariwise, a man shall hardly or never command either anger to stay and be quiet, or dolour to be filent, no nor perswade him that is surprised with sudden seare to rest fill or one who is flung with remorfe and repentance to forbeare crying out to hold his hands from tearing his haire and imiting his thighs; of such force and violence is vice and sinne, above either the heat of fire or the edge of the tword. Moreover, Cities and states, when they publish their purpole to pur forth to making any ships or huge statues called Colossis, give eare willingly to the workemen disputing one against the other, as touching the workemanship, heare their reasons, and see their models and platformes which they bring, and afterwards make choice of him to go in hand with that piece of worke, who with leffe coit and charges will do the deed as well, or rather better, and more speedily. Now put the case that we publish by proclamation to make a man infortunate, or cause a life to be wretched and miserable, and that there present unto us for to enterprise this, fortune on the one fide, and vice on the other; the one (to wit, fortune) is full of her tooles and instruments of all forts, and provided of furniture costly and chargeable for to make a life unhappy and milerable; as for example, brigandife and tobberies, bloudy warres, inhumane cruelty of tyrants, and tempelis at fea; the draweth after her flashes of lightning out of the aire, she mixeth and dressesh a poyloned cup of deadly hemlock, she bringeth sharpe edged fwords to do the bufineffe, sheftirreth flanders, and raifeth falle furmiles and calumniations, shekindleth burning agues, and hot leavers, she commeth with setters mannacles, and other irons jingling; finally, the buildeth cages and pritons for this purpole; and yet the most part of all this geere proceedeth rather from vice than fortune: but suppose that all came from fortune, and that vice standing by all naked, and having need of no other thing in the world without it selfe to assaile a man, should demand of fortune, how the could make a man infortunate and heartleffe in these tearmes? What tortune, dost thou menace poverty? Metrocles will be ready to laugh thee to scorne, who in winter-time used to sleep among sheep, and in Summer season took his repose in Cloisters and Churchporches; and so challenged for his selicity the King of Persia, who was wont to winter in Babylon, and passe the Summer in Media: threatenest thou servitude and bondage? Bringest thou chaines, and irons, or the woefull condition to be fold in open market as a flave? Diogenes will despite thee for all that, who being exposed and offered to sale by the rovers and theeves that tooke him, cried and proclaimed himselfe aloud: Who will buy a master, who? Dost thoutemper or brew a cup of poylon; Why didft not thou before offer such a cup to Socrates for to drinke? But he full meekly, with all mildnesse and patience, without trembling for feare, and changing either countenance or colour for the matter, dranke it off roundly; and after he was dead, those that inrvived judged him happy, as one who in the other world made account to live an heavenly and bleffed life: prefentelt thou fire to burne withall? Loe, how Decima a Roman Captaine hath prevented thee; who when there was a fire made in the midft between two armies for to contume him, voluntarily and with a formall prayer offered himselfe as an holocaust or burnt offering unto Saturne, according to his vow made for the lafery of the Roman Empire. The honeft and chafte dames of the Indians, such as entirely love their husbands, strive and be ready to fight one with another about the sunerall first and as for her who obtaineth the victory, and is burned therein together with the dead corps of her husband, all the rest do deeme right happy, and testifie to much in their hymnes and songs. As for the Sages and wife Philosophers of those parts, there is not one of them all reputed a holy man or bleffed, if he do not whiles he is alive, in perfect health, and found fenfe and understanding, separate his own foule from the body by the meanes of fire, and after he hath cleanfed and confumed all that was mortall depart out of the flesh all cleane and pure: but (forfooth) from abundance of wealth and riches, from an house sumptuously built and surnished, from a costly and dainty table sull offine and delicate viands, thou wilt bring me to a poore three-bare cloake, to a bag and wallet, and to begging of my daily bread from doore to doore; well, even these things were the cause of Diogene felicity; thele won unto Cra es freedome and glory: but thou wilt crucifie me or cause me to be tenergy there would not office in the door and goly of the door and what cared Theodorus whether his corps rotted above ground or under the earth? These were the happy sepultures of Tartarians, and of the Hircanians, to be eaten and devoured of dogs; as for the Bactrians, by the laws of the country those were thought to have had the most blessed end, whom the fowles of the aire did eate after they were dead; Who then are they whom these and such accidents do make unhappy? Even such as are false-hearted, base-minded, senselesse, and void of understanding, untaught, and not exercised in affaires of the world, and in one word, such as retaine still the opinions which were imprinted in them from their infancy. Thus you fee how fortune alone is not a fuffic-ent work-miltris of unhappiness and infeli.ity, in case the have not fin and vice to aide and help her: for like as a thred is able to divide and fawe (as it were) thorow a bone which hath lien foaking long before in ashes and vinegar; and as workemen can bend, bow, and bring into what fashionthey will Ivoryafter it hath been infused and mollified in ale or beere, and otherwise not; even so fortune comming upon that which is already of it felfe crazy and corrupt, or hath been fulfained by vice, is of power to pierce, wound, and hollow the same.

Moreover; like as the poyfon Pharicum, otherwise called Napellus or Aconitum, being hurfull to no other person, nor doing harme to those who handle and beare it about them; but if it touch never so little one that is wounded, presently skilleth him by meanes of the force or wound which receive the influxion and venom thereof; even so he whose soule is like to be destroyed and overthrown by fortune, ought to have within himselfe and in his own slesh some ulcer, some impossume or malady for to make those accidents which befall outwardly, wretched, pittistil, and lamentable. What, is vice then of that nature that it had need of fortunes helping-hand to worke wretched-selfe and inselicity? From what coast I pray you doth not fortune rathe temperse upon the sea, and trouble the water with surging billows? Environeth not she and be etterth the foot of defart mountaines, with the ambushes and fore-layings of theeves and robbers? Powreth not she down with great violence flormes of haile-stones out of the clouds upon the fertile corne-fields? Was it not vice and malice that surging billows? Environeth not she and be extend the stone of the down with example of the stone of the s with vaine superstitions, and draweth them away after the lusts of their eyes.

The Summary.

Moossible it is during the time that we so our ne in this life, that our spirit which knoweth not how to Mossible it is auting the time come response to the assistance of the assistance either of other men, or the still and at rest, should not stirre and move the tongue to speake of the assistance either of other men, or the stirre and move the tongue to speake of the assistance either of other men, or the stirre and move the tongue to speake of the assistance either of other men, or the stirre and move the tongue to speake of the assistance either of other men, or of our own; whereby we cannot chuse but incur marvellous dangers of slattery, slander, or else of selfe-praise; insomuch as not without good cause that man hath been called profest, who knoweth well to moderate this little member, which is as it were the bit and bridle of the whole body of man, and the very helme and sterne of that ship or vessell in which we row and hull to and fro in the sea of this world. Requisite it is therefore, that morall Philosophy should speake, to the end that it may teach us for to speake. We have feen before in many descourses the duty of every one towards his neighbours, as well in words as in deeds: but in this Treatife Plutatch sheweth the carriage of a man towards himselfe, and above all in that way which is most slippery, towit, in the question of our own praises: than after he hath laid this for a ground and foundation; That it is an unseemely thing for a man to make himselfe seeme great by vaine babble, and alledged the reasons wherefore, he setteth down one generall exception; to wit, that a vertuius man may praise himselfe in certaine cases and occurrences, the which (after he kach taxed the ambition of those who for up a note of their own prayes to be chaunted aloud by others) he particularizeth upon these points; to intsif he be driven to answer unto some false standerer; if a man be in any distress and adversity, or if he be blamed for the best deeds that he hath done. After this, he interlaceth certaine advertiscments or correltions; towit, that aman ought to mingle his own praises with those of other men; that he ascribe not the whole honour of a worthy deed to his own selfe; that he atter only those things which be chiefe and principall, and stand upon that which is most commendable; and that he give a certaine lustre thereto, by the foile of confessing his own imperfections: which done, he proceeded ho declare what kind of menthey ought to be who are allowed to praife themselves; to what this praise ought to be referred and have respect; and wherefore they (hould enter into it; moreover, at what time, and for what occ. ifion he ought to make headunto a third, who would do sufficiently; and for a finall conclusion, he proposeth an excellent meanesto need almost numerical wave weeks that might arise from importunate praise, willing that the party woo speaketh of his own good parts should fite all ambition, not please himself in reheating and recitall of mos pleasers of our own sees print promoting the feignes prailet, and neverthelesse in blanning his neigh-bour to be content for to be praised of another, without putting himselfse between and speaking in his own bek alfe. In sum, since there is nothing so odious as to see and heare a man speake exceeding much of himselfe, he concludeth, that in no wife a man ought foto do, unleffe there accrue thereby great profit and com-

How a Man may praise bimselfe without incurring Envy and Blame.

O speake much of ones selse in praise, either what he is in person, or of what valour and power among others; there is no man (friend Herendamus) but by word of mouth will professe it is most odious, and unbeleeming a person well borne and of good bringing up; but in very deed sew there be who can take heed and beware of falling into the inconvenience and enormity thereof, no not even those who otherwise do blame and condemne the same; as for Euripidas when he saith,

If words were coftly men among,
For to be bought and fald,
No man to prife and magnific
Himfelfewould be fo bold:
But now (fince that each one may take
Out of the airc fo large,
As much at will bismind suffice,
Without his coft and change)
Well pleast dare all men of themselves
To speake what comes in thought,
As well surruth as what is true,
For speech them cossets nught

Doth use a most odious and importune vantery, especially in this, that he would seeme to interlace amongst the passionate accidents and affaires of Tragical matters, the speech of a main selfe, which is not befitting nor pertinent unto the subject argument; semblably Pindarm, having faid in one place,

To breg and vaunt unfeafonably, Sounds much of rash and vaine folly,

ceaseth not neverthelesse to magnifie his own sufficiency in the gift of poetry, as being (in truth) worthy of right great praise, as no man can deny. But those who are crowned with garlands in those facred plaies and games, are declared victors and conquerours by the voice of others, who thereby eafe them of that odious displeasure that selfe-praise carrieth with it. And in very deed our heart rifeth against that vaine-glory of Timothem, in that he wrote himselfe (as touching the victory which he atchieved against Physis) O happy man thou Timotheus; at what time as the herauld proclaimed with a loud voice these words: Timotheus the Milesian hath conquered Ionocamptes that fon of Carbo: for furely this carrieth with it no grace at all, but is a meere ablurdity and against all good fashion, for a man to be the trumpeter of his own victory: for true it is according to Xemphon; That the most pleasant voice that a man can heare, is his own praise delivered by another, but the most odious thing unto others, is a man commending himselfe: for first and formost, we effective them to be impudent who praise themselves, considering that they ought rather to blush and be ashamed even when others fall to praise them in their presence: secondly, we repute them unjust herein, for that they give and attribute that to themselves which they should receive at the hands of others: thirdly, either if we keep filence when we heare one to praife himfelie, it feemeth we are difcontented or do beare envy unto him, or if we feare that, compelled we are our selves to confirme and approve those praises, and to give tellimonythereof against our own mind; a thing more beleeming vile and bale flattery than true honour, namely, if we can abide to praise any in preien e. Howbeit, although this be most true, and that the case standeth so, such occurrences may so fall our, that an honorable person who manageth the politick affairs of a common-wealth, may hazzard and venture boldly to speake of himselfe and in his own behalfe for his advantage, not in regard of any glory, grace, or pleasure to gaine thereby, but for that the occasion or action that is presented, requireth that he should speake and give testimony of himselfe, as he would and might do of any other matter of truth, especially when the deeds by him archieved, or the parts that be in him be good and honest, then he is not to forbeare or spare to speake hardly, that he hath done so or else much like: for furely fuch a praife as this bringeth forth good fruit, and out of it, as from a fruitfull graine or leed, there proceed many other praifes, and those far greater. And certes, a civill and politike man doth nordefire and love honour as a salary, solace, or recompence for his vertuous actions; but for that to have the credit and reputation among others of a trufty and faithfull person, in whom men may repose their trust and confidence, doth afford him good meanes and occasions to performe many other greater and more goodlier actions: for a pleasant and easie matter it is to benefit them who love thee and put their trust in thee; whereas on the contrary side, exceeding hard it is, or rather impossible, to make use of vertue, and to imploy it to the good of those who have thee in impition, or be ready to raise false calumniations against thee, and so to force them who do avoid the meanes of receiving any good and pleasure at thy hands.

Moreover, it would be confidered, what other occasions there may be for which a man of honour and honesty may prai e himselse; to the end that by taking good heed and avoiding of that which in selfe-praise is to vaine and odious, we faile not to serve our turnes with the profit and commodity that may come thereby. Now of all others, molt foolish is their praise who commend themselves to this end, that they would be praised of others; and such praise as this we hold most contemptible, for that it feemeth to proceed from ambition and an unleafonable appetite of vaine-glory only: for like as those who have no other food to feed upon, be constrained to eate the flesh of their own bodies against nature, which is the very extremity and end of famine; even so those that hunger after honour and praise, if they cannot meet with others to praise them, fall to praise themselves; wherein their behaviour is unfeemly and shamefull, for that upon a love of vaine-glory they are defirons to make a supply and sufficiency from their ownselves; but yet when as they go not simply to worke, nor leeke to be praised by themselves, but upon a certain emulation and jealousie of other mens praises, they come to compare and oppose their own deeds for to dim and darkenthe actions of others; then over and besides their vanity, they adde thereto envy and malice; for according to the common proverbe: He is curious and ridiculous, who fetreth his foot in another mans dance; but upon envy and jealousie to thrust a mans selie between the praises of others, and to interrupt the same with his own selfe-praise, is a thing that we ought to beware of; and not only fo, but also to take heed that we suffer not others at such a time to praise us, but gently to yeeld honour unto those who are worthy to be praised and honoured; and if peradventure, they be unworthy and deserve not the same, yet ought not we to deprive them of the praises which are given unto them, by interpoling our own, but rather fland up against them, convince them openly, and prove by evident and pregnant reasons that there is no cause why they should be reputed to great, and be so highly honoured. As touching this point therefore, plaine and evident it is, that we ought not so to doe, howbeit, a man may praise himselfe without blame: first and formost, if he do it by way of his owne defence in answering to a slander raised, or an imputation charged upon him; like as Pericles did in Thucydides, where he uttereth these words: And yet you my Mafters of Aibens are angry with me, who may vaunt of my felfe to be fuch an oneas need not to give place unto any what loever, either in forefight and knowledge of that which is behovefull to the common-wealth, or in eloquence and delivery thereof, or in love to the State, or in fincere integrity, free from all corruption, bribery and avarice, against which I stand invincible for in speaking thus magnificently of himselfe in such a case, he did not only avoid the blame and reproach of vanity, or arrogancy and prefumptuous ambition, but also that which more is, he shewed withall his wildome and greatnesse, yea, and the magnanimity of vertue, which was so far from being humbled and dejected, that it rather conquered and held under-hand envy; infomuch as others hearing such men speake in this wife, proceed not any farther, nor be willing to judge and censure them, but are carried away and ravished with a certaine joy, yea, and inspired (as it were) from heaven to heare such brave vanteries; namely, it the persons be constant, and the reports which they make true, according as the effects which follow do testific. The Thebanes verily (at what time as their captaines were accused, for that when the terme of their government and magistracy, called Baotarchia, was expired, they returned not incontinently home, but made an invasion and entred in armes into Laconia, and dealt in the administration of affaires about the City of Messare) hardly and with much ado affoiled and quit Pelopidas, when he humbled himselfe and became a suppliant unto them for pardon: but contrariwife, when Epaminondas came and recounted in magnificent words those brave exploits which he had atchieved in that voyage and at the same time, protesting in the end that he was prest and ready to take his death, so that they would confesse and acknowledge, that mangre their minds and against their wils he had pilled and spoyled Laconia, repeopled Messan, and reduced into a league and amity with them all the Cities of Arcadia, they had not the heart so much as to give their voices and suffrages in any sentence of condemnation against him, but departed out of the affembly, admiring the haughty courage of the man, and rejoycing with mirth and laughter to heare him plead his cause with resolution. And therefore the speech of Schenelmin Homer is not simply and altogether to be reproved, when he faith :

Pronounce I dare, andit avow, We better warriours be In these daies than our fathers were By many a degree.

If we call to mind and remember the precedent words a little before:

Thou son of noble Tydeus A wife and hardy knight How is it that thy heart doth pant For feare when thou [houldst fight? Why dost thou cast thine eye about, And looke on every fide?

How thou maiest out of battell scape, And dar'st not field abide.

For it was not Schenelus himselse unto whom this sharpe and bitter speech was addressed, but he replied thus in the behalfe of his friend whom he had thus reproached, and therefore io just a cause, and so fit an occasion gave him liberty to speake thus bravely and boldly of himselfe. As for the Citizens of Rome, they were offended and displeased much with Cicero praising himselfe so much as he did, and namely, relating so often the worthy deeds by him done against Catiline; but contrari wise, when Scipio said before them all in a publike assembly: That it was not meet and seemely for them to fit as judges upon Scipio, confidering that by his meanes they were grown to that grandence as to judge all the world; they put chaplets of flowers upon their heads, and in this wife is adorned, mounted up together with him into the temple of the Capitoll, for to facrifice and render thanks unto Jupiter: and good reason both of the one and the other; for Cicero rehearsed his own praiseworthy deeds so many times without any need enforcing him thereto, only to glorifie himselfe; but the present perill wherein the other stood, freed him from all hatred and envy, not with standing he spake in his own praise. Moreover, this vantery and glorious boasting of a mans selfe, is not befitting those only who are accused, or in trouble and danger of the law, but to as many also as be in adversity rather than in prosperity; for that it seemeth that these reach and catch (as it were) at gloty, and takepleafure and joy therein, only to gratifie and content therein their own ambitious humour; whereas the other by reason of the quality of the time, being far from all suspicion of vaineglory and ambition do pluck up, and erect themselves upright against fortune, sustaining and uphol-ding what they can the generosity of their minds, avoiding as much as lieth in them that base conceit, to be thought for to beg commiseration and crave pitty, as if they would be moaned for their miladventures, and thereby bewray their abject hearts. For like as we rake them for fooles and vainglorious fellows, who as they walke ordinarily, lift up themselves, and beare their heads and necks aloft; but contrariwife, we praise and commend those who erect their bodies, and do all they can to put forth themselves, either in fight at sharpe, or in buffeting with fists; even so, a man who being overthrown by adverse fortune, raiseth himselfe up againe upon his teet, and addresseth his whole might to make head.

Like as the champion doth arise, upon his hands to win a prife.

And inflead of shewing himselse humble, suppliant and pittifull, by glorious words maketh a shew of bravery and haughty courage, feemeth not thereby proud and prefumptuous, but contrariwie, great, magnanimous, and invincible. Thus in one place the Poet Homer depainteth Patroclus models, and nothing at all fubject to envy, when he had done any exploit fortunately and with valour; but at his death when he was ready to yeeld the ghoft, he described him to speake bravely in this wife:

If treemy such with all their might,

Hadmet with me in open fight, &c.

And Phocion who otherwise was alwaiss meeke and modest, after that he saw himselse condemned, gave all the world to understand his magnanimity, as in many other things, so especially in this point, that he said unto one of those that were to suffer death with him, who made a pitious moane great lamentation: How now man, what is that thou saiss? Doth it not thee good at the heart to thinke that thou shalt die with Phocion? And verily, no lesse, but rather much more it is permitted to a man of State, who is injuriously dealt withall for to speake somewhat frankly of himselse, namely, unto those who seeme to be oblivious and unthankfull, Thus Achista at other times rendred the glory of fortunate succession his affaires to the heavenly power of God, and spake modestly in this manner:

That Jupites would give su power and strength, Troy City strongly wall'd to win at length.

But otherwise when indignities were offered unto him, and he unjuftly wronged and abused, he sag another note, and displaied his tongue at large in anger, breaking out into these haughty and brave words:

With ships of mine well mann'd with fouldiers brave , By force of armes twelve Cities won I have. Also,

For why? approach they dare not neare to me, The brightnesse of my morion for to see.

For liberty of franke speech, being a part of justification and defence in law, is allowed to use great words for plea. And verily Themistocles according to this rule, who all the while that he performed the exploits of noblefervice in his own countrey, never did or faid ought that favoured of odious price; yet when he once faw that the Athenians were full of him, and that they made account of him no more, forbare not to fay unto them thus: What meaneyou my Masters of Athens thus to diffaine and be weary of those at whose hands you receive so oftentimes benefits; In time of storme and tempest you flie to them for refuge, and shroud your selves in their protection as under the hatbour and covert of a spreading tree; no sooner is the storme overblowne, and the weather faires. gaine, but you are ready to give a twitch at them, and every one to pull and breake a branch thereof as you passe by. Thus you see how these men perceiving themselves otherwise injured, in their discontentments flick not to rehearfe their fervice and good deeds patt and caft them in their teeth who are forgetfull thereof. But he that is blamed and infferent a reproach for things well done, is altogether for to be excused and unblameable, in case he set in hand to praise his own deeds, foralmuch as he seemeth not to reproach and upbraid any, but to answer only in his own desence, and to justifie himselfe. Certes, this it was that gaveunto Demessbenes an honest and laudable liberty to speak for his own behoose; and he avoided thereby all redious satiety of his own praises, which he uled throughout that whole oration, entituled Of the Crown, wherein he gloried and vaunted of that which was imputed unto him as reproachable, to wit, the embassages in which he went, and the decrees which he had enacted as touching the war. Moreover, not far from these points above rehearfed, the reverfing of an objection by way of Anithesis may be placed, and carrieth with it a good grace; to wit, when the defendant doth prove and shew that the contrary to that wherewith he is charged and accused, is wicked and dishonest: After which manner the Oratour Lycurgus at Athens in his plea, and answer to those who laid to his charge that he had given a peece of money to a fycophantior to ftop his mouth and appeale him : What kind of Citizen (quoth he) do youtakeme for to be? who all this long time that I have dealt in the government and managing of State-affaires among you, am challenged before you rather to have given than taken filver unjuftly. Likewife Cicero, when Metellus faid unto him that he had undone and brought to confusion more men by his testimony, than saved by his patronage and eloquence; And what man is there (quoth he) who will not say by this, that there is more sidelity in me, than force of utterance. Also these places in Demosthenes; And who would not justly have condemned me to die, If I had but once gone about in bare word to contaminate the honours and glorious titles that this City hath? Againe, And what (thinke ye) would these wicked persons have said, if whiles I discoursed particularly of these points, the Cities had fallen away and revolted: In sum, that whole oration throughout concerning the Crowne, most finely and wittily inferreth his own praises among those oppositions and folintions which he alledgeth. Over and besides, it is worth the noting and learning, as a most profitable point, how cunningly in the faid Oration, and how artificially he intermedleth with the speeches that he gave out of himselfe, the commendations also of the hearers, and thereby freed himselfe from the raint of envy, hatred, and selfe-love; namely, in avowing how good and gracious the Athenians were to those of Eubaa; how worthily they demeaned themselves toward the Thebanes; what good turnes they had done to the Byzantines, as also how beneficiall they had been to the Inhabitants of Chersonnesus; saying withall, that himselfe was but their minister. For I affire you by this meanes the hearer himselse being secretly won and gained ere he is aware by his ownpraises, entertaineth more willingly and with greater pleasure the speech of the Oratour; well contented he is; and pleased to heare the good deeds related by another which he hath done and aponthis joy of his there insueth incontinently an admiration and love of those, by whose meaneshe hath atchieved those acts. Hereupon Epaminondas one day in open place, when Meneclidas, one of his envious and malicious advertaries mocked him for that he magnified and thought bester of himselfe than ever did King Agamemnon; Grand mercy, you my masters of Thebes (quoth he) with whom alone I overthrew in one day and subverted the whole dominion of the Lacedemonians; Now forafmuch as the most part of men ordinarily mislike in their hearts, and are mightily offended with one that praifeth himfelfe, but fare not to against him that commendeth another; may, many times they are well pleased therewith, and ready to confirme such praises by their own raffirmonies : some are wont to have this devile, namely, in taking their time and opportunity, to commend those who love, chuse, and do the selfe-same things, and briefly who are of the like conditions, and given to the same humour with themselves; do wind and infinuate into the grace and favour of the hearer, and by such an occasion draw his heart unto them; for streightwaies he doth acknowledge in the ipeaker, although he speaketh of another, the resemblance and similitude of the like vertue which deserveth the same praises: for like as he who reproacheth another man for those whose of himselfe is guiltys; doth hurt his own personmore than the party whom he fesmeth to touch even logged and bouthmen in yeelding honour to those persons who are good, do as much as make menuion of themselves to luch as are privy to their vertues, and know them well-enough to informeth as preferrly they are ready to follow and fecond them with these and such like asslamations . And are not you also the same in every respect? After this fort Alexander in benoung Africales i and Andreapus likewite in honouring Alexander, procured to the meleves each one displayed from the femblable. Contrativite Diony fine by mocking Geton, and laying by allowing his mane; that he was Gete indeed (that is to lay) the Laughter and mockery of Sietly; perceived not how before he was aware, by the envy that he drew upon him himselfe, he overthrew the greatnesse dignity of his own pullance and seignlory. A man of State therefore, and a Polincian, oughteo learne, observes and prodice these rules even in other cases also. And as for those who other whiles are enforted to praise themselves, they shall cause this selfe-praise of theirs to be more released and leffe hebje Oronenvy and hard concert, in oafe they take not all to themselves and attribute, the whole to their own worthineffes but as if glory were some heavy and weighty burthen; dishated one part thereof upon forme; and another upon God; and therefore wifely laid jan ar ghimpil ti i e skhalit-let

Wellstkernie did Amaleon at Secacafe, who upon his valiant and noble exploits dedicated an altar to Hon-adventure and likewise confectated an honse to his good Angell. But best of all and most wisely did that Bythomshe Buens, who being arrived at Athens after he had murdered King Corys, when the Oraconrastrived a vid one with another, who should extell and setforth his praises most unto the people; and terrequing some ab carry an envious eyemnto him, and be highly difficated with himb as he passed by brake forth into these words: It was some God (quoth he) O ye Athenians that did this deed, as for my felfe, I did but lend my helping hand. Semblably, Sylla exempted his own acts from envy, in giving alwaies the praise to his good fortune; infomuch as in the end, he surnamed himselfe Emaggiodires, that is, lovely, fortunate, or Venns darling. For all men in manner would seeme to be vanquished rather by fortune, than conquered by vertue's for that they thinke the one to be a good, not pertinent to the conquerour, and the other a proper defect and impertection of their own arch which proceedeth from themselves: which is the reason by report, that the Laws of Zalengis-wonderfully pleased the Lorgians, for that he pur into their heads and bare them inhand that the goddeffe Mineton appeared and came many times unto him that the endited and taught him those laws which he penned and gave unto them; finally, that there was not one of them proceeding from his head, counsell and invention. Peradventure therefore necessary it is to device these and such like remedies, and lenitive medicines to meet with those persons, who are by nature fierce and envious; but to such as be of the better fort, and of a modest and temperate disposition, it would not be impertinent and abfurd to tile certaine corrections of praises in this case: as for example; If one haply in our presence fall to praise us for being eloquent, learned, rich, or in great reputation, to pray him not to give such reports of us, but rather for to commend us if we be good and bountifull, hurtfull to none, and profitable to many; for in 60 doing, we feeme not to confer praifes upon our felves, but to transfer them; not to take pleasure in them that praise us, but rather to be grieved and displeased, that we are not praised for such things as we ought, nor as we should; as also to hide the worse qualities under the better, not so much willing and desirous to be praifed, as to each how it is meet to praise: for this manner of speech (neither with Hone nor bricke have I fortified and walled this City, but it you will needs know how Thave fall it, you shall find that I have furnished it with armout, horses, consederates, and allies) seemeth to come neare and tend unto such a rule: yea, and the faying of Pericles toucheth it nearer; for when the house of his death now approached and that he was to go out of this world his kinsfolke and familiar friends weeping, wailing, and grieving thereat (as good reason was) called to mind and rehearled the

Atmies that he had conducted, the expeditions which he had made, his puissance that he had born; as also how many victories he had acthieved, what Trophees he had erected, what Trownes and Cities he had conquered, and laid to the seigniory of the Athenians: all which henows should leave behind him: but he lifting up himselfe a little, reproved and blamed them greatly, for relating, and alledging those praises which were common to many, and whereof some weremore due to a strong the strong should be sho

With gods in heaven above Thave no share, To them therefore why dost then me compare?

But if thou knowst me aright, and takest me truly for such an one as I am, praise these good parts in me: that I am uncorrupt and not overtaken with gifts and briberie? 'that? I am footer and tempes rate: that I am fencible, reasonable, full of equity and humanity.' For the nature of ency is willing the total that it is not being the following the provided unto him that refuseth the greater praises those that be lefte and more models.' methor deprive the fee of true commendation those who will not admit and receive falle and vaine praises? and therefore men thinke not much to honour those Kings and Princes who are unwilling to be flid led gods, or the children of gods, but rather to be intituled either Philadelphij that is, Kind to brothers and fifters; or Philometores, that is, Loving to their mothers; or Energetos, that is, Benefactors, or elfe Theophiles, that is, Dearely beloved of the gods; which are goodly and beautifull denominations, meet for men and good Princes: like as againe, those who hardly will endure them, that either in writing or speaking, attribute unto them the name of Sophi, that is, Sages or wife men, can well abide to heare those who name them Philosoph, that is, Lovers of wildome; or such as say of them, that they profit in the study of wildome, or give them such like attribute as is modest and not subject to envy; whereas these ambitious Rhetoricians and vaine-glorious Sophisters, who is their orations (to shew their learning) expect these and such like acclamations from their auditors odivine and angel-like speech! O heavenly and magnifically spoken! lose withall this commenda-tion, as to be said for to have delivered their mind modelly, curreonsly, and as becommeth civil men. Certes, like as they who be loath and take heed to offend, and hurt them that are bleare-eyed or otherwise given to the paine and inflammation of them, do mingle among the gallant and lively colours; some duskish shadows; even to somethere be, who in rehearing their own praises not altogether resplendent and cleare without any mixture at all, but intermedled with some imperseduons, defects, and light faults among, by that meanes discharge themselves of the heavy load of envy and hatred. Thus Epireus in Homer, giving out glorious words of his wrestling and buffer-fight, vaunting bravely of his valour,

As if he would his teene and anger wreake Upon him, and with fifts his bones all breake.

Said withall,

Is't not enough that herein I do vaum? For other skill in combate I do want.

Buthaply this man is worthy to be mocked and laughed at, who for to excuse his arrogant bravely of a wrestler and champion, bewrayed and consessed that otherwise he was but a searchill coward, whereas contrariwise that man is of judgement, civil also and gracious besides, who alledge the against himselse some oblivion or ignorance; some ambitious spirit, or else a desire to heare and learneshe Sciences and other knowledge, like as suffers when he said:

But loe my mind desirous was To hearken and give eare, I will d my mates me to unloose, That I might go more neare.

And againe in another place;

Although much better it had been, Tet would I not beleeve: But see his person, and then try If a firs he would me a joye

If gift he would me give.

To be short, all force of faults, so they be not alrogether dishonest and over-base, if they be set unto praises, tid them of men and envery and harted; and many other there be, who interposing a confession of poverty, want of experience, vea, and (beleeve me) their base parentage, among their praises, cause them thereby to be less odious and envired. Thus Agatholes, as he sate drinking unto young men out of gold and silver plate right curiously wrought, commanded other vessels of stone, earth, and potters worke to be fet upon the table, faying unto them: Lo (quoth he) what it is to perfovere in travell, to take paines, and adventure valiantly? for we in times paft made those pois, (pointing to the earthen vessels) but see, now we make these, (shewing the plate of gold and silver:) and verily it seemed that Agathocles (by reason of his base birth and poverty) was brought up in some optices forge, who afterward became the absolute Monarch (almost) of all Sicily. Thus it appeareth what remedies may be applyed outwardly, to avoid envy, if a man be sorted to speak of himself-other means there is e besides, inharent (after a fort) even in them who be in this wise praised; and such Caso made use of, when he said, that he was envied because he neglected his own affairs, and sate up watching whole nights for the good safety of his countrie. Like to which is this speech:

What wifed me thinks you wat in me, who cleane exempt from care, From charge and travell, like some one, who in the army were: A plaine and common souldier might enjoy within the host My fortune with the wiself of them all that meddle most?

As also this other:

I doubt and feire, that of my labours past, The thanke is gone, and carried with a blast; And yet those paines that now presented be Afresh, reject unneth I will from me.

For menordinarily beare envy into those who seem to acquire glory gratis, without any cost, and to come by vertue easily, like as if they purchased house or land for a little or nothing; whereas feldome or never they envy such as have bought the same very dear, with many travels and great dangers. And forasmuch as we ought in praising of our selves to effect not only this schattwe oftend not the hearers thereby nor procure their envy, but endevour allo to profit them, and do them good, as if we seemed not to aim at our self-praise, but to shoot at some other thing; in so doing consider first and formost when a manis in a vein of praising himsels, whether he may do it by way of exhortation, to kindle a zeal, and exercise a kind of emulation, and striver glory in the hearers; safter the example of Neifor, who in recounting his own prowess and valiant service, encouraged Patroclus and the other nine gallants and brave Knights, to enter combat and single sight with Hestor for an exhortation which hath word and deed to meet together, carrying with it example, with a stamiliar zeal and imitation, is wonderfull quick and lively, it pricketh, provoketh and stirreth exceedingly, and together with a resolute courage and ardent affection, it carrieth with it the hope of compassing things very accessible and inno wise impossible: and therefore of the three renowned dances and quites in Lacedemors, one which consisted of old men, chanced thus:

The time was, when we gallants were, Youthfull and hardy, void of feare.

Another of children fung in this wife:

And we one day (hall be both tall and strong;

And farre surpasses, if that we live so long. The third, namely of young men, had this ditty:

But we are come to proofe, and now at best,

Try who that will, to fight we are now proft.

Wherein the law-giver who inflituted their dances, did wilely and politickly, to propose unto young men such familiar examples and at hand, even by those things that were done and executed. Yet neverthelesse, it were not amisse, otherwhiles to vaunt and to speak highly and magnifically of ones self, for to daunt, beatdown, repress and keep (as it were under hand, a bragging and audacious fellow, like as Nestor himselfe did again in another place:

Conversed have I in my daies, with men of better deed Thanyou iwis, and yet disdaine they never would my reed.

Semblably faid Ariffote unto King Alexander: That lawful it was and befeeming not only for those to have an haughty mind, who had many subjects under them at their command; but such allo as held true opinions as touching the gods. And verily these points are commodious forus other, whiles, even in regard of our enemies, foes, and evil willers, according to that verie in Homer:

Childrenthey are of wretched fires, and born to mifidventure, Whose lucke it is my force of armes in battell to encounter.

Agessium also, having speech upon a time as touching the King of Person, who usually was called the Great Monarch: And wherein (quoth he) is that King greater than my selfe, if shee be not more just and righteous. Epaminondas likewiserepied upon the Lacedemonians, who had framed a long acculation against the Thebans. Well it is (quoth he) and a good turne that we yet have made you give over your accustomed short speech. Thus much of those rules which conceme either our private and particular evill willers, or our publike enemies.

As for our friends and fellow-Citizens, we may likewife by using fiely in time and place, and as the cafe requireth haughty language, not onely take down and cause those to vaile bonner, who are over-proud and audicatious; but also on the other side raise up and encourage sinch, as be distincted, as the beyond measure timorous. For Gruss also in the midst of battell and dangers in war, was wont to speak bravely, but else-where not. And Antigonus the younger, or second of that name, who otherwise was in words sober, models, and nothing proud; yet in a battell at sea which he sought next the Isle Cos; when one of his friends about him faid a little before the medley began: See younot, Sir, how many ships our enemies have more then we? Why (quoth he) for how many ships doit thou reckon me? And it should seem that Homer was of the same mind, and mean so much, when he seigneththat Hyss seeing his people affrighted with the hideous noise and singular valour in laying thus unto them:

Af friends and mates, this accident is not so dangerous,
As when that monstrout Cyclops he, a giant furious, its sum id and courst with mighty force about his hollow cave,
Tet shence we chaid him by my wit, advice, and prowess brave.

For this manner of praifing proceedeth not from a glozing and vaine-glorious Orator, nor a vanting Sophifter, nor from one that feeketh applause, and clapping of hands; but befermeth a personage who pawneth unto his friends, as agage of assurance and confidence, his own vertue and sufficiency. For a matter this is of great importance and consequence tending to safety in dangerous times, to wir, the opinion, reputation and affiance, that we may have of a man in authority, and the experienced proweffe of a Captain. Now albeit I have sufficiently shewed before, that it is neither convenient nor seemly for a man of State and honour to oppose himself against the glory and praise of another. yet neverthelesse when the case so standeth, that a false and perverse commendation doth bring hurt and dammage, and by example inferreth a dangerous imitation of evill things, together with a wicked purpose and lewed intention in matters of great moment, it were not amisse to repulse the same back, or rather to divert and turn away the hearer unto better things, and open unto him the difference: for in mine advice, a man may well take content and delight, to fee that men abstain willingly from vice, when they perceive it to be blamed and reproved; but in lieu of condemning it, if they hear it commended, and if over and befides the pleasure and profit that commonly it leemeth to bring with it, it be held also in honour and reputation, there is not a nature so happy and blessed, nor fo firong and flout withall, but she is able to conquer it: and therefore a man of policy and government ought to make war and fight, not so much against the praises of persons, as of things, in case they be corrupt and naught: for these they be that spill and marre our manners, by reason that with such praises there entreth commonly a will to imitate and follow such dishonest and soule actions, as if they were good and feemly: but then most of all are they detected what they be, and do appear in their colours, when they are compared in opposition with true praises indeed. Thus it is reported, that Theodorus the Tragadian actor, said upon a time unto Satyrus a Comicall Player: That it was no great marvell to make the spectators to laugh, but rather a matter of wonder to cause them for to weep and cry: but (I suppose) a sage and wise Philosopher may well say thus unto the same Theodorus: Nay (good Sir) it is not fogreat a matter to fet men a weeping and wailing, but rather to still and stay their forrow and lamentation, were an admirable thing: for if a man praise himselfin this fort, he profiteth the hearer, and changeth his judgement. Thus did Zeno speake of the great number of Theophrastus his scholers, who resorted unto his school: His quire (quoth he) is greater then mine, but yet mine accordeth better, and maketh the sweeter harmony. Phocion likewise, when as Lessibines still flourished and bare agreat name, being demanded by the Rhetoricians who used to make solemn orations, what good himselse had ever done to the weal-publike, answered them in this manner: None other (quoth he) but this, that all the while I was Lord Generall, and had the conduct of an army, none of you all made ever any funerall oration, but interred all your & tizens who departed this life, in the sepulchers and monuments of your ancestors. As for Crass when he read these verses containing the Epitaph of Sardanapalus:

What hath gone down my throat I have,
my wanton sport remaine, sphiot Lady Venus did vouchsafe,
All else I count but vaine.
Wrote thus againe very wittily and in a pleasant conceit:
What daving life I said thave
and learned, is my gaine,
The tell which muses then me gave,
and nought else I retain,

For fuch manner of praise as this, is excellent, honest and profitable, teaching men to love, esseminated admire such things as be commodious and expedient, and not those that are vaine and superfluous; and therefore this advertisement ought to be ranged with the rest before specified, as toaching the subject argument now in question.

It remaineth now by order and course according as the present theam in hand requireth, and our discourse admonisheth us, to declare how every man may avoid this importunate and unseatonable selfe-praise: for furely to speak of a mans selfe, having selfe-love as a commodious for from whence it issueth, seemeth many times to lay wait and give the assault even unto them who are of all others most modest and farthest from vain-glory. And like as one precept of health there is, to flie and shunne altogether unwholfome tracts and contagious, crat leastwife to take heed of them most carefully if a man be in them; even so there be certained angerous times and slippery places, which one shall slide and fall into upon the least occasion in the world, by rashly speaking of himfelfe. For first and formost, those who are by nature ambitious, when they hear another man prailed, commonly (as it hath been faid before) advance forward to talk of themselves, and then anon this humour of selfe-praise being once provoked and tickled (as it were) with an itch, a cerraine denre and furious appetite of glory which hardly can be held in, taketh hold of them, especially if the party who is praised before them be but equall or inferior to them in merit: for like as they who are hungry have the greater appetite, and are provoked more to ear, when they lee others fall to their meat before them; even so the praise of another inflameth the jealousie of those who be given to the greedy defire of honour and glory. Secondly, the recitall and discourse of thosethings which have been haply executed, and to a mans minde, drive many men into a brave vaunting, for the joy that they conceive in relating the same : for after they bee once fallen into a narration of their victories atchieved in warre, or the enterprises which they have fortunately managed in their foveraign government of State, or their actions and affaires performed under other chiefe Rulers and Commanders, or of the speeches which they have made to great purpose, and good fuccesse and commendation, they cannot contein and hold themselves: to which kind of vaunting and speaking of ones selle, we see those are most subject who are warriours and serve especially at sea; likewise this hapneth usually unto such who are come from the Courts of mighty Princes, or from those places where there hath been exploited some great service: for in making mention of Princes and grand Seignieurs, they cannot chuse but enterlace ordinarily among, fome speeches which those Potentates have delivered to their commendation; and therein they doe not think that they praise themselves, but recite onely the commendable testimonies that others have given out of them: and verily such as these, bee of opinion that the heaters perceive them not, when they recount the embracements, greetings, falutations, and favours which Kings, Emperours, and such great Potentates have bestowed upon them; as if forlooth they rehearfed nor their own felfe-praises, but the courtesses and demonstrations of the bounty and humanity of others; whereof every one of us ought most fully and warily to look unto our selves when we praise any one that the faid praises be pure and fincere, void of suspition, that we do not respect and aim at an oblique selse-love, and speech of our own selves, for seare lest wee make the commendation of Patroclus, as it is in Homer, a covert, colour and pretence of our own praise, and by commending others cunningly, praise our own selves. Moreover, all the sorts of blames and reprehensions of others, are otherwhiles very dangerous, causing those to go out of the way and stumble, who are never so little sick of vaine glory; into which malady old folkemany times incurre, and namely, when they breake out into the reproofe of their youngers. finding fault with their lewd manners and fashions, for then in blaming others, they fall to magnifying themselves, as if in times past they had done wonders, in comparison of those things which now they condemn and verily such as they be we ought to give place unto, in case they be not onely for age, but also in regard of their vertue and reputation venerable: for this manner of rebuke is not unprofitable, but breedeth in those who are chastised by them, a great desire and emulation withall to attein unto the like place of honour and dignity. But as for our felves, we ought to take heed and beware how we trip or tread awry in this cases or the manner of blaming our neighbors, being as it is otherwise very odious and almost intolerable, and which hath need of great caution and warinesse he that minds his proper praise with the blame of another, and seeketh glory by his infamy, cannot chuse but be exceeding hatefull and unsupportable, as if he hunted after renown and honour by the reproachfull and dishonourable parts of his neighbours. Furthermore, as they who naturally are enclined and disposed to laughter, are to avoid and decline the ticklings and fost handling in those parts of the body that are molt smooth, sleecke and tender, which soon yielding and relenting to those light touches, stirre up and provoke immediately that passion of laughing; even so this caveat and advertisement would be given unto such as passionately begiven to this desire of glory, that they abstein from praising themfelves, at what time as they be collauded by others: for a man that heareth him elfe praised, ought indeed to blush for shame, and not with a bold and shamelesse face to hearken thereto, nay, he should do well to reprove those that report some great matter of him, rather then to finde fault for faying toolittle, and not praifing him sufficiently; a thing iwis that many mendo, who are ready of themselves to prompt and suggest, yea and to inferce other magnanimous sacts and prowesses, so far forth that they marre all, aswell the praise that they give themselves, as the laudable testimonial of others. And I assure you many there be who slattering themselves, tickle and puffe up their own conceits with nothing else but wind; others again upon a malicious intent laying some petty praise as it were a bait for them to bite at, draw them on thereby to fall into their own commendation: some also you shall have who to that purpose will keep a questioning with them, and propose certaine demands for the nonce to train them within their toile, and all to have the more matter that they might foon after laugh at. Thus in Menander the glorious fouldier made good sport, being demanded of one,

Good Sir how came you by this wound and scar? DEMAND.

SOULDIER. By dint of Javelin lanced from a far. But how? for Gods lake how? let us allknow: As I a wall did scale I caught this blow. But well I see whiles that I do my best DEMAND. SOULDIER.

This to relate, these make of me a sest.

And therefore in all these cases, a man ought to be as wary as possibly he can, that he neither himfelfe break out in his own praifes, nor yet bewray his weaknesse and folly by such interrogatories; and that he may in the best and most absolute manner take heed thereto, and save himselfe from such inconveniences, the readiest way is to observe others neerly that love to be praisers of themselves; namely, to call to mind and reptefent unto their own remembrance, how displeasant and odious a thing it is to all the world, and that there is or can be no other speech so unsavory, tedious & irksome to heare: for suppose that we are not able to say that we suffer any other harme at their hands, who praise themselves, yet we doe all that we can to avoid such speech; we make shift to be delivered from it, and hasten all that we may to breath our selves, as if it were a heavy burden, which ofit felfe and the own nature overchargeth us, infomuch as it is troublefome and intolerable even to flatterers parafites, and needy imel-feasts in that necessity and indigence of theirs, to hear a rich man, a Prince, a Governour, or a King to praise himselse: nay, they give out that they pay the greatest portion of the shot, when they must have patience to give eare to such vanities; like to that Jesterin Menander, who breaketh out into these words,

Heekilleth me when at his board I fit. And with his cheer I fatter am no whit, But rather pine away, you may be sure, When such bald jests to heare I must endure. And yet as wife and warlike as they feem, A bragging fool and level fot I him deem.

For confidering that we are wont to fay thus, not onely against fouldiers and glorious upstarts newly erriched, whole manner is to make much of their painted sheaths, pouring out brave and project discouries; but also against Sophisters, Rhetoricians and Philosophers, yea and great Captains, puffed up with arrogancy and prefumption, and speaking big words of themselves: If we would call to remembrance that a mans own proper praises be accompanied alwaies with the dispraises of others, and that the end commonly of such vaine glory is shame and infamy; also, that tediousnesse unto the hearers, is (as Demosthenes faith) the reward, and not any opinion to be reputed fuch as they fay, we would bemore sparie and forbear to speak so much of our selves, unless some greater profit and advantage might afterwards grow either to us, or to the hearers in place.

What Passions and Maladies be worse, those of the Soule, or those of the Body?

The Summary.

This present question upon which Plucarch hath framed this declamation, whereof there remains the extant in our hands but one little parcell, hath been of long time discussed and debated among meni the greater is our damage and detriment, that we have here no decision, nor a more ample resolution of it by so excellent a Philosopher as he was: but seeing that this losse cannot be recovered let us seeke for the cleering of all this matter in other authors; but principally in those, who search deeply to the very bottom, for to discover the source of all the maladies of the soule instead of such writers who have treated of moral Philosophy, according to the doctrine and light of nature, onely accompanied with precepts out of her schools and have not touched the point but supersicially, as being supportant what is originall and hereditary cor-ruption; what is since; how it entred first into the world; what are the greatest impressions, assaults, effelts, and what is the end and reward thereof. But to come unto this fragment, our Author after he had hewed that man of all living creatures is most miserable, declarath wherein these humane miseries ought to be considered, and proveth with all that the discoses of the soul are more dangerous than those of the body, for that they be more in number and the same exceeding different, hard to be known and incurable, as evidently it is to be seen in effect, that those who are afflicted with such Maladies, have their judgement depraved and overturned, refusing remedy with the losse of rest and repose, and a singular plensure which they take to discover their unquietness, anxiety and misery.

What Paffions and Maladies are worse, those of the Soules or those of the Body.

O ME R having viewed and considered very wel the fundry forts of living creatures mortall, compared also one kind with another, as well in the continuance as the conversation and manner of their life, concluded in the end with this exclamation,

Lo how of creatures, all one earth which walk and drawtheir wind, More miserable none there are, nor wretched than mankind,

Attributing unto man this unhappy foveraignty, that he hath the superiority in all miseries whatfoever: but we fetting this down for a supposition granted already, that mancarrieth the victory, and furpatieth all others for his infortunity, and is already declared and pronounced the most unhappy wretch of all living creatures, will fer in hand to compare him with his own felle, in a certaine conference of his proper calamities that follow him and that by dividing him, not in vain and unfruitfully, but very pertinently, and to good purpose, into the foul and the body, to the end that we may learn and know thereby, whether we live more miserably in regard of our souls, or ourselves, that is to say, our bodies: for a difease in our body is engendred by nature; but vice and finne in the soul is first an action, but afterwards becommeth a passion thereof: so that it is no small consolation, but maketh much for the contentment of our mind, to know that the worse is curable, and the lighter is that which cannot be avoided.

The Foxin Alope pleading upon a time against the Leopard, as touching the variety of colours in their skins, after that the Leopard had shewed her body, which to the eye and in oneward appearance was well marked and befet with faire spots, whereas the Foxes skin was tawny, foule and ill favoured to feeto: But you (quoth he) fir Judge, if you look within, shall find me more footted and divers coloured, then that Leopard there; meaning the craft and subtilty which hee had to turn and change himselse in divers sorts, as need required; after the same manner let us fay within our felves : Oman, thy body breedeth and bringeth forth many maladies and paffions naturally of it selfe, manyalso it receiveth and entertaineth comming from without, but if thou wilt anatomize and open thy selfe, thou shalt find within, a save, an ambry, nay, a storehouse and treasurie (as Democritus saith) of many evils and maladies, and those of divers and fundry sorts, not entring and running in from abroad, but having their original sources springing out of the ground, and home-bred, the which vice abundant, rich and plenteous in paffions putteth forth. Now, whereas the diseases that possesse the body and the slesh, are discoveared and known by their imflammations and red colour, by pulles also or beating of the atteries, and namely, when the vilage is more red or pale than customably it is, or when some extraordinary heat of laffitude, without apparent cause, bewraieth them: contrariwise, the infirmities and maladies of the soule are hidden many times unto those that have them, who never thinke that they be ficke and ill at eafe; and in this regard worfe they be, for that they deprive the patients of the fenfe and feeling of their ficknesse: for the discourse of reason, whiles it is sound and whole, feeleth the maladies of the body; but as for the diseases of the soule, whiles reason her selfe is fick, she hath no judgement at all of that which shee suffereth, for the selfe same that should indees disaled: and we are to deem and effeem, that the principall and greatest malay of the foule is folly, by reason whereof vice, being remedilesse and incurable in many, is cohabitant in them, liveth and dieth with themsfor the first degree and very beginning of a cure, is the knowledge of a disaste, which leadeth and directeth the patient to seek for help; but he who will not believe that he is amisse or sick, not knowing what he hath need of, although a present remedy were offered unto him, will refuse and reject the same. And verily, among those diseases which afflict the body, those are counted worst which take aman with a privation of sense; as lethargies, in elerable Head-ach, or Phrenses, Epilepsies or Falling evils, Apoplexies and Feavers ardent; for these burning Agues many times augment their heat so much, that they bring a man to the losse of his right wits, and so trouble the senses, as it were in a musicall instrument, that

Which touched should not be, but lie apart.
Which is the reason that practitioners in physick defire and with in the first place, that a man were not fick at all, but if he be fick, that hee been ot ignorant and fenfleffe altogether of his difeate; a thing that ordinarily befalleth to all those who be fick in minds for neither witleffe tools, nor diffolute and loose persons, ne yet those who be unjust and deale wrongfully, think that they do amis and sinne i nay, some of them are perswaded that they do right well. Never was there man yet, who esteemed an ague to be health, nor the phthisick or consumption to be a good plight and habit of the body, nor that the gout in the feet was good footmanship, ne yet that to be ruddy and pale or yel-low, was all one, yet you shall have many who are diseased in minde, to call hastinesse and choler valiance; wanton love amity; envy, emulation; and cowardife, wary prudence. Moreover, they that be bodily fick, send for the physicians (because they know whereof they stand inneed) for to heal their difeases; whereas the other avoid and shun the sage Philosophers; for sagy thinke verily, that they do well when they sauk most. Hoon this reason we hold that the ophinal my that is to fay, the inflammation of bloud-fhotten eies, is a lefte malady, than Mania, that is to fay, rage and furious madnefle; and that the gout in the feet is nothing fo bad as the phrenie, which is an inflammarious inaudencement that the brain; for the one of these patients finding himselfe diseased, crieth our top pain, and called for the physician, and no sooner is he come, but he sheweth him his diseased ciefor to dresse and anoint, he holdeth forth his veine for to be opened, and yieldeth urro him his head to be cured; whereas you shall heare Lady Agave in the Tragadies, fo farre transported out of all sense and understanding (by reason of her raging fit) that she knew not those persons which were most deare and entire unto her; for thus she laith:

This little one here newly kill'd, And cut in pieces in the field,

Ana cut in pieces in one pieta,

From hils we bring to dwelling place,

How happy, O, hath been our chafe!

As for him who is fick in body, prefearly yieldeth thereto, he laies him down upon his pallet, or taketh his naked bed, he eafeth himselfeall that he can, and is content and quiet all the while that the physician hath him in cure; but peradventure if he tumble and tosse in his bed, sling and cast off his clothes, by reason that his body is tormented with some grievous hot fit, no sooner stirreth henever so little, but one or other that standeth or sitteth by to tend him, is ready to say gently unto him:

Poore soul be quiet, feare none ill, Deare heart in bed, see thou lie still.

He staieth and keepeth him down, that he shall not start and leap out of his bed: but contrariwise, those that be surprised with the passions of the soule, at such a time be most busie, then they be least in repose and quiet; for their violent motions be the causes moving their actions, and their passions are the vehement fits of fuch motions: this is the cause that they wil not let the soulto be at rest, but are the venezing the same and the most need of patience, silence and quiet retrait, they draw him most of all abroad into the open aire; then are discovered soonest his choletick passions, his opinionative and contentious humours, his wanton love and his grievous forrowes, enforcing him to commit many enormities against the lawes, and to speak many words unleasonably, and not befitting the time.

Like as therefore much more perilous is the tempest at sea, which impeacheth and putteth back a ship, that it cannot come into the harbour to ride at anchor, than that which will not suffer it to get out of the haven, and make faile in open fea; even so those tempessuous passions of the soul are more dangerous which will not permit to be at rest, nor to settle his discourse of reason once troubled, but overturneth it upfide down, as being disturnified of Pilots and cables, not well ballaifed in the florm, wandring to and fro without a guide and fleers-man, carried maugre into rafh and dangerous courfes, fo long until in the end it falleth into fome shipwrack, and where it overthroweth the whole life, in such fort that in regard of these reasons and others sembable, I conclude, that worse it is to be soul-sick, than diseased in body; for the bodies being sick, suffer only, but the foules if they be fick, both suffer and do also amisse. To prove this, what need we further to particularize and alledge for examples many other passions, considering that the occasion of this prefent time is sufficient to admonish us thereof, and to refresh our memorie? See you not this great multitude and presse of people thrusting and thronging here about the Tribunall and common place of the City; they are not all assembled hither to factifice to the Tuttelargods, Protectors of their native Countrey, not to participate in common the same Religion, and sarced ceremonies of divine service; they are not all met here together for to offer an oblation unto Jupiter Assemble, out of the first fruits of Lydia, and to celebrate and solemnize in the honour of Bacchus, during these holy nights, his festivall revels with dances, masks and mummeries accustomed: but like as by yearly acceffe and anniverfarie revolutions, the forcible vigour of the petitlence returned forto irritare and provoke all Afia; fo they refort hither to entertain their fuits and processes in law to follow their pleas; and a worldhere is of affairs, like to many brooks and rivulets which run all at once into one channell and main fiream; so they are met in the same place, which is pettered and filled with an infinite multitude of people, to hurt themselves and others. From what Fevers or cold, ague-fix, proceed thefe effects? from what tentions or remissions, augmentations or diminutions? from what distemperature of heat, or overspreading of cold humours comes all this? If you ask of every severall cause here in suit, as if they were men and able to answer you from whence it arose, how it grew, and whereupon it came and first began; you shall find that one matter was engendred, by fome wilfull and proud anger; another proceeded from a troublesome and litigious spirit; and a third was caused by some unjust desire and unlawfull lust.

The Precepts of Wedlocke.

The Summary.

VV. E have here a mixture and medley of rules for married folks, who in the perfons of Pollianus anz. Burydice, are taught their mutuall daty: upon which argument needlesse it is to discourse as large-considering that the whole, matter is set out particularly, and tendeth to this point: That both at the beginning, in the sequel also and continuation of marriage man and mife ought to assist, support, and love. one another with a single heart and affection, farreremoved from disdainfull pride, violence, vanity, and filthinesse? the which is specified and comprised in 45. Articles showbest in such fort, that there be some of pietonieje: 100 mm. - 17 which fewore of the coruption of tholetimes, here as the infufficiency of humane wife-dome, unless the lightned with Gods truth. We see also in this I realis, more particular advertisements. appropriate to both parties, touching their devoir as well at home as abroads, and all enriched with notable; fimilitudes and excellent examples. In summe, if these precepts following be well weighed and practised, they are able to make manslife much more easie and commodious than it is. But Plutarch sheweth sufficiently by the thirtieth rule, how hard a matter it is to retaine each one in their severall duty; and that in manner all da regard and looke upon things with another eie, than they ought. However it be, these persons whom vertue bath linked and joined together in matrimony, may finde here whereby to profit; and persons whom version that they have one lesson, which netural equity and conscience putteth them in mind: of every day, if they will enter never so little into themselves, which being joined with the command:ments of the heavenly wisedome, it cannot be but husband and wife shall live in contentment and bleffed

The Precepts of Wedlocke.

PLUTARCH to POLLIANUS and EURY-DICE, sendeth greeting.

Free the accustomed ceremoniall link of marriage in this country, which the Priestels of Ceres hath put upon you, incoupling you both together in one bed-chamber, I suppose that this discourse of mine, comming as it doth to favourize and second this bond and conjunction of yours, in furnishing you with good lessons and nuptial wise advertisements, wil not be unprofitable but found, very fitting and conformable to the culfornarie wedding fong observed in these parts. Themuscians among other tunes that they had with the haut boies, used one kind of note which they called Hippotharos, which is as much to fay as Leap-mate; having this opinion that it firred and provoked stallions to cover mares. But of many beautifull and good discourses which Philosophie affordeth untous, onethere is which deserveth no lesse to bee esteemed than any other, by which shee seeming to enchant and charm those who are come together to live all the daies of their life in mutuall fociety, maketh them to be more buxome, kinde, tractable, and pliable one to the other. Therefore I have made a certain collection of fuch rules and precepts which your felves have heard already oftentimes, being both of you trained up and nourifhed in the study of Philosophy; and reduced them all in few words to certain principall heads and articles, to the end that they might be more easily remembred: the which I fend as a common prefent to you both, befeeching withall the Muses, that they would vouchsafe in your behalfe, and for your owne fake to affift and accompany the goddesse Venus; forasmuch as their office is to make a good confonance and accord in marriage and house-keeping, by the meanes of reason and harmonie Philosophicall, no lesse than to set in tune a lute or harp, or any musicall in-

I And to begin withall: This is the reason that our ancients ordeined, that the image of Verus should be placed jointly with that of Mercury, as giving us thereby to understand, that the delight and pleasure of marriage, had need especially to be maintained with good language and wife speeches: they used to set also with these two images, the Graces, and Goddesse of Eloquence, Lady Piths, that is, Perfivafion, intending thereby, that thofe folks whom the bond of matrimony had linked together, might obtein what they defired one at the others hand gently and by faire means, not by debate, chiding and brawles.

2 Solon gave order and commanded that the new-wedded bride should eat of a Quince before that she came in bed with her bridegroom; signifying coverrly in mine opinion by this dark ceremony, that first and above all, the grace proceeding from the mouth, to wit, the breath and the voice ought to be sweet, pleasant, and agreeable in every respect. 260

3 In the Countrie of Bastia, the cultome was upon the wedding day when the nuptiall vaile was put over the bride, for to set also upon her head a chaplet made of wild preckie Spirach branches, for that this plant out of a most sharp and pricking thorn, putteth forth a most pleasant and dele-Stable fruit; even fo, the wedded wife in case her husband do not reject and flie her company, for the first difficulties and troublesome inconveniences incident to marriage, shall bring unto him afterwards, a sweet and amiable society; but they that cannot endure at first the jarres and quarrels of their young wives, whom they married virgins, may for all the world be refembled to those who give away ripe grapes from themselves to others, because they besowre before they are ripe; semblably, many new wedded wives, who take a disdain to their husbands by reason of some debates and encounters at the first, do much like unto those who having abidden the sting of the Bee, cast away the hony-comb out of their hands. It behooveth therefore new-married folk, to take heed especially in the beginning, that they avoid all occasions of diffention and offence givings confidering this with themselves, and seeing daily that the pieces of woodden vessels which are newly joined and glued together, at the first are soon disjoined, and go asunder again upon the least occasion in the world, but after that in continuance of time the joint is strongly setled, and foundly confimed, a man shall hardly part and separate one piece from another, with fire, or iron edged tool,

4 And like as fire kindleth foon and catcheth a flame if it meet with light flubble, chaffe, or the haire of an hare, but it quickly goeth out again, if there be not put thereto some matter or fewell anon, which may both hold in and also maintaine and feed the same; even so, we are to think that the love of young wedded persons, which is enflamed and set on fire by youth, and the beauty of the body onely, is not firm and durable, unless it be furely founded upon the conformity of good and honest manners; and take hold of wisedome, whereby it may engender a lively affection and re-

Fishes are soon caught and taken up by baits made of empoisoned paste, or such like medicines but their meat is naught and dangerous to be eaten; femblably, those women who compound certain love-drinks, or device other charms and forceries for to give their husbands, and think by fuch allurements of pleasure, to have the hand and command over them, it is all to nothing, that afterwards in their life together, they shall find them to be blockish, foolish, and sensesse companions. Those men whom Circe the famous forceresse enchanted with her witchcraft, did her no pleasure, neither served they her in any stead, being transformed as they were into Swine and Asses; whereas she loved and affected entirely and exceedingly Myffes, an ingenious man, and who conversed wisely with her; but such wives as had rather be mistresses and over-rule their doltish husbands than obey them that be wife and men of understanding, may very properly be compared unto them, who chuse rather to lead and conduct the blind, than to be guided by those that see, and to follow them that have knowledge. These women will never believe that Pasiphas being a Kings wife loved a Bull, not with standing they see some wives that cannot endure their husbands, if they be any thing auftere, grave, fober and honeft, but they abandon and give themselves over more willingly to accompany with such as be composed altogether of luxurious loosenesse, of filthy lust and voluptuousnesse, like as if they were dogs or goats.

6 Some men there be so tender, seeble, and esseminate, that being not able to mount up their horse-backs as they stand, teach them to stoop and rest upon their knees, that they may get upon them; and even to you shall find divers husbands, who having espouted rich wives, and descended of noble Houses, never study to make them better, but keep down their wives, and hold them under, being periwaded that they shall rule them the better when they are thus humbled and brought low; whereas indeed they should as well maintain the dignity of their wives, as regard and keep the just statute and height of their horses, as well in the one as the other, make use of the bridle.

We see that the Moon, the farther that shee is from the Sun, the brighter shee shineth, and is more clear, & when she approacheth neer unto his raies and beams, she loseth her light and is darkned; but a chalt, honest and wife woman must do clean contrary, for she ought to be most feen with her husband, and if he be away, to keep close and hold her selfe within house.

8 It was not well faid of Herodotus; That a woman casteth off her pudicity, when she putteth off her smock or inner garment; for clean contrary it is in a chaste and sober matron, for instead thereof the putteth on shamefastness and honesty; and the greatest signe of all other that married folke do love reciprocally is this, when they have most reverence and shamefast regard one to the

9 Like as if one take two founds that accord together, the base is alwaies more heard and the fong isascribed to it; even so in an house well ordered and governed, all goes well which is done by the confent of both parties; but evident it is and apparent that the conduct counsell and direction of the husband is that which effecteth it.

10 The Sunne upon a time (as the fable goeth) had the victory over the northern winde; for when the said wind blew forcibly upon a man, and with the violence of its blasts, did what it could to drive his cloake or upper garment from off his shoulders, the man strived to much the more to hold it on and keep it close about him; but when the Sun came to be hot after the said wind was laid, and fet the man in exceeding heat by his beams, he was glad to throw off his faid cloak; yea and feeling himfelf to burn with heat put off his coat, thirt and all; and even femblably do the most part of women, for when they perceive that their husbands by their authority, and perforce will take from them their superfluous delights and vain pleasures, they strive again and make resistance, and are offended and discontented therewith; but when as contrariwise they come unto them with gentle remonstrances and mild perswasions, then of themselves they will be content peaceably to lay them aside, and endure all with patience.

Precepts of Wedlocke.

11 Cate deprived a Senator of Rome of his honourable place, for that in the presence of his own daughter, he killed his wife. I cannot himply commend this act of his, for it layoured peradventure too much of feverity and rigour: but if it be (as no doubt it is) an unfeemly fight for man and wife to kifle; clip, embrace, and use dalliance together in the prefence of others; how can it chuse but be more shamefull and unfeemly to chide, braule, and raunt one another before strangers? and when a manhath plaied, sported, and used love delights insecret with his wife, afterwards in open place to check, rebuke, mp and gird at her with spightful speeches in the face of the world?

12 Like as a mirrour or looking-glasse garnished with gold and precious stones, serveth to no purpole, if it do not represent to the life, the face of him or her that looketh into it; no more as purpole, if it do not repretent to the ine, the face of him or her that gooseth into it; no, more sign woman worth ought, the field the contom and frame her telle, her life, her manners and conditions intable in all reprets to her hisband. A falle mirrour it is, and good for nothing, that shewthat fad and heavy councemance to him who is metry and locitind, and contrastively, which retemblesh a glad and finding, vising, to one who is melanticulate, angry; and discontent; even to a bad woman is she and a very unroward piece, when her hisband is defithe other section and would be merry in disporting with her, frowner hand looketh doggedly under the browes, and on the other fide, when she sect him ampled in serious matters, and in a deep fludy about his affaires, is set on a merry pin, aid given to mixth and laighter; for as the one is a sen or inverse plumme and unpleasant yoke-sellow, of the other bewrated a woman that setteth light by the affections of her husband; whereas undeed besitting it were, that as (by the laying of Geometricians) the lines and superfices move not a all of themselves, but according to the motions of the bodies; even so a wife should have no proper passion or peculiar affection of her own, but be a partaker of the sports, serious affaires, sad countenance, deep thoughts, and smiling looks of her

13 They that take no pleasure, nor cannot away that their wives do eat and drink freely with them at the table in their fight, doe as much as reach them how to cram themselves and fill their gorge apart when they be alone ; even to they that will not vouchiate to live merrily, and be plea-fant with their wives, nor can abide to disport and laugh privately with them, teach them the ready way to feek their pleasures and their delights by themselves.

14 The Kings of Persia at their ordinary meals have their Queens or espoused wives to fit by them at the board, but when they lift to be merric indeed, and carroule luftly until they be drank, they fend them awayto their chambers, and call for their concubines, finging wenches, and mulical truls in their place; * I can commend them yet for so doing, in that they would not have their own * Planach lawfull wives to be partakers of their drunkennesse and licentious loosenesse. If therefore it chance hereis smel that fome private person abandoned to his own pleasures, untaught, and given to leaved conditions, corruption in this time : for chance to do a fault in abusing himselfe, either with his Paramour, or his wives chamber-maid, his a change wife must not be angry for thematter, and frown at him for it, but rather thus to think with her self, dame & how and make this confiruction, that her husband being loth and affraid to offend her with his drung wilnor abide kennesse, unbridled lust and intemperance, turned another way for that purpose, to purpose, 15 Kings, if they love Musick, cause many good Musicians to be in their Kingdome; if they feet ry, nor wisk their minds upon their book, they make many learned Clerks; if they be given to lear of activity, at the bust-bands follier. and exercise of the body many of their subjects (by that example) will prove champions and tall men in that case, of their hands even so a husband that loveth to trim and pamper his body, canfeth his wife (by that means) to fludy nothing elie but the tricking and pruning of her felfe; he that followeth his pleafures and wanton delights, maketh her alio to be lascivious and to play the harlotibut who that embraceth honesty, and ensueth vertue and good things, by his example shall have an honest vertuous,

16 A young woman of Sparta being asked a question by one, whether she had medled or lien yet with her husband: Not I (quoth she) but he hath with me. And in very truth, in this manner (by mine advice) it would become an honest matron and huswife to behave her selfe toward her husband, that the neither reject and distain, dalliance and love-sports with him, if he begin with her, nor yet her selfe offer such temptations first unto him; for as this is a trick of a wanton and unshame-faced strumper, so the other bewraieth a proud woman, and one who is nothing lovely nor

17 A woman ought to have no peculiar friends by her felle, but to use her husbands friends, and take them as her own. Confidering then, that the gods challenge the first and principall place in friendship, * the wife is to acknowledge and worship the same gods (and none else but those) whom * Hereia also pleaseth size. her husband honoureth, serveth and reputeth gods; moreover, she ought to shut and lock the gate wethor what against all curious and new inventions of religions, and not to entertaine any strange and forreinfuperflitions; for I affure you, to none of the Gods can those divine services and factifices be acceptable. which a woman will seem to celebrate by stealth, and without the knowledge and privity of her

18 Plato writeth, that the City is blefied and happy, wherein a man shall never hear these words; This is mine, and, this is not mine: for that the inhabitants thereof have all things there(especially, if they be of any worth and importance) as neer as possibly they can, common among them: but these words ought rather to be banished out of the State of Matrimony, unlesse it be (as the Physicians hold) that the blowes or wound which are given on the lest side of the body, are selt on the right; even so a wife ought to have a fellow-feeling (by way of sympathy and compassion) of her husbands calamities, and the husband of his wives, much more; to the end, that like as those knots are much more fast and strong, when the ends of the cords are knit and interlaced one within another, even fo the bond of marriage is more firm and fure, when both parties (the one as well as the other) bring with them a mutuall affection and reciprocall benevolence, whereby the fellowship and communion between them is maintained jointly by them both; for nature herselse hath made a mixture of us, of two bodies, to the end that by taking part of one, and part of another, and mixing all together, she might make that which commeth thereof, common to both, in fuch fort, as neither of the twaine can differne and diffinguish what is proper to the one, or peculiar to the other. This communion of goods especially, ought principally to be among those who are linked in wedlock, for that they should put in common, and have all their havoir incorporate into one substance, in such wise, as they repute not this part proper to one, and that part peculiar to another, but the whole proper to themselves, and nothing to another; and like as in one cup where there is more water then wine, yet we say nevertheless that the whole is wine; even so the goods and the house ought to bear the name of the husband, although peradventure the wife brought with her the bigger portion,

19 Helene was coverous, and Paris lastivious; contrariwise, Usffer was reputed wise, and Penelope chaste; and therefore the marriage of these last named, was blessed, happy and beloved; but the conjunction of those two before, infortunate, bringing upon the Greeks and Barbarians both, a whole Iliad, that is to fay, an infinite masse of miseries and calamities.

20 A gentleman of Rome, who esponsed an honest, rich, faire, and young Lady, put her away, and was divorced from her; whereupon being reproved and sharply rebuked by all his friends, he put forth his foot unto them. and shewed them his shoo: What find you (quoth he) in this shoo of mine amiste? new it is and fair to see too how beit there is not one of you all knoweth where it wringest me, but I wot well where the fault is, and feel the inconvenience thereof. A wise therefore is not to stand so much upon her goods, and the dowry she brings; nor in the nobility of her race and parentage, ne yet in her beauty, as in those points which touch her husband most, and come neeth to his heart; i namely, her convertation and sellowship, her manners, her carriage and demeano; in all respects so disposed, that they be all not harsh, nor troublesome from day to day unto her husband, but pleasant, lovely, obsequious, and agreeable to his humour; for like as Physicians feare those seares which are engendred of secret and hidden causes within the body, gathering in long continuance of time by little and little, more then such suspecced from evident and apparent cares withour; even so there shill out otherwhiles petty jars, daily and continuall quarrels between man and wise, which they see and know stull little that be abroad; and these they be which breed separation, and cause them to part sooner than any thing else, these marre the pleasure of their cohabitation, more then any other cause whatever.

21 King Philip was enamoured with a Thefialonian woman, who was supposed and charged, by her forcries and charms to have enchanted him to love her; whereupon Queen Olympias his wife wrought fo, lithat she got the woman into her hands; now when she had well viewed her person, and considered her beautifull visage, her amiable favour, her comely grace, and how her speech shewed well that she was a woman of some noble houle, and had good bringing up: Our upon the slanderous surmises (quoth she) and sale imputations; for I see well, that the charms and forcries which thou useft are in thy selie. In like manner we must think, that an espoused and legitimate wise, is as one would say, a fort inexpugnable, namely, such an one, as sin her selfe reposing and placing all these things, to wit her dowrie, nobility, charms, and love-drinks, yea, and the very tissue or girdle of Forms, by her study and endevour, by her gentle behaviour, her good grace and vetue) is able to win the affectionate love of her husband for ever.

22 Another time, the same Queen Osimpias hearing that a certain young gentleman of the Court had married a Lady, who though she were fair and wel-savoured, yet had not altogether the best name: This man (quoth shee) hath no wit at all in his head, for otherwise he would never have married according to the countell and appetite of his eies only. And in truth we ought not to go about forto contract marriage by the eie or the singers, as some do who count with their singers how much mony, or what goods a wife bringeth with her, never casting and making computation of her demeanour and conditions, whether shee is owell qualified, as that they may have a good life with her.

a3 Secrete: was wont to counfell young men who used to see their faces, and look upon themselves in mirrours, if they were foule or ill favoured, to correct that deformity by venue; if they were faire, not to solicand staine their beauty with vice; semblably, it were very well that the mistresse of an house having in her hand a looking glasse, should say thus unto her self-sis shee be soule and deformed: What a one should I be, if I were naught or lewd with all? If sair and well-savoured, how highly shall I be esteemed, if I bee house and with besides? for if an hard-favoured woman be leved for her faire and gentle conditions, he hath more honour thereby, than if the wan loveby beauty onely.

24 The tyrant of Sicily (Dionysius) fent upon a time unto the daughters of Lysander, certaine rich robes, colly wreaths, and precious jewels as presents; but Lysander would not receive these gifts, saying: These presents would bring more shame then honour to my daughters. And the Poet Sophocles, before Lysanders time, wrote to the like effect in these verses:

This will (O wretch) to thee none honour bring, But may bethought a foule and shamefull thing; It dash bewray a sop and soci in kinde, Andone who bears a most lascivious minde.

Andone who bear a mift lafevious minde.

For (according as the Philosopher Craes faid) That is an ornament which doth adorn; and that adorneth a wife, which maketh her more comely and decent: this are not jewels of gold able to do nor emeratude and other precious stones, nor purple and skarlet robes, but that only which caudonor emeratude and other precious stones, nor purple and skarlet robes, but that only which caudonor emeratude and other precious stones, nor purple and skarlet robes, but that only which caudonor emeratude and other precious stones.

feth her to be reputed grave, fober, lowly and modest.

27 Those that sacrificed to June (surnamed Gameria, that is, Nuptiall) offered not the gall with the rest of the beast that was killed, but plucked it out of the body; cast it aside, and laid it by, about the altar; by which-ceremony, be whosever he was that first instituted it, would give us to understand; that in marrimony there ought to be nogall, that is to say, no bitter choler and anger at all; he meant not thereby that a woman should not be grave, for a wise and marron that is mistressed an house, must carry an austre countenance in some fort, but this sufferity or crattensse ought to be like that verdure which is in wine, that is to say, who slome and pleasant, not bitter or eager in any wife as is Aloe Succestrine, nor refembling any fuch purgative drugs.

26 Plato perceiving Xenocrates the Philosopher (a man otherwise vertuous and well disposed) to be given a little to over-much severity, admonished him to sacrifice unto the Graces; even so I suppose, that a vertuous dame hath need also of the Graces help, as much as of any thing else, when the converteth with her husband, to the end that the may live in joy with him (as Metrodom faith) and not move him to anger and displeasure, for all she be an honest and chaste matron, and so repent another day of her pudicity : for neither must a frugall huswife and saving dame neglect to be clean and neat, nor she that loveth her husband entirely, cease to offer kindnesse unto him, and deal with him after an amiable and loving fort; for furely the fowre convertation of a woman maketh al her honesty to be but odious, like as sluttery also causeth al her frugality and thrist to be hatefull and displeasant; insomuch as she who is afraid to look pleasantly, and smile upon her husband, or to shew some such like love-tricks, because for sooth she would not be thought bold and wanton, is much like unto her, who because she would not seem to have her head besmeared with precious perfumes, forbeareth also to be annointed with oile, and for that folke should not think that the painteth her face, will not fo much as wash the same. Poets we see and Oratours, as many of them as would avoid a base, illiberall, and ill-affected kind of stile, without good grace, which breedeth redionsnesse in the reader and hearer, study and endevour with all the wit they have, to entertain and move both the one and the other, by their fine invention, good dispose, and naturall representation of the manners of each person; and even so an honest dame and huswite shall do well to avoid and reject all superfluity, all curiosity, and in one word whatsoever savoureth of a whore, or such an one as loveth to shew her selfe abroad in pompous manner, and rather imploy all her wit, her art and industry in the pleasant and amiable carriage of her selfe; in her affability and lovely converfation with her husband, daily and housely acquainting and accultoming him to honefly and decency with pleasure and delight. Howbeit, if it fall out so, that some one woman be so austere of nature, that by no meanes which the husband useth, he can make her pleasant and sociable in this case he must be content and beare his own crosses and like as Phocion answered to Antipater, who required him to do a dishonest act, and little beseeming his estate: Sir, (quoth he) you cannot have me to be your friend and a flatterer too; even so must be say to himselfe of such a wife, who is fowre and unpleasant, but yet honest: It is not meet that I should look to converse with her as a true espoused wife, and a light harlot also.

27 The Egyptian wives by the ancient cultome of their Countrie, weare no shooes at all on their sec, to the end that this sashion of going might put them in mind to keepe home; but far otherwise it is with our dames for the most part, from whom if you take their gilded pantoses, their carkanets, their bracelets, their fine garters, their purple garments and pearles, they will never go once out of their houses.

Theano, as she one day dressed her selfe, and put on her raiment, chanced to shew her arme a good way bare, and when one that stood by perceived it, and said withall: Oh there is a fair elbow: True (quoth she) but it is not for every man; and even so, nor the arme onely of a chaste and honest dame ought not to be common, but also not so much as her very speech; for she is as well in manner to take heed and beware how she open her mouth and speake much, as to discover and lay her body naked before strangers, for that her manners, actions, and conditions which shee hath, she openeth unto others when she speaketh.

29 Phidias, when hee made the image of Venus for the Elasns devised that shee should tread with her feet upon a tortoise shell, signifying thereby that a woman ought to keep home and not goe forth of doors, but stay within house with silence; for surely a wife is to speake either unto her husband onely, or else by the means of her husband; neither must she think much and be offended, if like the minittell that ioundeth the hautboies, she utter a lowder and bigger voice then her own, by the tongue of another.

30 Great men and rich, Princes also and Kings, in honouring Philosophers, do grace both them and their own selves; but Philosophers in making court and doing service unto those rich and mighty personages, adde thereby no reputation unto them, but make themselves more honoured and bettered accepted; semblably it fareth with wives, for when they be subject to their husbands they winne praise and commendations but when they will needs be masters, they get greater shape.

they winne praise and commendation, but when they will needs be mafters, they get greater flame by it, and do more undecently, than thoise whom they have the maftery of. For by good gipts, the husband onghe to rule over the wife i not as the Lord over his flaw, or that which he possible that after the lame manner as the foulgoverneth the body, by a certaine mutual love and reciprocall affection, wherewith he is linked unto her: for as the foule may well have care of the body, without full beginning it felle to the pleasures and difordinate lusts thereof; even so, may a husband havety toveraignty over his wife, and withall exercise the same neverthelesse in all kindnesse, and be ready to gratifie and please her.

31 Philosophers doe hold opinion that of bodies some consist of parts disjoined and difind and separate one from another, as a fleet of ships or an army of men; others of pieces joined together and touching close one another, as an house or a ship; and some againe be compofed of parts united and incorporate into one nature living and growing together, as the bodies of living creatures. Much like to these compositions is wedlock : for the conjunction of those in marrimony, who love entirely one another, and for pure love be linked in marriage, refembleth a body, the parts whereof are naturally united together: that copulation of those who marry for rich dowries, wealth, or procreation of children, may be compared to that body which standeth of pieces, that touch onely and meet together in a joint : but luch a marriage as respecteth nothing but carnall company in bed together, is like unto those bodies, the parts whereof stand asunder, and neither be united in one, nor touch one the other. But like as the naturall Philosophers affirm, that liquid bodies or humours be those which are apt to bee mingled wholly one with another in every partievento, it behoveth that of those who are joined together in matrimony, the bodies, goods, friends and familiar, be totally intermingled together: which is the reason that the law-giver in setting down the Roman Lawes storbad express such as were entred into the bond of wedlock to give and receive any gifts interchangeably or to make mutuall donation not intending thereby that they should participate in nothing, but that they should repute all things in common between 32 A custome there was in Leptiza City situate in Libya, that the new-wedded bride the moreov after her marriage, should fend unto the bridegrooms mother, for to borrow a brassle pot or textile to hang over the fire; but his mother-in law must deny is, and say, she hath none for het; to the end that this young wife being at the first acquainted with the sashions of her mother-in law, savouring somewhat of a crooked step-dame, might northink it strange or be much grieved in chan, e afterward that she dealmore hardly with her. A wife knowing hus much, ought betime to meet with all occasions of such ordinary offences which proceed from nothing elle; but a jellouse that a slep-mother hath over her, for the love that she beareth unto her some : The only remedy of which passions is this, that the new wedded wife endevour to to winne the affection of the husband, that she do not withall diminish nor withdraw that affection of his, which a son ought to bear unto his naturall mother.

33 It feemeth that mothers ordinarily of children, love their fonnes better then the daughters, as at whole hands they hope for more fuccour another day; and fathers contrariwise affect their daughters more, as who have more need of their helping hand; and peradventure it may be, that in regard of the honour the one beareth to the other, either of them would feem to carry greater a feetiton to that which is more proper and familiar to the other; and yet happily this holdeth not alwaise, but there may be fome difference therein; but certainly a civill part it is, and very well befining a which to hew her selfe to have a better inclination to honour, and make much other husbands parents than her own; ea, and if at any time she be offended or grieved at ought, to conceal her gift from her own father and mother, and to lay the same open, and make her moane unto his; for indeclaring that, the hath the better affiance and trust in them, she gaineth more considence at their hands, and by seeming to love them better, she is rather beloved of them againe.

34 The Captaines under Cyrus gave commandement to their fouldiers, that when the enemies gave the charge upon them with greater our-cries, they should receive them with slence; and contrariwise, if they came to a slaile and set upon them in sience, they should encounter them with mighty shoulds; even so, women that are wise and of good understanding, when they perceive their husbands in choler, and thereupon growing to high words, use to hold their rongues; and on the other side, it their husbands go up and down and say nothing, although they be angly, ought to move speech unto them, and by taire language to appeale and mitigate their mood Wildly did the Poet Europides in reproving those that called for the harp and other minitresse as feasts where they drank wine liberally: For it behoved tather (quoth he) to have misself, when as men be in fits either of choler or melanchosie, to delay their anger and heavinesse, than to enervite them yet more, who are in their merriments and pleasureenseebled already; semblably so must think that you do a fault, if you go to bed and company together for topleasure one another, and when you be at some debate and difference, you part beds and lie as under; not calling at since for the aid of Lady Venus, who knoweth best, and is wont in such cases to remedy all; which the Poet Homer in one place reacheth us very well, where he bringeth in Dame Juno speaking in Precepts of Wedlock.

Their long debates I will foon end, and bitter brawls compose, By bringing them to bed both twain to sport and take repose.

Certes a wife ought at all times, and in every place to avoid the occasion of quarrels with her husband, and the husband likewise with the wife is but especially they must beware how they sall out when they are in one bed, for to solace one another, and to sleep together. A good wife there was, who when she was in travel, and ready to cry out, as feeling the throws coming thick upon her, and not able to endure them, when the women about her would have laid her upon a bed. And how can (quoth she) this bed ease the pains of this my malady, seeing I gat it first upon the samebed; and even so verily the quarrels, brawls, shrewd words, and angry fits which arise in bed; hardly can be taken up and ended at any other time, or else where than in bed.

35. It feemeth that Lady Hermione spake truely, when in a Tragedy of Euripides she said thus:

Lewd women, who to my house did resort,

Have me undone, and rais da badreport.

Howbeit this is not fimply true, nether falleth it out always fo when fuch use to come into an house, but only at those times when the quarrellous brawls and jealous fits of a wise with her husband openeth not the doors only of the house, buther ears allo to such gossips. At such a time therefore a wise woman ought to stop her ears, and take heed of their whitpering and pratting suggestions, for fear let she stirred woodles, or put fire to fire, and to have in readinesse the saying of King Philip of Macedon: for we read of him, that when his friends incited him to anger against the Greeks, who (notwithstanding he was so gracious unto them, and had received many favours at his hands) ceased not to backbie and slander him, made them this answer: What think you will they do then, if I should work them a shrewd turn? semblably when make bate women shall come twasting and say: How doth your husband missife you, loving him, and making so much of him as you do in all duty and loialty? your answer must be: What will become of me then if I should begin to hate him and do him injury.

36 A certain master there was upon a time who espised a slave of his that was long before run away, and when he had set his eye upon him, ran apace for to take hold of him; the poor slave fled still, and gat at length a mill-house over his head: That's happy (quoth the master to himself) I would not wish to meet with him in a better place; even so a woman who upon jealousie is upon the point to be divorced and depart from her husband, and being ill appaid in hermind for being driven to this hard exigent, should thus speak unto her selfe: What is it hat my concurrent who is the cause of this my jealousie can wish in her heart to content her better then to see me do this whereabout I am? namely, to vex and torment my selfe thus as I do, to be so far out, and in such terms with my husband, abandoning his house, and forsaking our marriage bed.

37, The Athenians observe and celebrate three seasons of acred seednesse in the year; the sinst in the Isle Scyros, in memorial of the first invention of tillage and sowing in that countrey; the second in a placecalled Raria; and the third, under their own Citywalls, which they call Bazzgion, in remembrance of yoaking Oxento the Plough; but the Nuprial Tillage (as Imay so say) which is imployed for issue and procreation of Children, and to maintain ourrace and posterity, when the stared of all other, and ought to be observed with all holinesse. And therefore Sophocles well and wisely gave this attribute unto Cytherea or Venus, when he named her Eucarps, that is, Fertile, or Fruitsul's in which regard man and wise lawfully joined in Matrimony, are to use the same religiously, and with all preciseness, absteining wholy from all incessous, illegitimate, and forbidden conjunctions, and not plowing or sowing there, whereas they are not willing to reap, or is it chance that there come up any fruit, they are assamed thereof, and willing to hide and conceal it.

38. Gorgias the Orator, in a great affembly at the Olympian games, made a folemn Oration to the Greeks, who were met there from all parts, exhorting them to live in peace, unity, and concord one with another: at which speech of his, one Melambias there present: This man (quoth he) telleth us a tale of unity, and exhorteth us all ro concord here in publike, who cannot periwade in his private house at home, himselife, his own wife and herchamber maid to agree and live peaceably together, being but three in all, and no more: for it should feem that Gorgias cast a fancy to the said wench, and his wife was jealous of her: and therefore his house and samily ought to be ingood order, who will busse himselfe and intermedale in ordering of publick affairs, or composing of matters among friends; for commonly it salleth out that the saults which we commit against our wives, be more divulged abroad in the world, then the mildemenours of our wives.

39. Catsare much offended (they fay) with the odour and fent of fiveet perfumes, infomuch as they will runne mad therewith; if it chancelikewife, that a woman cannot away with fuch perfumes, but that her braines be thereby troubled, and ready to overturne, her husband were of a very strange nature and should deal hardly with her, in case he would not sorbear to use sweet ointments or fitrong fenting odors, but for a little pleasure of his own, to suffer her for to fall into fo great inconvenience, and to neglect her contentment. Now if it be fo, that such accidents of brain-sicknesse happen unto women, not when their husbands be perfumed, but when they aregiven to keep Queans and love Harlots, it were meet injustice in them, for a small pleasure of their own to offend and disquiet their wives, and not to do so much for their sake as those who come among Bees, who forthat purpose will not touch their own wives for the time, because Bees (as it is said) hate such, and are ready to sling them above all others, but carry so bad a mind with them, as to come and lie by their own wives side, being polluted and defiled with the filthy company of other

40. They that have the government of Elephants, never put on white raiment when they come about them, no more do they weare red cloaths who approach neer unto Bulls; for that these beafts before named are atraid of fuch colours especially, and grow fierce and wood therewith. It is faid moreover, that Tygers when they hear the found of Drums, or Tabours about them, become enraged, and in a furious madnesse all to tear themselves. Seeing hit is so therefore, that thereshe some men who cannot abide, but are highly displeased to see their Wives in their Scarlet and Purple Robes: and others again, who cannot away with the found of Cymbals or Tabours; and Purple Robes; if their Wives will forbeat both the one and the other, for fear of provoking and offending their husbands, and live with them without unquiet brawls and janglings in all repose

. A certain young woman, when King Philip plucked and haled her unto him against her 41. A Certain young woman and terme go, all Cats begray in the dark, and when the can dle is out all women are alike. It is not amife to faylo (I confesse) unto distolute perfons and adulterers; but an honest married dame ought (especially when the light is gone) not to be all one with other common naughty packs, but even then when as her body cannot be feen, to let her chastity, honesty, and pure love to her husband appear most, that it may be well seen that she keepeth her

42. Plato exhorted elder folk to behave themselves more modestly before young persons, then 42. Transcending the might learnallo to reverence their elders, and be respecteous of them; for where old people be shamelesse, it is not possible to imprint any shame or grace in the younger, Now ought an husband evermore to carry in remembrance this precept: To have none in the world in better respect and more reverence, then his own wife, forasmuch as the bed-chamber is unto her a school-house either of chastity and pudicity, or else of loosenesse and incontinence; for the husband that followeth those pleasures himselfe which he debarreth his wife of, doth as much as bid his wife to fight with those enemies unto whom he hath already yeelded himself pri-

43. Moreover, as touching the love and defire to go trim, and to deck and adom the body. I would with you (O Eurydice) to endeavour for to call to your remembrance those rules which you have read in the Treatile that Timaxinus wrote unto Arifillus concerning that argument. And as for you (O Pollanus) never think that your wife will abstain from such curiosity, and lay away those delights and superfluities, solong as she perceiveth that you despite not, nor reject the like vanity in other things, but that you take pleasure both to see and have your cups and goblets gilt, your ca binets curiously and costly painted, your Mules and Horses set out with rich capatisons, sumptious trappings, and costly furniture; for an hard matter it is to chase away and banish such delicate superfluities out of the nurcery and womens chamber, so long as they see the same to reign in the mens parlour, and where they have to do.

44. Furthermore, you Pollians being now of ripe years to fludy those Sciences which are grounded upon reason, and proceed by undoubted demonstration, adorn from hence forward, your manneers by frequenting the company of such persons, and conversing with them, who may serve you in good stead, and farther you that way: and as for your wife, see you do the part of a studious and industrious Bee, in gathering for her and to her hand from all parts good things which you think may benefit and profither, likewise bring the same home with you, impart them unto her, devise and commune with her about them apart, and by that means make familiar and pleasant unto her the best books, and the best discourses that you can meet with all.

For why; to her you are in stead, of fire and brother kind; A mother deer from henceforth now to her stemus you find, like as in Homer, Andromache said of her husband Hector. And verily in mine opinion it were no lesse honourable for a man to hear his wife say thus unto him: My husband, you are my teacher, my regent, my mafter, and inftructor in Philosophy, and in the knowledge of the most divine and excellent literature; for these Sciences and liberal Arts do above all other things divert and with draw theminds of women from other unworthy and unfeemly exercises. A Matron, or Dame who hath studied Geometry, will beashamed to make profession of dancing the measures; and she that is a ready enchanted and charmed (as it were) with the singular discourses of Plato and Xenophon, will never like of the charmes and enchantments of Witches, and Sorcerers; and if any enchantresse should come unto her, and make promise to draw down the moon from heaven, she would mock those women, and laugh at their grosse ignorance, who suffer themselves to be perswaded for to beleeve the same, as having learned somewhat in Astrology, and heard that Aganics the dea for to Delected the same, as it was control of the first and the same and the same and daughter of Heggen, agent Lord in The fiding knowing the reason of the Ecclipse of the moon when the is attheirly, and observing the very time when the body of the moon will meet right with the shadow of the earth, abused other women of that country, and made them believe that it was her felfe who fetched down the moon out of the skie.

It was never heard yet that a woman by course of nature should conceive, and bring forth a 45. It was never heard yet that a woman by Courte of nature information every, and bring forth a child of her felfe alone without the company of man: marry some there be who have been known to gather in their womb a rude masse or lump, without the true form of a reasonable creature, refembling rather a piece of flesh engendered, and growing to a consistence by means of some corruption, which some call a Mole. Great heed therfore would be taken that the like befal not to the soule and mind of women; for if they receive not from others the feeds of good matters and instructions, that is to say, if their husbands help them not to conceive good doctrine and sound knowledge, they will of themselves falla breeding and be delivered of many strange conceits, absurd opinions, and extravagant passions. But mine advice unto you Eurydice, is to be studious always in the notable fayings and sentences moral of sage, wife, and approved men: have always in your mouth the good naying sintenents in oral of tags, it is a state of the s lets, and jewels: for you cannot possibly come by the precious pearls of this or that rich and weal-thy woman, nor have the filken gowns and velvet robes of such a Lady of a strange country, forto array, or trim your selse withal, but you must buy them at an exceeding high and dear price: but the ornaments and attire of Theano, of Cleobuline, of Gorgo the wife of King Leonidas, of Timoclea the fifter of Theagenes, of Clodia the ancient Roman Lady, of dame Cornelia, the fifter of Scipio, and of other Ladies and Gentlewomen so much tenowned and bruited heretofore for their rare vertues, you may may have gratis, freely and without a penny cost: wherewith if you deck and adorn your lelfe, you shall live both happily, and also with honor and glory. For if Sappho for her sufficiency in Poetry, and the skill that she had in versifying, stuck not to write thus to a certain rich and wealthy dame in her time.

All dead thou shalt one day entombed be, There (hall remain of thee no memorie, For that no part of roses came to thee That flower upon the mountain Pierie.

Why shouldest not thou think better of thy selfe, and take more joy and contentment in thine heartconfidering thou hast thy part not only of the roses and flowers, but also of the fruits which the Mufes bring forth and yield to those who love good setters, and highly esteem of Philosophy?

The Banquet of the seven Sages.

The Summary.

Hether it were that the perfons named in this of sourse following were at a banquet indeed, and there discomsed of such matters as are here by Plutatch handled; or that himselfe had collected and gathered the Apophthegmes and histories of histime; or howsoever it was; we may see by this pre-Sent Treatise what was the custome of Sages, and wise men in ancient time at their feests, namely, to invite one another courteously, to sold complements to shew sincere amity, and without excessive cost and expense to keep good cheer after a plaine, perment so preseptioner among an autonomous exceptions of most expense so keep good societ and prepared to be able, being employed in deviling fadly, and with select mind both during their repast, and a pretty while after of matters bough, pleasant, and tending to good instruction and edification; at this book, and the Symposiakes, or bonell's pleafams, and tending to good instruktion and edification's at this book and the Symposiakes, or Table-discourfes, whereof we shall be more hereaster do plainty show. This manner and custome deservith to be opposed party against the solitary life, and beggerly niggardle of base milers, coverous pennifathers, and such tike exceptive pomp, unmeastrable sumptuosity, dissolitation to the analogy and portain and solitish vanity and gormand so those those two no other good to morship but their belly; as also against the sound laughters, bragging vanteries, impudent sacings, scurrie mockeries, and dogged backbitings, that sensely fost, and pecus provides a sum of sum of single solitary against the enormities, violences, and outrages, of such as its workly abandoned and given over to sin and wickedussse. Moreover, to come more partientary to this book fallowing. Plutatch bringeth in one wanned Dictles, who recounter that the Starchus. larly to this book following, Plutarch bringeth in one named Diocles, who recounteth unto Nicarchus, all that was faid and done at Corinth in a certaine Banquet, at which were these persons, namely, Petiander the foveraign Lord of that City, and the host who had all the guests, to wit, Solon, Bias, Thales, 2 2 Cleobulus, Cleobulus, Pittacus, and Chilon, named in those days, The seven Sages or wise men of Greece; Item, Anachariis, Æsope, Niloxenus, Cleodemus and certain others. But before that he entereth into any speech of that which passed during the banquet and afterwards, he reheassalth the communication held between Thales, and trose of his company upon the way of Corinth; where they talke of matters handledmore at large afterwards: then consequently he treatesth of that which a gussion with to do who is invited to a banguet, and describe him that happened among some of the gussion proceeding a little forwards, he declaresh what was the manner of the entrance, the shint and end of the banguet, to wit, modess, and scallend with plessar speeches (and these most house and as a distribution of the entrance, the shint and end of the banguet, to wit, modess, and scallend with the throughout the musick of Flutes, and by a certain comparison devised with a good grace, he casisth andience to be given unto Niloxenus a stranger; by occasion whereof, Bias dash expound the ridde; or dark guession to the recite grace of the dust and office of Kings; of which argument, all the forefaid Sages deliver their mind summarily, together with the proper riddles, and anigmatical quessions from the King of Egypt to the King of Ekitopia. Now after the deciphering and associated questions from the King of Egypt to the King of Ekitopia. The after the supering das allowing of the subtribute of popular and accommical, upon which point they do opine and speak their mindain order; comming afterwards to conference together of certain particularities of house keeping, to wit, of a thinking and other pleasures; of the quantity of goods that may suffice a man; of the fregulary, thrift, and sobriety of menin old time; of the quantity of goods that may suffice a man; of the fregulary, thrift, and sobriety of menin old time; of the quantity of goods that may suffice a man; of the fregulary, thrift, and sobriety of menin old time; of the quantity of good that may

DIOCLES.

Ertes, the long processe and continuance of time (my good friend Nicarchus) cannot chuse but breed and bring much darknesse, obscurity and incertitude of mens actions and affairs; when as now in matters so fresh, so new, and to lately passed, you have met with certaine false reports, which notwithstanding are believed and received for true; for a there were not onely those even guests at the table in this seast, as you have heard and are born in hand, but more then twice so many, of whom my selfe made one, being samiliar and inward with Periander, by reason of mime art and protession, and the host besides to Thales; (for by the commandement of Periander, b, le lodged in mine house) neither hath he (whosoever he was that related the thing mus you, borne well in mind, and remembred what the speeches and discourses were, which they held which maketh me verily to think that he was not himselfe one of them who were at the banquet, But seeing we are now at good leasure(and for that old age is no surety sufficient to give good warrantise for to deser and put off this report unto a farther time, and because you are so desirous to know the truth) I will rehearse unto you all in order, even from the very beginning.

First and formost, the seast was prepared by Periander, not within the City, but about the portor haven Lechaon, in a fair great hall or dining chamber neer to the Temple of Venus, unto whom there was also a facrifice offered; for fince the infortunate love of his mother, who voluntarily made her selfe away, having not sacrificed unto Venus, this was the first time that he was moved thereto, as being incited by certain dreams of Melifa to worship and adore the said goddesse. Now to every one of the guelts invited to this banquet, there was a coach brought, richly appointed and fet out accordingly, for to convey and conduct them to the place appointed, for that it was the Summer feason, and all the port way from the City, as far as to the lea side, was full of dust, and refounded with great noise, by reason of a number of charriots, and a world of people going to and fro between. As for Thales, seeing at my gates a coach standing, and ready to carry him, he fel a smiling and laughing, and so sent it back again: he and I then put our selves in our way, and went faire and foirly together on foot over the fields; and a third there was, who bare us company, to wit, Niloxenus of Naucratia, a man of good worth, and one who had been familiarly acquainted with Solon and Thales before-time in Egypt, and as then was he sent the second time unto Bias, but wherefore himselse knew not, unless (as he suspected) it were to bring unto him a second question inclosed and sealed within a packet; for this charge and commandement he had: That if Bias refused and would not take upon him to assoile and expound the same, he should shew it to the wifest Sages of the Greeks. Then began N.loxenus; An happy feast (quoth he) is this to me (my masters) and unexpected, wherein I shall find you all together, for I carry with me thither a packet as you see, and with that he shewed it unto us; then squoth Thales smiling) if you have therein any hard and untoward question to be dissolved, carry it again to Pyrene, for Bias will declare the meaning thereof, like as hee affoiled the former: What former question was that (quoth I): Marry (quoth hee againe) he sent unto him a sheep for facrifice, commanding that he should take out of it the best and worst piece thereof, and so to send the said slesh unto him: he therefore well and wisely plucked forth piece thereo; and in it into him; for which he was (by good right) well praided, highly effected and head in great admiration. It was not therefore only (quoth Niloxenus) that he came to fo great a name, but also for that he refused not the amity of Princes and Kings as you do: for Amasis admired many more things in you, and namely among others, when you took the measure of the height of the Piramis in Egypt, he wondered exceedingly, and made high account of your conceit, for that without any great hand labour, and the lame requiring no influment at all, by letting up a staffe onely plumb upright, at the very point and end of the shadow which the said Pyramis cast, and by two Triangles which the beams of the Sun caufed, you made demonstration, that what proportion there was between the length of both shadows, to wir, of the Pyramis and the staff, the same was between the height of the one and the other. But as Isaid before, you were accused unto the same King Amasis, for bearing no good will unto Kings and their effate, which was the cause of your dilgrace and disfavour with him; besides, there were brought unto him and presented many slanderous speeches, and contume ious answers of yours, as touching tyrants: as for example; when Molpagoras a great Lord of for a demarded upon a time of you what strange thing you had in your time seen? you answered: A tyrant living to be an old man: Again, at a certain banquet there being some speech moved, as touching beasts, which was the worlt, and did most harm? you made answer, that, Of wild beasts a Tyrant, and of tame beasts a flatterer was most dangerous; For I may tell you, Kings howfoever they fay that they differ from Tyrants, yet take they no pleasure at fuch Apophthegmes as those. That answer (quoth Thales again) was none of mine, but Pittacus it was, who made it one day in scotting merrily to Myrfilus: formine own part, I do not fo much marvel at an aged Tyrant, as I do wonder to see an old Pilot; howbeit, as touching this transposition, and taking oue for another, I am of the same mind, and am willing to say, as that young man did who flung a flone at a dog, and miffing the dog, hit his own step-mother and selled her withal; whereat: It makes no matter (quoth he) for even fo, the stone hath not light amisse. And in truth Imy selfe alwayes esteemed Solo, a right wise man, for that he refused to be the Tyrant of his own countrey: and even so Pittaeur if he had never come to take upon him a Monarchy, would not have delivered this speech; How hard a thing is it to be a good man? And it should seem that Periander being feized upon (as a man would say) by the same tyranny, as an hereditary disease from his sather, did not amiffe to endeavour whathe could to free himfelfe and get out of it, by converfing with thebest men, and frequenting their company, as he hath done to this day, and training unto him the fociety of Sages and Philosophers, and being ruled and advised by them, not approving nor admitting the perillousand unhappy counsel of my country man Thraspoulus, periwading him to cut the chief men shorter by the heads: For a tyrant who chuleth to command and rule slaves and vassails rather then free men indeed, nothing differeth from the husbandman, who had rather gather locults and catch fowles, then reap and bring in good grain of Wheat and Barley; for these foreraign dominions and principalities bring with them this only good thing in stead and recompense of many evils; to wit, a kind of honour and glory: if men be to happy as in ruling over good men, they be betterthemselves, and in commanding great persons become greater themselves; as for such as in their government and place of command, aime at nothing but their security, without respect of honer and honesty, deserve to be set over a number of sheep, horses, or beasts, and not of men; but this good gentieman strarger here, hath (I wot not how) cast us upon such discourses which are nothing convenient for our prefent purpole, omitting both to fpeak and also to demand those matters that besit better those who go to a seast: for think you not that the guest who is bidden, ought not to go prepared as well as the very master himselfeis to make preparation? For the Spharites (as it should seem) solemnly invite their dames to their feasts, and seem to bid them a whole year before, of purpose that they might have time enough to trim themselves at their good leifure with rich aray and jewels of gold against they go to a feast; and for mine own part, I assure you of this mind I am, that the right preparative of one who is to go unto a great dinner as he should, would require a longer time then so; by how much harder it is to finde fit and decent ornament for the manners of the minde, then to provide for the superfluous, needlesse, and unprofitable setting out of the body: for a wife man who hath wit and understanding, goeth not to a feast carrying with him his body as a vessel to be filled, but he goes thither with an intention to passe the time either in serious discourses, or pleasant and merry talk; to speak, I say, and hear according as the time shall give occasion to the company, if they meane with joy and mirth to converse together one with another. A man that is come to a feast may it helike not a dish of meat, or if it be naught refuse it; or if the wine be not good, have recourse unto the Nymphs; but a troublesome guest, a talkative busie-body, and an unmannerly, or untaught neighbour sitting at the boord, marreth all the grace of the viands, be they otherwise never so dainty, he corrupteth the wine, yea and all the sweetnesse of the musick, how melodious foever it be. Neither may a man when he lift vomit and cast up readily again this trouble and vexation once received: but in some, amutual discontentment and offence taken at the Table one with another, slicketh by them and continueth as long as they have a day to live, infomuch as they cannot endure the enterview one of another again; but like an old surfeit, arisen of wrong done, or of anger conceived by drinking wine, the spight remaineth sestering and core corrupting in the tomack and never will be digefled. In mine opinion therefore did Chiba very well and wisely, who being invited as it were yellerday to a feath, would never promife to come before he knew what other gueffs he should meet with there, even every one of them; for this was it juigis: That a man must endure will he nill he is he be once at sea, a rude companion and uncivil fellow-passed in the meeting his where he is embarked is as also in warfare a roubbelome mate in the same pavilion, for that he is flowed of necessity to say with the one and encamp with the others have for a manto forth himselfe indifferently and without distretion with all kinds of men at a banker, bewrateth one that is void of all wit and judgement. As for the fashion and manners of the Egyptians, namely, to bring in place ordinatily at their feasts a Sceleton, that is ro say, a dry and withered anatomy of a dead man, and there to show it before all the guests at the boord, to put them in mind of death, and that within a while they all should become such; although I must needs siy that such an one were an unwelcome guest, and came very unseasonably among them; yet it came to drink freely and to make merry, yet he inviteth and stirreth them up to carry mutual love and affection one to the other, in admonsishing them to remember that their slife being of it selfes shon, they should not select to make it long and tedious by troublesome businessed as affairs.

Thus spent we the time by the way, until at length we were come to the banquetting house. And as for Thales, he refused to wash or go into a baine: For that (quoth he) I am annointed already; but in the mean time that the rest were bathing, he went walking up and down to see the pleasant races, the wreftling places, and the fair grove which along the Sea was very well planted and keptace cordingly; not because he wondered at the light of any of all these delights, but forthat he would not feem to despile Periander, or disdain his magnificence in anything. As for the others, according as any of them were washed or annointed, the services were ready to conduct them into the hall, or dining place, appointed for men, and that through a porch, or gallery, within which fate Anacharfis, and before him stood a Damosel plaining and combing the hair of his head with her hands whom (as sheran toward I kalas) most willingly and courteously) most willingly and courteously he killed, and after a smining manner: Well done (quoth he) make that stranger, who of himselse is the mildest and gentlest man in the world, to have a pleasant and fair countenance, that he look not upon us fearful and hideous to fee to. I enquired then what pretty maiden this was; Why (quoth Thales) know you not that wife Damofel, fo famous and fo much renowned, Eumetin for that is the name that her father gave her, howfoever the people call her after her fathers name Cleo'edine. You praise this Virgin (quoth Niloxenus, do you not) for her quick spirit in propounding, and her subtile wit and wisdom in affoiling riddles and dark questions, such as be called Aenigmes? For byreport there be some of her enginerical questions, which are gone as far as Egyp; No marry (quoth Thates again) Isay not so for she useth them but as dice or coc-kall bones, when she list to disport her selfe and passe away the time with those that encounter her, and are disposed to enter into contention with her; but of a wonderful courage and haughty mind shee is; a politick head she hath of her own worthy to govern a State; of a courteous nature she is befide, and of tweet behaviour; in regard of which her carriage, the maketh her Father to feem more mild and popular ruler among his Citizens and Subjects. It may well be fo (quoth Niloxinus) for furely the teemeth no leffe, if a man behold her homely apparrel, and how fimply the goes; but how cometh this inward affection and kindnesse to Anacharsis, that so lovingly she dresseth and trimmeth him? Because (quoth Thales) he is a temperate and soberman, and besides a great Scholar, and a learned Clark, and for that he hath willingly and at large recounted unto her the manner of the Tartarians life, and namely, how they use to charm the maladies of those that are fick; and I verily believe that even now whiles the maketh to much of the man, stroking his head, plaiting and broiding his hair, she learneth somewhat of him, or discourseth with him about some point of learning. Now when we drew neer to the hall, or dining chamber above faid, who should meet us but Alexidemus the Milesan, a baltard son of Thrasybulus the Tyrant; who was newly come forth from thence in a great heat, distempered and troubled, and saying (I wot not what) to himfelfe in a pelting chafe: for understand we could not plainly what his words were, he spake them so huddle: he had no sooner his eye upon Thales, but he seemed to reclaim himselfe, and so stayed 2 little, breaking out into these audible terms; Periander (quoth he)hath offered me abuse, and done me great wrong, in that he would not give me leave to depart, when I was willing and ready to embark, but by his entreaty hath importuned meto stay supper; and now, for footh, that I am come, he hath set me at the table, in a place most dishonourable for my person, and hath preferred the Æolians, the Islanders, and other base companions, and indeed whom not, before Thrasbulus? for apparent it is, that he despiseth my Father who sent me, and meaneth that the disgrace of fered unto me should redound upon him. How now (quoth Thairs) is it so indeed? and are you astaid that like as the Egyptians hold opinion and say, That the stars in making their ordinaryrevolutions, are one while elevated on high, and another while afterwards falling as low, and according to their heights, or basenesse of the place, become either better or worse then they were? so you in regard of the place that is given you, should be advanced, or debased more or lesse; for by this means you are worse and more base minded then the Laconian, who being by the mafter of the ceremonies fet in the lowest place of the Quire, or Dance, was no more moved thereat, but said: Well done of you, I see you can skill of the meanes how to make this placemore honourable: for when we be set at a table, we ought not to look and regard, either beneath whom we fit, or after whom we are placed, but rather how we may accommodate and frame ourselves to fort and agree with those next to whom we sit; shewing presently at the very first that we have in our selves the beginning and handle (as a man would say) of amity, in that we can finde in our hearts not to be offended with the place that is given us, but to praise our fortune in that we are matched with fo good company: for he that is angry about a place or feat, is more offended with him to whom hentteth next, then with the mafter of the feast that bade him, and hemaketh himselse odious as well to the one as the other. Tush (quoth Alexidemus) these are but words; for in very deed I have observed, that even you who would be counted Sages and wife men, lay for means enough to make your felves honoured; and with that he passed by us, and went his way. Now as we muled and wondered much at this frange fashion and behaviour of the man; Thales turning unto us; This man (quoth he) is a brain-fick foole, and of a monstrous nature, as you may well know by one trick that he played when he was a very youth : for when there was brought unto Thrafybulus his Father, a most excellent, iweet and precious ointment, he poured it out all into agreat boll, or flanding cup, and wine likewife upon it, and when he had io done, drunk it up himfelfe every drop, working by this means enmity in flead of friendfhip to Thraffbulus, Immediately after this there comes to me a servitor with these words: Periander requesteth you to take Thales and this other stranger with you, and to come and see a thing that is newly prefented and brought unto him, for to know your opinion, whether he is to take it as an occurrent happened by meer chance, or rather a prodigy that doth prefage and prognofficate some strange event, for he himselse is much troubled in mind thereat, and mightily seareth that it besome pollution or flain to this his festival facrince; he had no sooner said this, but he brought us into one of the housen that flood upon the garden, where we found a young lad, seeming unto us to be some herdman, he had not yet an hair on his face, and otherwise (beleeve me) he was fair enough and wellfavoured, who opening a leather poke, or bag that he had, shewed unto us a young monstrous babe, which (as he faid) was born of a Mare; in the upper parts about the neck and arms shaped like a man, but all the rest resembling an horse; howbeit, crying and wrawling, as like as possibly might be to an Infant new come into the world: at which tight Neloxenus turning his face at one fide, cried out, God bleffe us, and turn away his displeasure from us. But Thales after he had looked wistly a good while upon the young lad aforefaid, imiled at the matter (as his manner was to play and make good game with me about mine art:) Are you not minded (quoth he) O Diocles to go about some expiatory facrifice for this prodigious fight, and to let on work those gods whose care and charge it is to divert inch imminent perils and mistortunes, this being as it is so fearful a prodigy and unlucky accident? How elfe? (quoth I again) for I assure you this is a token presaging discord and sedition; and I much sear lest this matter proceed as far as to marriages, and the act of generation, even to the prejudice of posterity, considering that the Goddesse before the expiation and satisfaction of her former anger, threatneth thus the second time, as you see. Thales answered never a word to this, but departed laughing. And when Periander met us at the very hall door, and enquired what wethought of this strange occurrent which we went to see; Thales left me, and taking him by the hand: As touching that (quoth he) which Diocles will perswade you unto, do you as he willeth you at your best leiture : for mine own part, mine advise and counselunto you is, that you entertain no more such youths as this to keep your Mares, or at leastwile, that you give them wives to wed. At the hearing of which words, it seemed unto me that Periander was exceeding well pleased; for he laughed agood, and after he had embraced Thales, kissed him. Then Thales turning unto me: I suppose verily (quoth he) O Diocles that this prodigious token hath wrought the effect, and is come to an end already; for fee you not what an evil accident is befallen unto us, in that Alexidemus will not dine with us ? Well, when we were come within the hall, Thales beginning to freak with a loud voice: And where is the place (quoth he) wherein this honest man thought fcorn, and took fuch fruff to be fet: which when it was shewed unto him, he turned about, and went to fit there himselse, and so took us with him; saying withal, I would (for mine own part) have given any money (rather then failed) to fit at the same boord with Ardalus. Now was this Ardalusa Trozzenian, by profession a Piper, and a Priest serving the Ardalian Muses, whose images ancient Ardalus the Treezenian had erected and dedicated. Then Afope, who not long before had been tent by King Crafus, as well to Periander as to the Oracle of Apollo in the City of Delphos, being fet upon a low fettle neer to Solon, who fat above him, came in with his fable, and thus faid; A Mule (quoth he) of Lydia having beheld the form and shape of his own body within a river, and wondring much at the beauty and goodly stature thereof, began to run with full cariere, to sling and shake his head and his maine, like a lusty brave horse; but within a while, remembring that he was an affes fonce, and foaled by an affe, he staid his swift course all on a sudden, and laid away his pride and infolent bravery. At these words, Chilo briefly in his Laconian language: Thou hast told (quoth he) a tale by thine own felfe, who being a flow-backlike an affe, will needs run as the laid mule. After this entred in dame Melissa, and took her place lose unto Periander: Eumetisalio fat down to supper with them: Then Thales addressed his speech unto me who fat next above Bias, and said: My friend Diocles, how hapned it that you tell not Bias, that your friend and guest Niloxenus of Naucretia is come from beyond sea the second time, sent from his Lord the King, unto him with new questions and riddles for to assoile, to the end that he may take knowledge of them while he is sober, and in case for to study and think upon their jolutions? Then Bias taking the word out of his mouth; It hath been (quoth he) his old fashions of long time, for to feem to fright and aftonish me with such admonitions and advertisements as theleias forme I know full well that as Bacchus otherwile is a wife and powerful god, foin regard of his wifedom he is immamed 15644, which is as much to fay, as unfolding and undoing the knots of all difficulties; which is the cause that I have no fear at all, but if I be full of him, I shall be lessed to the cause that I have no fear at all, but if I be full of him, I shall be lessed to the cause that I have no fear at all, but if I be full of him, I shall be lessed to the cause that I have no fear at all, but if I be full of him, I shall be lessed to the cause the cau hearty and able to maintain the combat when I come to it, and am put to dispute. These and such like pleasant speeches passed to and fro in merriment, as they sat at meat. Now when I saw the serting out, and provision of this supper more frugal and spary then ordinary, I thought in my minde that to make a feast and give entertainment to wise and good men, putteth a man to no greater cost and expences, but rather ealeth him offome charges: for that it abridgeth all curiofity of dainty viands, exquifite cates, coffly perfumes, pretions ointments, confitures and march-pains brought from forreign and far countries, yea and fine and delicate wines, wherewith Periander being served daily at his ordinary, according to the magnificence of his princely estate, riches, affairs, and occasions, yet at fuch a time he took a glory among these Sages and wile men, in sobriety, frugality, and slender provision; for not in other things only he cut off and concealed all superfluity and needlesse furniture which was usual in his house-keeping, but also in his wives attire and ornaments, whom he shewed to his friends and guests nothing costly arraied, nor keeping state, but meanly set out and adorned. Now when the tables were taken away, and that Meliffa had given and dealt chaplets of flowers unto us round about, we rendred thanks and faid grace unto the gods, in pouring out unto them devoutly a little wine; and the minstrell women having sung a while after our grace, and according to our vows, departed out of the room.

Then Ardalus calling unto Anachar fit by name, demanded of him whether among the Scythians there were any fuch finging women and minftrell wenches that could play upon wind inftruments? unto which demand he aniwered ex tempore and without fludying for the matter: No (quoth he) not fomuch as vines; and as Ardalus replied again: But yet there are fomegods among them, are there not? Yes iwis (quoth he) that there be, and those who underfland the speech and language of men; but yet the Scythians are not of the same mind that the Greeks, who although they think themselves to speak more freely and elegantly then the Scythians, yet they hold opinion that the gods take more pleasiner to hear the iound of bones and wood, whereof their flures and hauthois are made, then the voice of man. But my good friend (quoth Esper then) what would you say, if you knew what these pipe makers do now adays, who cast away the bones of young hind-calves and fawnes, and chose before them assessments. Saying, forsooth, that they make a better sound? whereofor Che busines made one of her Enigmes or riddles touching a Phrygian flute, in such sort, that it is a wonder how an Asse, which is otherwise a most blockish and absurd beast, of any other most remote from all sweet harmony of musick, should yeild a bone so slick, so smooth, and proper, to make thereof a most musical instrument. Certes, (quoth Niloxenus then) this is the reason that the inhabitants of the City Businis, reproach all us of N. ueratia, for that we likewise have already taken two affe-bones for the making of our pipes: and as for them, it is not lawful to hear so much as the found of a trumpet, because it somewhat doth resemble the braying of an Asse; and you all know that the affeis infamous and odious with the Egyptians, because of Typhon. Upon this every man held his peace for a while; and when Periander perceived that Niloxenus had a good mind to speak, but yet durst not begin or broach any speech; My Masters (quoth he) I do like very well of the custome of Cities and head Magistrates, in that they give audience and dispatch unto all frangers, before their own Citizens; and therefore methinks it were well that for a time both you and we forbear our speeches which are so familiar, and as it were native and home-born among us in our own country, to give accesse and audience, as it were in a solemn counsel and assembly of estate, unto those questions and demands which our good friend here hath brought out of Egypt; and namely such as are moved from the King to Bias, and Bias I doubt not will confer with you about the same, Then Bias seconding this motion of his; And in what place (quoth he) or with what company would a man wish rather for to hazzard and try his skill then in this, for to make answers accordingly and give folutions, if he be put unto it and need require; especially, seeing that the King himself hath given express commandement, that in proposing this question he should first begin with me, and afterwards go round about the rest and present the same unto you all? Hereupon Niloxenus delivered unto him the Kings letter, desiring him to break it open, and to read the same with an audible and loud voice before all the company. Now the substance or tenor of the said letter run in this form. Amaßi the King of the Egyptians, unto Biasthe wifelt Sage of all the Greeks fendeth greeting. "So it is, that the King of the Æthiopians is entered into conrestationand contention with me, as touching wisedome: and being in all other propositions " put down by me, and found my inferiour, in the end after all, he hath imposed upon meea commandement very strange, wor derful, and hard to be performed, willing mee, for looth, to "drink up the whole sea. Now if I may compaffe the folution of this riddle and dark question, "I shall gain thereby many towns, villages and cities of his: but in case I cannot associate the same, "I must yield unto himall my Cities within the country Elephantine. These are therefore to request you, that after you have well considered of the premises, you send back unto me Niloxems in commently with the interpretation thereof. And it either your selfe or any of your Citizens and country-men have occasion to use me in your affairs and occasions, be sure you shall not faile of me wherein I may stead you. Farewell,

This letter being read, Bias made no long stay, but after some little pause and meditation with himselfe, he rounded Cleobulus in the eate, who sat close unto him: And then, what is that you fay (my friend of Naucraiia) will your Master and Lord King Amasis (who commandeth so great a multitude of men, and possesseth so large, so fair and plentiful a country) drink all the sea, for to get thereby, I wot not what poor towns and villages of no importance? Then Nilaxeous laughing at thematter: I pray you (quoth he) consider upon the point what is possible to be done, even as you will your lelfe: Marry then (quoth he) let him fend word to the Æthiopian King, and enjoyn him to flay the course of all rivers that discharge themselves into the sea, until he have drunk up in the mean time all the water in the sea that is now at this present; for of that only, his demand and commandment is to be understood, and not of the sea that shall be hereafter. These words were no sooner spoken, but Niloxenus took so great a contentment therein, that he could not hold, but needs he must embrace and kils him immediately for it; yea, and all the rest commended and approved likewie his ipeech: but Chilo laughing heartily: O my triend (quoth he) of Nauciatia, I be-ieech you before all the sea be dry and clean spent, saile home with all speed, and do the King your master to understand, that he shall not need to travel and busie his brains in searching how he may confume fo great a quantity of falt water, but rather how he may make his regiment and royal rule (now brackish and unpleasant) to be sweet and potable unto his subjects; for in these seats Bias is amost cunning workman, and a singular master, which when King Amasis hath well and throughly learned of him, he shall not have any use of that golden Basen to wash his feet in, and for to contain the Egyptians in awe and obedience, but they shall serve him all willingly, and love him affectionately, when they shall see him become a good Prince, although he were a thousand times more odious unto them then he feems now to be. Certes (quoth Periander) then it were worthily done of us all to contribute unto King Amasis such like first fruits and presents droganas. as Homer speaketh, that is to fay, every one of us by the poll, and one after another in order; for by this means the accessary haply an addition will arise to a greater matter, and be more worth unto him then the principal or (tock of the negotiation wherefore this voyage was undertaken, and besides there will accrew unto each of us also some great profit. Meet it were then (quoth Chilo) that Solon should beginthe speech; not only for that he is of all our ancient, and hath the highest place of the table, but also because he beareth the greatest and most absolute office, being the man who ordained and established the Laws of Athens, Noloxenus then turning toward me, and speaking softly in mine ear: I believe verily (quoth he) O Diocles, that many things go for current, and are believed. ved, although they be untruths, and many menthere be who are delighted with falle rumours, and finister reports, that go of great and wise men, both which themselves do devise, and also which they receive readily from others; as namely, those be which are brought unto us as far as into Egypt, of Chilon, namely, that he should renounce all amity and hospitality with Solon for maintaining this: That all Laws were mutable, A foolish and ridiculous report is this (quoth I;) for if it were fo, Chilon should have fallen out with Lycurges, and condemned him, who together with his Laws, altered and changed the whole State of the Lacedemonians. Then Solon, after a little pause made, began to speak in this wise: For mine own part, I am of this mind, that a King, or Soveraign Prince can find no means to make himselfe more glorious, then by turning his Monarchy or absolute government into a Democracy, or popular state, in communicating his authority soveraign indifferently to his Subjects. In the second place spake Bias, and said: That a Prince could not do better for his own honour, than to be the first man that submitted himselfe to the positive lawes of this countrey. After him opined Thales: I repute (quoth he) that prince and fovereigne ruler happy, who lived to old age, and dieth by a natural death. Anachar sis inferred thus much more in the fourth place; If he be only wife, With that faid Cleobulus in his turn: If he repose no considence in any one about his person. Sixthly came Pirtacu with his opinion, saying; If a Prince could so nurture and school his subjects, that they should not fear him, but for his sake. And after him, in the last place, delivered Chilo this speech: That a Prince ought to amuse his mind about no mortal and transitory things, but meditate onely upon that which was efernal and immortal.

Now when every one of these Sages had given out his mot, we requested of Pericader, that hee also would say somewhat for his part; but he with a countenance nothing merry and cheerfull, but composed to sadnesse and severity; I will tell you (quoth hee) what I think of all these sentences thus delivered by these my Lords; that they all in amanner be enough to fright a man who is of judgement and understanding, from all soveraign rule and government. Then Asppe as one who ever loved to be crosse and finding faults: It were meet therefore (quoth he) that every one of us should deal in this point apart and severally, lest in pretending to be counsellours unto Princes, and make profession of friendship unto them, we become their accusers. Then Solon laying his hand upon his head, and smiling withal: Think you not (quoth he) O Afope, that he maketha ruler more reasonable, and a tyrant more gracious and inclined to clemency, who perswadeth him that it is simply better, not to rule, then to rule? And who is he (quoth Afope againe) that will believe you in this, rather then the very god himselfe who delivered unto you this sentence, by way of Oracle:

I hold that City happy alone, Where voice is heard of * Sergeaut one.

Why (quoth Solon) Is there any man heareth at Athens now any more voices then of one Sergeans, and one fole Magittrate, which is the Law? notwithstanding, the City hold of a popular State, but you A fope are so deeply seen in hearing and understanding the voices of Crows and Jayes, that you hear not welland perfectly in the mean time your own speech and language; for you that think according to the Oracle of Apollo, that City most happy which heareth the voice but of one, suppose torting to the order of Apple of the state of a leaft, when all the guelts therein met, may reason and discourse, yea and of every matter. True it is (quoth Espe) for you have not yet let down a Law, that houshold servants should not be allowed wherewith to bedrunk; like as you have made one at Athen?, forbidding fervants to make love, or to be annointed dry, that is, without the bain. Solon began to laugh at this reply of his : and Cleodemus the Physician interred thereupon: In mine opinion (quoth he) it is all one to annoint (as you say) dry, and to talk freely when a man is well whit-led and drenched with wine, for most delectable and pleasant is both the one and the other. Chile taking hold of this speech; Why then (quoth he) so much the rather it behoveth to abstain from it. Æsoperejoined again; and verily Thales seemed to say; that it is a means whereby a man shall ve-Esperges and look old. Hereat Periander began to take up a laughter and faid: Now truely Esperge are wellenough ferved, and are worthily punished according to our defert, in that we have suffered our selves to be carried away into other discourses and disputations, before we have heard out all the rest of the contents in King Amasis letters, according as we purposed in the beginning; and therefore good in Niloxenu go on with that which followeth in your letters miffire, and make tile of these personages here assembled, whiles they be all in place together. Now truly (quoth Niloxenus) in my conceit that demand of the Æthiopian, a man may well and properly fay to bee nothing elie (but it I may use the words of sirchitochus) a tewed or bruiled whip : but King Amafit yourhoft, in proposing of such questions is more gentle and civil; for he propounded unto him these demands to be answered: What thing in the whole world is eldest, or most ancient? What is the fairest? What the greatest? What most wise? What most common? Over and besides, What most profitable? What is most hurtful? What most puissant ? and What most easie? What (quoth Periander) did the Æthiopian Prince aniwer to these demands, and assoile them all? Will you see (quoth Niloxenus then) what aniwers he made? and after you have heard his aniwers, be you judg whether he satisfied them or no ? for the King my Master hath proceeded therein io fincerely, that he would not for any thing in the World, be justly thought to cavil, and carp like a Sycophant at the answers of another, and yet hiscare and endeavour is, not to fail in reproving that wherein one hatherred and is deceived: but I will from point to point recire unto you his answers. What is most ancient? Time (quoth he.) What most wise? Truth, What most beautiful? The light, What most common? Death, What most profitable? God, What most hurtul? The Divel, What most mighty? Fortune. What most easie? The thing that pleaseth. When these answers were read (O Nicharchus) they all remained filent for a time: and then Thales asked of Niloxenus, whether King Amasis approved these solutions or no: Niloxenus answered, that some of them he allowed; but with others of them he rested not well contented : And yet (quoth Thales again) there is not one of them all but deferveth great reprehension, for they do every one bewray much error and grosse ignorance and to begin withal: How can it be held and maintained, that Time should be the eldest thing that is, considering that one part thereos is passed already; another present; and a third yet to come? for the future time which is to follow us , cannot chuse but by all reason be esteemed younger then all men, or all things which are present. Again, to think that verity were wildom, in my judgement is as much as if a man should say, that the eye and the light is all one. Furthermore, if he reputed the light to be afair thing (as no doubt it is) how happeneth it that he forgat the Sun? Moreover, as touching his answers of God and the Divels, they are very audacious and dangerous. But concerning Fortune, there is no probability, or likelihood of truth therein; for if she were so powerful and puissant (as he faith) how commeth it about that she turneth and changeth so easily as she doth? Neither is death the commonest thing in the world; for commonit is not to the living. But because it shall not be thought, that we can skill of naught, but reproving and correcting others; let us confer a little our particular opinions and sentences in this behalfe with his; and it Niloxenus think fo good, I am content to offer my selfe first, to answer unto these demands beforesaid, one after another. Now will I therefore declare unto you (Nicharchus) in order the interrogatories and answers, according as they were propounded and delivered. What is most ancient? God (quoth Thales) for he never had beginning nor nativity. What is greates? Place.

For as the world container half things elfe, so Place container hit. What is faireft? The world Andwhy? because what soever is disposed in lively order, is a part thereof. What is wifest? Time; for it hads found all things already devised, and will find out all inventions he eafter. What is most common? Hope; for it remainer he fill with them who have nothing else. What most profitable? Vertue; in that it maketh all things commodious, according as they be used. What is most hurtful? Vice; for it marreth all good things betides, wheresoever it is. What is most mighty? Necessity; for that only is invincible. What is most easie? That which agreeth to nature ; for even pleasures many times we do abandon and forsake. Now when all the company had approved and commended highly the answers of Thales: These be questions indeed (quoth Cleademus unto Niloxemus) meet for Kings and Princes, both to propose, and also to associate as for that barbarous King of Exhispia, who enjoined King Amasis to drink up the Sea, deserveth as short an answer as that was which Pittasus made to King Amasis to drink up the Sea, deserveth as short an answer as that was which Pittasus made to King Amasis to drink up the Sea, deserveth as short an answer as that a state and proudletters, had no other answer returned him from Pittasus but this: That he should eat Onions and hot bread. Upon which words Periander inserted and said; I assure you Cleademus; it hath been themanner in old time among the ancient Greeks, to propose one unto another sinch questions as these. For we have heard by report, that rittines past, the most skilful and excellent Poets which were in those days, met at the Funerals and Obsequies of Amphidamus within the City of Choleis: Now had this Amphidamus been a man of great honour in government of the Common-weale in his Country; who having put the Fertrains to much trouble in those Wars which they waged against those of Choleis, in the quarrel of Bildness, hapned to lose his lifeat the last in a battel. And for that the curious veries which the said Poets provided and brought to be claimed of, were intricate and hard to be judged of by those who were chosen as Judges of the doubtful victory; and besides the glory of two renowined concurrents, Homer and Hespadus led the Judges in great perspective, and shame to give their fentences; as touching two for amous personages, they grew to inch as these questions in the end; and propounded one to an other, as Lesches saith after this mannet.

Now help me Muse for to endite what things have never been, Nor henceforth whiles the world endures for ever shall be seen?

When steeds to win the prize, with sound

And at the tomb of Jupiter,
their charriots break in twain:

For which cause especially it is reported he was so highly admired, that thereby hee won the tre-feer of Gold. And what difference (quoth Cleodennus) is there between these questions and the riddles put forth by Eumeis? Which haply are no more unseemly for her to devise in sport and mirth, and when she hath (as it were) twisted them, to propose unto dames like her selfe, then for other women to delight for their pattime, to buse their heads in, and working girdles of tissue, or harring net-work Cosies and Cawls; but certainly that men of wisedome and understanding should make any account thereof, were very ridiculous and a meer mockery. At which speech of his it seemed that Eumeis was willing enough to have replied, and faid somewhat unto him again, but that maidenly modely stayed her; for her blood was up, and blushed as red as skarlet all her face over: But Elper taking her part, as it were, orevenge her quarrel: Nay were it not (quoth he) more ridiculous sarre, not to be able to solve such questions? and namely such a riddle as this, which she put forth unto us a little before supper.

A man I Jaw, with help of fire, who fet a peece of brafs, Fast to a man, so as it seem'd to him it sodredwas.

No wtell me, canyou with all your cunning fay what this should be ? No iwis (quoth Cleademus, neither mean I to beat my brains about the knowledge of it: And yet there is no man (quoth he) knoweth this thing better, nor useth it more then you; and if you deny it, I will call to witnesse your ventoses and cupping boxes. Hereat Cleodemus could not chuse but laugh: for there was not a Physitian in those days that used cupping and boxing so much as he, and in regard that he practised it so much, this remedy or device in Physick was in no small request and reputation. But Mnesiphilus the Athenian a familiar friend and zealous follower of Solon, began to speak in this wife unto Persander; Sir, if I might be so bold, I think it good, and my defire is, that the speeches and discourses of this good company, may not be dealt among the rich and noble persons only who are here in place, but parted equally and indifferently among them all, and go round like a cup of wine, as the manner is in democraty or state of a City, governed by the people: This I speak, for that we who live in a popular Common-wealth, participate in nothing of all that which you have right now delivered, as touching soveraign rule of Prince and King: we think it reason therefore that you would enter every one of you into a discourse of popular government, and deliver your several opinions upon the point, beginning first again at Solon. To this motion they all agreed i whereupon Solon thus beganto ipeak: As for you (O Mnefiphilus) like as all the other inhabitants of Athens, you have heard heretofore what mine opinion is concerning the government of a Weal publick; and yet if you please to hear me now also . Isay again, that in my judgement that City is right well governed, and maintaineth best the popular estate and liberty, wherein those very perions who have not been wronged and opprefied, do profecute the law upon an opprefior and wrong doer, yea and feek to punish him, no lesse then the party himselfe who hath susteined the injury and outrage. After him Biss opined thus; That the popular government was best, in which all the inhabitants feared the law as much as a rigorous Tyrant. Then These followed in this manner: That he reputed such a Common-wealth best ordered which had in it neither too wealthy, nor yet over-poor Citizens. Next to him took Anacharsis his turn, and delivered his mind in these words; That in his conceit that City was right well governed, wherein all other things being equally determined among the inhabitants, the better condition was measured by vertue, and the worse by vice. In the fifth place Cleobulus affirmed: That the policy of that popular City was simply bell, the Citizens whereof did more dread dishonour then the Law. Then Patacus in his course gave his opinion thus: That he accounted a State passing well governed, in which wicked persons might not bear any authority, but good men only. Then Chilo when his turn came, pronounced: Inguino to a any authority, and the as the people gave greatest ear unto the Lawes, and leaf hear-that policy to excel allotters when as the people gave greatest ear unto the Lawes, and leaf hear-kened unto Orators. After them all Periander in the last place gave his judgement, saying; That he reckoned that popular effate feemed to be best, which came neerest unto an aristocracy, or regi-

Now when this disputation was ended, I requested them to proceed farther, and to instruct us as touching economy, or an houshold, how it ought to be ordered; for that few men were called unto the government of Cities and Realms, but every one of us had an house and family of his own to be governed: Not so (quoth Affepe, and therewith he laughed) if you teckon Anathar-fir in the number of us; for no house hath he of his own, and (for so th) hegiorieth therein, that none he hath, saying: That he maketh his abode in a chariot, as (men say) the Sun doth, whois carried round about the world in his chaire, and one while goeth to this quarter, and another while carried round about the wonth in the state of the deep in this respect (quoth Anacharfis) the Sun only is free, or at least-wise more at liberty, and at his own dispose, then any other of all the gods, commanding all, and not commanded of any; and therefore he reigneth indeed, and having the reins in his own hand, conducterh his own chariot himselfe: but me thinks you never conceived and comprized the grandeur and beauty of the Sun, how excellent and admirable his chariot is; for otherwife you would never in bourd, and by way of merry jest have compared it to ours sfurthermore, it feement that you take an house to be these cloiders covered with tile, and walled with clay, or earth; which is as much to say, that a Tortoile is the shell, and not the living creature which is therein; and therefore I nothing wonder that you mocked Solon upon a time, for that he having viewed the palace of King Crass, richly furnished and sumptuously adorned, deemed not by and by the owner and Lord thereof to be stately and happily lodged; but defired first to see and behold the good parts that were within him, rather then the goods which were about him; and hereinit feemeth unto me, that you have forgotten your own tale of the Fox, who being come to contel and debate with the Leopard, whether of the twain were befer with more colours and divers spots, required of the judge between them, that he would not regard and confider to much the outward painting of the skin, as the variety of the spirit and foul within, for that he should find the same bedight with a world of diversipots; but you look only to the workmanship of cutters in stone, and of Masons, esteeming that only to be the house, and not that which is domestical and within, to wis, Children, Wife, Friends, and Servitors, unto whom (being wife, fober, and of good conditions) the father of the family, and honsholder, communicating and imparting that which he hath (lay be were within a Birds neaft, or in an Emmets hole) may avouch thathe dwelleth in a good and bleffed house. Lo what mine answer is to Esope, as also for my part, what collation and dole I contribute unto Diocler: now for the rest of you, let every man confer (as reason is) to it, what he thinketh good, and utter his mind. Than Solon: That house (in my opinion) is best the goods wherein, were neither gotten by unjust and indirect meanes, nor bred any fear, suspicion and doubt for the keeping, nor yet drew repentance for the spending of them. After him Bias opened; That he held the family best, the master whereof was of himselse the same man within, as (for sear of the law) abroad. Then Thales: Wherein the master may live at most ease and greatest leasure. And Cleobu-Im: Wherein there be more persons that love, then fear the master. Next delivered Pittacus his mind, and faid: That he took that to be the best house, wherein there was no defire of superfluities nor miffe of necessaries. After him came Chilo with his sentence: That an house ought as much as is possible, to refemble aCity or State governed by the absolute commandment of a King; adding moreover, that which Lycurgus answered sometimes unto one who advised him to establish in the City Spart athe popular government : Begin (quoth he) first thy selfe to ordain in thine owne the City Spartatine upon that the content of the co will not impart and let it passe to others? Then (quoth Solon) neither is this cup (so far as I see) any whit popular, standing as it hath done a long time before Solon only. Whereat Pittacus calling unto Mnesiphilus by name: What is the reason (quoth he) that Solon drinketh not, but goeth against his own Poems, wherein himselse hath written these verses:

The sports of Venus Lady bright , And Bacchus, now are my delight;

For why? thefe three, mens joies do make. Then Anacharsis helped him out, and spake in his behalfe, taying : He doth it Pittaeus for feare of you, and that severe and rigorous law of yours, by which you have ordeined, that who soever by you, and that who have the commit a fault, what ever it be, shall incurre a double penalry, and be fined twice as much as if he had done it whiles he was fober. Then Pittaetts: Yet neverthelesse (quoth he) you carry your selfe so proudly and disdainfull in mockage of this my starute, that both the last yeer, and not long fince, being at my brother Lybis his house, when you were drunkyou demanded to have the prize thereof, and called for the garland and crown, And why not (quoth Anacharfis) confidering there was proposed a reward for the victory to him that drunk molt? and If I were overcharged with wine and drunk with the first, should not I challenge by right the prize and reward of victory? or else rell me what other end is there of drinking luftily, than to bedrunk? Pittacus hereat began to laugh? and than Afope told fuch a tale as this: The wolfe (quoth he) per eiving upon a time the shepherds to eat a mutton within their cottage, approached unto them, and faid; Oh what a stirre and outcry would you have made at us if I had done that which them, and the soft him the soft him the soft him tells with the soft him tells now (whose mouth ere-while we stopped that he had not a word to say) seeing at this present as he doth, that others had taken the aniwer out of Mnefiphilus his mouth, and not given him liberty to speake, being demanded the question why Solon dranke not? and like it was that he should have answered in his behalfe. Then Mnesiphilus rendered this reason and said; That he wish well Solon was of this opinion, that the proper worke of everyart and faculty, as well divine as humane, was rather the effect and thing by it wrought, than that whereby it was effected; and the end thereof rather than the meanes tending thereto : for so I suppose that a weaver will say, that his worke is to make a web for a mantle, a coat or fuch a robe, and not to spoole, winde quils, lay his warp, shoot oufe, or raise and let fall the weights and stones hanging to the loom: Also that the worke of a limith is to foder iron, or to give the temper of steel for the edge of an axe head rather then any other thing needfull to such an effect, to wit, the kindling of coles and setting them on fire, or the preparing of any stone-girt serving for the former purpose. Semblably, a carpenter or mason emploied in at-chitecture, would much more complaine and finde fault with us, if wee should say that neither a ship nor an house were their worke, but the boaring of holes in timber with an augre or the tempering of morter. In like manner would the mules take exceeding great indignation, and not without good caule, if we should think that their works were either harps, lutes, pipes, and such infruments of mufick: and not the reforming and inflitution of folks manners, the dulcing and appeafing of their passions who delight in song, harmony, and musicall accord. And even so we must confesse that the worke of Venus is not carnall company and medling of two bodies; nor of Bacchus, wine-bibbing and drunkennesse, but rather mirth and solace, affectionate love, mutuall amity, conversation, and familiarity one with another, which are procured unto us thereby: for these be the works indeed which Plato calleth divine and heavenly: and these he saith that he desired and pursued when he grew aged and was well stept in yeers. For I assure you Venus is the work-mifirefic of mutuall concord, folace and benevolence between men and women, mingling and melting (as it were) together with the bodies, their foules also, by the meanes of pleasure: Bacchus likewife in many who before had no great familiarity together, nor any knowledge and acquaintance to speak of, by softning and moistning the hardnesse of their manners, and that by the meanes of wine (like as fire worketh iron to be gentle and pliable) hath engendred a beginning of commixtion and incorporation one with another. True it is I must needs say, that when such personages are met and affembled together, as Periander hath hither invited, there is no need either of cup or flagoh for to bring them acquainted: for the muses setting in mids before them a cup of sobriety, to wit, their conference and speech, wherein there is not only store of pleasure and delight, but also of erudition, learning, and serious matter, do excite, drench, enlarge and spread abroad by the meanes of discourie and talk, the aimiable joy of such guests, suffering for the most part the wine, pot or flagon to stand still above the cup or goblet: a thing that Hefiodus forbad expresly among such as could skill better to carouse than to discourse. And whereas we read thus in Homer:

For how soever other Greeks that weare their haire fo long, Doe drinke about their measure just allowed them among: Your cup I see stands ever full, no gage to you is set, But harty draughts you may carouse, noman there is to let.

Įκ

Methinks I heare and understand hereby, that our ancients called this manner of drinking one to another by way of challenge and provocation Dauter, according to thetearme that Homer giveth it, and to every man dranke a certaine measure in order: yea, and afterwards (like as Aiax did) each one divided portions of flesh to his next fellow sitting at the board: Now when Mnefiphilus had thus faid: Cherfias the Poet, whom lately Periander had quit of certaine imputations charged upon him, and who was newly returned into his favour at the earnest request of Chilon

I would gladly know (quoth he) whether Jupiter gage the rest of the gods with a certaine mea-fure and stint of drinking, (for that they use to drink one to another when they dine, and supwith him) like as Agamemnon dealt by the Princes of the Greeks, when they were at his tablet Then Cleodemus: If it be true (quoth he) friend Chersias as you and other Poets do say, that certaine doves flying hardly and with great difficulty over the rocks called Plant a, bring unto Tupiter that celetiail meat named Ambrosia; think you not likewise that he had much adoe to get the heavenly drink Netter, and that he had but small store thereof, whereby he could not chuse but make spare and give of it to every one according to measure? Yes verily (quoth Chersias) and peradventure they had it diffributed equally among them: but fince we are fallen againe into a fresh discourse of house-keeping, which of you will goe on and finish the rest which remaines the be faid thereof? Then Cleobulus inferred this speech and faid: As for wife men indeed, the law (quoth he) hath given them a prefcript measure; but as touching fools, I will tellyou a tale which I heard my mother once relate unto a brother of mine: The time was (quoth she) that the Moon praied her mother to make her a petticoat fit and proportionable for her body: Why, how is it possible (quoth her mother) that I should knit or weave one to sit well about thee, considering that I see thee one while full, another while croissant or in the waine, and pointed with tips of homs, and sometime againe halfround? Even so (triend Chersias) a man is not able to set down a definite and just proportion of substance and goods to maintein an house unto a foolish or naughty person; for such a one hath need one while of this thing, and another while of that, according to his divers desires and variable events and occasions, much like to Aspr dog, who as he saith, in the winter featon shrinking together, and lying round for cold, wherewith he is ready to be frozen and starved, is of mind to build himselfe an house: but in summer when he slies sleeping stretched out at length, he thinks himselfe to be very great, and supposeth it a needlesse thing to build an house, and bender no small peece of work to set up a frame bigge and large enough to receive his body. See you not likewile O Chersias, that these kinde of folke will be thought now but small and little, and restraine themselves into a narrow compasse, proposing fortooth a streight and laconi-call manner of life; but anon all at once they will bee aloft, and if they may not have all that they see, and possesse not onely the estate of private persons, but also of Kings and Princes, they are undone for ever, and complaine as if they were pined and ready to dye for hunger: at which words Charfiss held his peace. But Cleadenss then began and faid: Howbeit, we all te (quoth he) that you my mafters your felves who are fage and wife, have your goods and possessions unequally dealt among you, if a man would go about to measure and count them. True indeed my good friend (answered Cleobulus againe) and this is because the law (like unto a good weaver or knitter) hath given unto every one of us that which is fit, sutable and convenient for us; and even so you your selfe, Sir, in your direction for dier, nourishment and purging of your patients by reason, after the prescription (as it were) of law, do not set them down receits and orders all alike, but such as are agreeable and meet for every one. Upon this speech Ardalus replied, saying How then ? Is there a law that commandeth Epimenides here our familiar friend, and Solon's hoffe to forbeare all other viands, and by raking onely in his mouth a little of the composition called Alimin, which hath vertue to put-by hunger (which pleasant electuary or confection hee maketh himself) to continue a whole day without meat and drink, without dinner and supper. This speech moved attention and silence in the whole company there in place: onely Thales after a jocund and merry manner aniwered: That Epimenides did well and wifely not to buse and trouble himselfe about grinding corn, baking meale, or drefting his own meats (as Pittaeu did:) formy lelfe (quoth he) whiles I was in the Ille Leibas, heard a wench of a forrein Country, as the turned the querri about, sing thus, Grind mill, Grind; for even Pittaeus the King of Great Mitylena, is a miller and gfindeth, But Solon faid; I wonder much Ardalus, that you never read in Hesiodus his Poem, the receit of the regiment of that mans diet : for he was the first who gave unto Epimenides the feeds of this nourishment, and taught him to search:

In Mallowes and in Alphodels, which grow on every ground: What use and prosit manifold, for man there may be found.

Why? think you (quoth Periander) that Hefodus had any fuch meaning in that verse; and not rather (as he is alwaies a great praise of sparing and srugality) that he exhorted us unto the simples viands, as to those which were most pleasant: for surely the Mallow is good to eat, and the Asphotell stem very sweet in taste: as sor those which here Physicians name Alima and Adipsa, that is to say, putting-by hunger and thirst; I heare say and understand, that they be medicines and not meats, and that among other ingredients that go to their making, they receive honie and a certain barbarous kind of cheeles, besides many other seeds which are easie enough to come by: sor how else should not as (as we read in Hesodus)

if need there were of so great provision? But I marvell much Solon, at your hoste, that having but lately celebrated a solemn feast of Puriscation among the Delians, hee observed not how they themselves brought with great ceremony into their Temple, the ensignes and monuments of the ancient and primitive nourifhment of mankind? and namely, among other things very common, and which grow of themselves without mans hand, the Mallow and the Asphodell: which two herbs (it is very probable and like) that Hefiodus also recommended unto us for their simplicity and profit. Not in those regards onely (quoth Anacharsis) but for that they both, the one as well as the other, are commended as especiall herbs for the health of man, True (quoth Cleodimus) and great reason you have so to tay: for Hesiodus was well seen in physick, as may appear by that which he hath written so exactly and skilfully of diet, and the regiment of our feeding, of the manner of tempering wine, of the vertue and goodnesse of water, the use of baines, baths, and women, of the time of keeping company with them, and of the positure of infants in the wombe, and when they should be born. But to judge aright, Elope had more reason than Epimaides to avow himselfe the disciple of Hesseldan, for the talk which the hauke had with the nightingall gave unto Efope the first beginning of this faire, variable, and many-tongued learning of his. But willing I am to heare Solon; for very like it is, that he having lived and conversed to familiatly many yeers together with Epimenides at Athens, asked of him oltentimes, and knew full well upon what accident or occasion, and for what purpose he chose and followed this strait course of life. And what need was there (quoth Solan) to demand that of him? for all the world knoweth, and most evident it is, that as the greatest and most soveraign good of man, is to have no need at all of nourture; fo the next unto it is to require the least nourishment that is : Not so (quoth Cleodemus) if I may be so bold as to speake my mind: For I do not think that the loveraign good of man is to eat nothing, especially when the table is laid and inmished with meat; for to take away the viands fet thereupon, is as much as to subvert the Altar, and sacrince unto the gods, and to overthrow the amity and hospitality among men. And like as Thales saith: That if the earth were taken out of the world, there must of ne effity ensue a generall confusion of all things; even so we may fay, put down the board you do as much as ruinate the whole houle; for with it you abolish fire which keepeth the house; the tutelar deity of Vesta; the amiable cultome of drinking together out of one boul and cups the laudable manner of featling of friends; the kind fashion of entertaining strangers, and all reciprocall hospitality; and mutuall usage of guests; which be the principall and most courteous conversations that can be devised among men one with another : and to speake the summe more truely; farewell then, all the sweetnesse of humane life and society, in case there be allowed any retreit at all, solace and passion apart from businesse and affairs, whereof the need of fullenance and the preparation thereto belonging, yeeldeth most matter, and atfoordeth the greatest part. Moreover, the mischiefe hereof would reach as fatre as to agriculture, and that were great pity, confidering that if husbandry were laid down with the decay and mine thereof, there would enjugagaine a rude and deformed face of the whole earth, as being neglected, and not clented from truitleffe trees, bushes and weeds, and overflowed with the inucdation of waters and rivers running out of their channels to and fro without order for want of good husbandry, and the oiligent hand of man : over and befides, perish there shall with it, all arts and handicrafts, which the table maintaineth and keepeth in traine, giving unto them their foundation and matter, in such fort as they will come all to nothing, if you take it away : nay more than that; What will become of religion and worship done to the gods? for surely, men will exhibit but little or none honour at all unto the Sunne, and much lesse unto the Moon, as having nought else from them but their light and heat only: and who will ever cause an altar to be reared and furnished as it ought to be, to Jupiter, for fending down feafonable rain, or to Geres the patroneffe of agriculture. or to Neptune the protector of trees and plants? who will ever after offer any facrifices unto them? how shall Bacchus be the author of joy and mirth, if we have no more any need of that pleasant liquor of wine which he giverh? what shall we facrifice? what shall we poure upon the altars? what oblations shall we offer unto the gods? and whereof shall we present any first sruits? In one word, this abuse would bring with it a totall subversion, and generall confusion of the best and chiefest things. True it is, that to follow allkind of pleasures, and in every manner, were brutishness; and even so to flye them all, and in no wise to embrace them, were no lesse folly and sottishnesse. The soul may well enough enjoy other pleatures and delights, which are better and more noble; but the body can find none at all more harmlets and honest, to content it felfe with sthan to eat and drink, whereby it is fed and nourished; a thing that there is no man but he both knoweth and acknowledgeth; in regard whereof menuse to set and spread their tables in publike and open places, for to eat and drink together in the broad day light; whereas to take the pleasure of Venus, they wait for the night, and seek all the darknesse they can, supposing it to be as beastly and shameless to do the one in publike and common, as not at all to do the other, but forbeare it altogether. When Cleodennus herewith brake off and ended his speech, Ifollowed in the same traine, and seconded his words in this wife: But you overpasse one thing besides, namely, that by this means, together with our food and nourishment we banish and drive away all sleep: now if there be no sleep, there will be no dreams, and to by confequence, we may bid farewell to a most ancient kinde of oracle and divination which we have by them. Over and befides, our life will be alwaies after one fashion, and to no purpose; but in vaine shall the soul be clad(as a man would say) within the body, seeing that the greatest number and the principall parts of the faid body were made and framed by nature for to serve as instruments of nourishment; as for example, the tongue, the teeth the stomack and the liver, &c. for there is nothing in the whole structure and composition of mans body, that either lieth still and idle, or is ordeined for any other use; insomuch as whosoever hath no need of food, needeth not the body alfo; which is as much to fay, as that he standeth in no need of himselfe; for every one of us down confilt as well of body as foule. Thus much may ferve for my part, to have spoken in the defence of the belly; now it Solon or any other have ought to fay and object against it, by way of accusation, ready we are and disposed to give him the hearing. Yes mary (quoth Solon) unlesse wee would be reputed of leffe judgement and understanding then the Egyptians, who ripping open the belly of a dead body, shew it unto the Sunne, and call away the guts and entrailes together with the paunch, into a running river; but afterwards, when they have thus rid away the garbage, and cleanted the corps, the relt they imbalme and be carefull of: for to fay a truth, these inwards, be the very pollution and inquination of the flesh, and to speake properly, the very bell of our bedy; for so they say, that the place of the damned is full of (I wot not what) horrible rivers and winds confused together with fire and dead carcasses. For no creature living is nourished with any food that liveth; but we (in killing those creatures which have soules, or in destroying plants, herbr and fruits which participate likewise of life, inasmuch as we see them to be nourished and grow) do evill, and finne very grievoully, toralmuch as whatfoever is transmuted and turned into ano ther, loseth that nature which it had before, and wholly is corrupted, for to betome noural ment to another. As for abilinence from eating of flesh, as (by report) Orpheus did in old time, is rather a fubrill shift of Sophistry, than any perfect shunning or forbearing of those sinnes which are com-mitted in delicious fare, and superfluous gormandize; but the onely way to avoid enormity in this behalte, and the meanes to keep a mans felte perfectly pure and undefiled, according to the abiolute rule of justice, is to be content with that which is within himselfe, and to live without define of any thing without, whatfoever; but he that is by God framed to that nature and condition, that without the dammage and hurt of another, he cannot possibly preserve his own being and safety; unto him he hath given a nature which will continually move him to injuffice, and to commit wrong. Were it not then (my goodfriend Diocles) very meet and requifite to cut off together with injustice and finfulnesse, the belly stomack, and liver, yea, and all other such parts which give uno us the appetite of nothing in the world that is honely but refemble partly the influments of a cook, and veffels of the kitchin, to wit, chopping-knives, cawdrons, pots and kettles, and in part are like unto the utenfils of a mill, of a chimney, oven or furnace, or fuch took as ferve either to dig pits, of be used in bake-house or pattry? for to say a truth, you may plainly see and perceive that the foule in many men lieth hidden within the body, as it were in a certain mil-house, turning round continually (as one would fay) about a quern, impuriout after the necessities thereof, even as we here ere-while perceived by experience in our owntelves, when we neither favy nor heard; not regarded one another; but every one of us inclining forward and flooping down to our vichals, served our ownenced and looked to our food, but now when the tables beefaken up; is you see, having chaplets of flowers on our heads we take delight in devising together, and holding honest discourses, we rejoice in tellowship and good company, we pass the time away in ease and repole, being once come to that point, that we have no more any defire or need of nourishment: If then we could hold us foffill, and continue while we live in this present state, so that we neither feared want and poverty, nor yet knew what was coverous nesse and defire of riches, should we not lead (think you) a bleffed and easie life, as having leisure to converse together, and joy in our mutuall fociety? For know well this, that looking after the needlesse superfluities immediately ensueth upon the appetite and defire of things necessary. But whereas Cleobulus is of this opinion, that needs there must be meat and food, to the end that there might be tables, and standing cups up on them, that men may drink one to another; also that they might facrifice to dame Ceres and her daughter Proferpina: another man may as well and truly fay: There ought to bee warres and battels, to the end that we may have wals and fortifications for our Cities, Arcenals for our navie, and armories also, that for the killing of an hundred enemies, wee might in thanksgiving to the gods, offer facrifices thereupon, called Hecatomphonia, according as they fay, there is a statute importing so much among the Messenians. Or all one it were as it some other should bee angry of offended with health, saying: It were great pitty, if because there are none sick any more, there should bee no use of easie beds, fine linnen sheets, soft pillowes and coverings, nor any need to facrifice unto Asculapine or other gods, to divert and turne away our maladies; and so the at of phylick, with all the tools, instruments, drugs and medicines belonging thereto, be cast aside and neglected without honour and regard. For what ods is there between the one and the other, confidering that wee received food as a medicine to cure our hunger? Befides, all they that keep a certeine dier, are faid to cure themselves, using this remedy, not as a pleasure delightsome and desireable, but as meanes to content and satisfie nature. For surely we may reckon more paines than pleasures, that come unto a man by his feeding; or to speake more truely, the pleasures than pleasures, that come unto a man by his feeding; fure of eating hath but a little place, and continueth as small a while in mans body i but the trouble and difficulty which it hath in providing and preparing, with how many thamefull inconverniences and painefull travels it peffereth us, what should I relate unto you? for I suppose, that in regard of all these vexations, Homer took upon him to prove, that the gods died not, by this argument, that they received no food:

As if by these verseshe would give us to understand, that our eating and drinking is not onely the meanes of our life, but also the cause of our death: for thereupon a number of diseases take hold of our bodies, which are gathered within the same, and proceed no lesse from sulnesse than emptinesse, and many times we have more adoe to concoet, consume, and dissipate our food, than we had to get and provide it. And much like as if the daughters of Danaus were in doubt what to do, and what life to lead, or how to be emploied, after they were delivered and freed once from their fervile taske imposed upon them, for to fill their tunne boared full of holes; even so doubt we (in case we were come to this passe, as to cease from suffing and cramming this unsatiable sless of ours, which will never tay Ho, with all forts of viandsthat land or fea may affoord) what wee should do? and all because for want of experience and knowledge what things be good and honest, we love all our life time to feek for to be provided of necessaries: and like as they who have been flaves a long time, after they come once to be delivered from fervitude, do of themselves, and for themselves the very same services, which they were wont to perform for their masters, when they were bound; even to, the foule taketh now great paines and travell to feed the body, but if once the might be dispatched and discharged from this yoke of bondage, no sooner shall she finde her felse tree and at liberty, but she will nourish and regard her selse, she will have an eie then to the knowledge of the truth, and nothing shall pluck her away, or divert and withdraw her from it. Thus much O Nicharchus as touching those points which were then delivered concerning nonrithment. But before that Solon had fully finished his speech, Gorgias the brother of Periander entred into the place, being newly returned from Tanarus, whither he had been sent before by occasion of (I wot not what) oracles, for to carry thither certaine oblations unto Neptune, and to doe facrifice unto him; we all saluted him and welcomed him home; but Periander his brother comming toward, kiffed him, caufing him afterwards to fit down by himselfe upon the bed fide, where he made relation unto him alone of certaine newes. Periander gave good eare unto his brother, and shewed by his countenance that he was diversly affected, and very passionate upon that which he heard him to report; and by his vilage it feemed one while that he forrowed and grieved, anotherwhile that he was angry and offended; he made semblant for a time, as if he distrusted and would not give credit unto him, and anon againe he seemed as much to wonder and stand in admiration; in the end he laughed, and faid unto us: Very gladly would I out of hand recount unto you, the tidings which my brother hath told me, but hardly dare I, neither will I be over-hafty fo to do, for fear of Thales, whom I have heard otherwise to fay: That well wee might make report of newes that be probable, and like to be true; but touching things impossible, we ought altogether forto hold our peace. Hereupon Bias: But as wife a faying (quoth he) was this of Thales: That as we ought not to believe our enemies in things that be credible, fo wee are not to discredit our friends even in those things that are incredible. For mine own part, I think verily by this speech of his, that he took those for his enemies who were lewd and foolish, and reputed for friends such as were good and wife. I would advise you therefore (O Gorgias) that either you would declare your newes here before all this company, or rather reduce that narration which you come withall to pronounce aloud unto us, into those new kind of verses which are called Dithyrambes. Then Gorgias settale on end, and began to speake in this manner: After we had sacrificed for the space of three daies together, and the lasteday performed in a generall assembly all the night a festivall solemnity, with piaies and dances along the firond by the lea fide, as the moon shoon at full upon the sea, without any wind in the world stirring at all, so as there was a gentle generall calme, and every thing still and quiet ; behold we might discover afarre off a certaine motion or trouble in the fea, bending roward a promontory or Cape, and as it approached neerer thereto, raifed withall a little scum, and that with a great noise by reason of the agitation of the water and waves that it made in such fort, as that all the company of us wondered what it might be, and ran toward the place whereunto it seemed to make way and bend the course for to arrive; but before that wee could by any conjecture guesse what it was, (the swittnesse thereof was such) we might evidently descry with our cie a number of Dolphins, some swimming round about it thicke together, others directing the whole troop toward the easiest and gentlest landing place of the bank and some there were again, that followed behind as it were in the rereward:now in the mids of all this troop, there appeared above the water I wot not what lump or maffe of a body floting aloft, which wee could neither discern nor devite what it was, untill such time as the said Dolphins all close together, and shooting themselves into the shore, landed upon the bank a man both alive and also moving; which done they returned toward the rock or promontory aforefaid, leaping and dancing wantonly as it should seem for very joy more then they did before: which the greatest part of our company (quoth Gorgias) feeing, were to greatly afraid, that they fled from the sea amain all amased; my selfe with some few others, took better heart and approached near, where we found that it was Arion the harper, who of himselfe told to us his name, and easie he was otherwise to be known, for that he had the same apparell which hee was wont to weare when he plaied in publike place upon his harp: So we took him up in ontinently and brought him into a tent (for harm he had none in the world, save only that by reason of the swittnesse and violent force of his carriage he was weary and feemed ready to faint) where we heard from his mouth a strange tale, and to all men incredible, unlesse it were to us who saw the end and issuethereof. For this Arion reported unto us, that having been of long time resolved to returne out of Italy, and so much the rather, because Persayder had written unto him for to make hafte and come away upon the first opportunity presented to him of a Corinthian Carrick that made faile from thence, he prefently embarked, but no fooner were they come into the broad and open lea, and that with a gentle gale of wind, but he perceived that the Mariners conspired together for to take away his life, whereof the pilot himselse also of the same ship gave him advertisement secretly, namely, that they intended to put the thing in execution that night. Arion thus finding himselfe destitute of all succour, and not knowing what to do; it came into his mind as it were by a certeine heavenly and divine infoiration (whiles he had yet some time to live) for to adorn his body with those ornaments which he accultomed to put on when he was to play upon his harp for a prize in some trequent Theater; to the end that the same habit might serve him for his sunerall weed now at his death; and withall to fing a dole ull fong and lamentable ditty before his departure out of this life, and not to shew himfeite in this case lette generous then the Iwans: being therefore thus arraied and decked accordingly, and doing the mariners to wit before hand, that he had a wonderfull defire to chant a fonnet or hymn unto Apollo Pythius, for the fafety of himselfe, the ship and all those fellow-passengers who were within it, he stood upright on his feet in the poop close to the ship side, & after he had sounded a certain invocation or praiets to the sea-gods, he chanted the canticle beforesaid, and as he was in the mids of his fong, the funne went down and feemed to fettle within the fea, and with that they began to discover Peloponnesus. Then the Mariners who could no longer stay nor tarry for the dark night, came toward for to kill him; when he saw their naked swords drawne, and beheld the foresaid Pilot how he covered his face, because he would not see so villainous a spectacle, hee cast himielie over ship-boord, and leapt as farre into the sea from the ship as he could; but before that his whole body was under the water, the Dolphins made haste, and from beneath were ready to bear him up for finking. Full of fear and perturbation of spirit he was at first, insomuch as being aftonied thereat, he wist not what it might be; but within a while after, perceiving that he was carried aceale, and feeing a great flote of Dolphins environing gently round about him, and that they fucceeded and feconded one another by turnes for to take the charge of carrying him, as if it had been a service imposed upon them all, and whereunto they were necessarily obliged; and seeing befides that the Carricke was a good way behind (by which he gathered that he went apace, and was a carried away with great celerity:) he was not (quoth Gorgias) so tearful of death, or desirous otherwise to live, as he had an ambitious desire to arrive once at the haven of safety, to the end that the world might know that he flood in the grace and favour of the gods, and that he reposed an assured beliefe and firme affiance in them, beholding as hee did the skie full of starres, the Moone arifing pure and cleere with exceeding brightnesse, and the whole sea about him smooth and calme; but that the course of these Dolphins traced out a certaine way and path, so that he thought thus within himselfe, that the divine justice had not one eie alone, but as many eies as there were starres in the heaven, and that God beheld all about whatsoever was done both by sea and land: Which cogitations and thoughts of mind (quoth he) mightily strengthened and tuttained my body, which otherwise was ready to faint and yield with travell and wearinefle: finally, when the Dolphins were come as farre as to the great promontory of Tenarus, so high and steep, they were very wary and carefull that they ran not upon it, but turned gently at one fide, and fivom behind it along the coast, as if they would have conducted a bark fafe and found to a fure bay and landing place, whereby he perceived evidently that carried he was thus by the guidance of the divine providen e. After that Arion (faid Gorgias) had made all this dif. ourse unto us, I enquired of him where he thought that the ship above aid intended to arrive. At Corinth (quoth he) without all doubt, but it will be very late first, for it being toward evening when I leapt into the sea I suppose that I was carried upon the Dolphins backs no lesse then a course of five hundred furlongs, and no sooner was I from ship-boord, but there ensued presently a great calm at sea. Moreover, Gorgias faid: That he having learned the names aswell of the ship-master, as of the Pilot, and withall known what badge or entigne the ship carried, made out certain pinnaces, and those manned with fouldiers, for to observe what Creeks, commodious Baies, and landing-places there were upon the said coast; but as for Arion, Gorgias conveied him secretly with him, for seare lest if the Mariners should have had any advertisement of his delivery and safety, they might flie away and escape: But as God would have it, every thing fell out so, as we might see (quoth Gorgias) the very immediate hand of the divine power; for at one and the same instant that I arrived here, I had intelligence also that the said thip was fallen into the hands of those souldiers whom I set out; and so the Mariners and passengers within it were taken all prisoners. Hereupon Periander commanded Gorgias presently to arise to apprehend them and lay them up fast in close prison, where no person might have accessed unto them, or certifie them that Arion was a live and safe. Then Espe: Mock on now (quoth he) at my jayes and crowes that talk and tell tales, when you see that Dolphins also can in this wife play their youthfull parts, and atchieve fuch proweffes. Nay (quoth I then) we are able to report, Afop: another narration like to this, which hath been set down in writing, and received for currant and good their thousand yeers passed and more, even from the daies of Ino and Athamas. Then Solon taking occasion of speech by these words: yea, but these matters, O Diocles (quoth he) concerne the gods more neerly, and surpasse our puissance; but as for that which befell to Hesiodus, was a meer humane accident, and not impertinent unto us, for I suppose you have heard the history told. No I assure you (quoth 1:) But worth it is the hearing (quoth Solor againe.) And thus by report it was. A certaine Milesian with whom as it should seem Hestodus had familiar acquaintance, infomuch as they lodged, eat and drunke together ordinarily in the City of Locres, kept their hofts daughter, and abused her body, so as in the end he was taken with the manner. Now was Hefiodus suspected to have been privy to him of this villany from the very beginning; yea, and to have kept the door and affilted him in concealing the same, whereas indeed he was in no tault at all, nor cuipable any way; howbeit, by means of false surpitions and finister surmizes of people, hee incurred much anger, and was hardly thought of, neither could he avoid the unjust imputations of the world: for the brethren of the young damosell lay in ambush for him neer unto a wood about Locri, set upon and slew him outright, together with his fervant or page, Troiliu, who tended upon him. After this murther committed, and their bodies cast into the lea, it chanted that the corps of Troilm being carried forth into the river Dapha nue, rested upon a rock environed and dashed round about with the water, and the same not farre from the fea, which rock thereupon took his name, and is to called at this day. But the dead body of Hesiodus, immediately from the land was received by a float or troop of Dolphins, and by them carried as farre as to the Capes Rhion and Molychria. It fortuned at the very same time that the Citizens of Locri, held a folemn affembly, and celebrated festivall facrifices, called Rhia, which they perform even at this day also in the very same place with great magnificence and state: this corps being espied floating toward them, (you may wellthink) caused all the company there to marvell not a little, who thereupon ranne all to the shoare, and taking knowledge that it was the corps of Hesiodus, because it seemed fresh killed, they laid all other bunnesse apart, and with all fpeed, sent about and made inquintion of this murther, by reason of the great renown and name that went of He stody. and this they followed with such diligence, that quickly they found out the murtherers, whom after they were apprehended, they threw alive headlong prefently into the fea, drowned them and razed their house. Now was the Corps of Hesiedus enterred neer unto the Temple Nemerium: howbeit, few strangers there be that know of this his Sepulcher, for concealed of purpose it is, by reason of the Orchonenians who made search for it (by report) and were designed. tous by the appointment of certaine Oracles to take up his reliques, and bury them in their Country. If then the Dolphins be so kind and lovingly affected to the dead, much more probable it is, that they be willing and ready to help those who are alive, especially if they be drawn and allured by the found of the pipes fluits or other harmonie: for who is there of us all that knoweth not how these creatures are delighted in longs, following and lwimming along those vessels where they hear mufick, as taking great pleasure in the longs and mulicall instruments of those passengers, who doe sing or play in a faire and calm feason: also they are not a little pleased to see young children swimming, and they joy and strive to be dousling, badling, and diving together with them: and therefore provided it is by an unwritten law, as touching their fecurity, that they should not be hurt; by vertue whereof none do fish for them, no nor do them any harm, unlesse haply when they chance to be taken in any nets, they hinder the taking of other fishes, or otherwise hurt them, and then beaten they are, and corrected gently for it, like as little children who have done amis and made a fault. And here I call to mind what I have heard recounted for certainty, of the inhabitants of Lesbos, that in times past within their Countrie, there was a young maiden faved by a Dolphin, from perill of being drowned in the fea: but for that Pittachus should know this much better, it were more reason that he himselfe reported it. True it is indeed (quoth Pittachus) the tale is very notorious, and related by many. For there was an answergiven by oracle to those founders, who first peopled Lesbosithat when in failing upon the fea they arrived at a rock called Meffogaan, that is to fay, Mediterranean, they should call into the sea for Neptune, a bull, but for dame Amphirite, and the Nymphs Nereides, a virgin a live. Now seven principall Conductors and Kings there were of that company which were to inhabit there, and Echelaus made the eight, expresly named by the oracle for the planting of a colony, and he as yet a batchelor and unmarried. Now when the other feven, who had daughters marriageable, and yet unwedded, cast lots among themselves, whose daughter should be offered (as is before aid) it fell out fo, that the lot light upon the daughter of Smintheut; her therefore they arraied with rich robes, and adorned with coffly jewels of gold for that purpole, and being come to the place appointed after they had made their praiers and orailons accordingly, as in such a case, and were now at the very point to throw her into the sea; a certain young man, one of the passengers in the ship, of a gentle nature and good disposition (as it appeared) whose name was Englus, being enamoured of the faid young damoiel, entred presently into a resolution to succour her in whis extremity, although he saw well that it was in manner unpossible, and embracing her fast about the middle, hee cast himselfe and her together into the sea : and even then there ran a rumour, although without any certaine ground or author, howbeit believed by many of the army, that both of them were carried to land and laved alive: but afterwards (by report) the faid Enalus was feen in the Isle Lestos, who made relation, that he and shee both were mounted upon Dolphins backs and so carried safe to the firmland without any danger. I could rehearse other strange narrations belonging hereto, more marvelous than these, able as well to ravish with admiration, as to affect with delectation, the minds of any that shall heare them; but hard it is to averrethem all for true, and to bring proofe thereof, namely: That when there arose a mighty huge billow of water about the Island like a rock, so as no men durst approach neer unto the sea, Enalus only came thither, and a number of Polype fishes, or poulpes followed after her, and accompanied him to the Temple of Neptune, where the biggest of them brought unto Enalusa stone which he took and dedicated there in memoriall of this miracle; which stone we call E, to this day, But in summe (quoth he)if a man knew well the difference between impossible and unusuall, and could distinguish between that which is contrary to the order or course of nature, and the common opinion of men, in not beleeving too rashly, nor discrediting a thing too easily, he might observe well from time to time, your rule O Chilon, [Nothing overmuch] which you ordein to be kept. After him spake Anachar sis, laying: That it is not to be wondred at, that the goodliest and greatest matters in the world were done by the will and providence of God, confidering that according to the good and wife opinion of Thales, there is in all the chiefe and principall matters thereof a certaine soule: for as the organ and instrument of the soule is the body; so the instrument of God is the soule: and like as the body hath many motions of the owne, but the greater part of them, and namely those which are most noble, proceed from the soule; even so the soule likewise doth worke some of her operations by her own inftinct, but in others the yeeldeth her felfe to be ordered, turned, managed and directed by God, as it pleaseth him to use her, being indeed of all instruments the most meet and handsome: for it were a very strange and absurd thing, that wind, water, clouds and raine, should be Gods instruments, by meanes whereof he nourisheth and mainteineth many creatures, and whereby he destroieth and overthroweth as many; and that hee should use the ministery of no living creatures in any worke of his: Reason it is yet and probable, that seeing such creatures depend wholly upon the putsfance and omnipotency of God, that they should serve all his motions, yea, and obey his wils, and fecond his purpoles, more than bowes are accommodate to the Scythians, and harps or hauthoies to the Greeks. After this speech the Poet Chersian made mention of many others who had been miraculously, and beyond all hope and expectation laved from death, and among the rest he gave instance of Copfelus the father of Periander, whom, being but a young babe, and infant new born, certaine bloody murtherers were fent to kill him, and upon the fight of him, for very pitty turned away, and forbare to commit fobloody a fact; but afterwards bethinking themselves, and repenting such toolish compassion, they returned back agains to seek him out, but could not find him, for that his mother had hidden him within a little corn flasket or twiggen hamper, called in Greek Cypfele: in remembrance whereof, Cypfelus afterwards when he was a man dedicated a chappell within the Temple of Apollo in Delphos, as beleeving how at that time hee had been miraculously preserved, and by the hand of God kept from crying, which might have bewraied him to the murderers. Then Pittacus addressing his speech to Periander, said thus: Chersias hath done me a great pleasure to mention this Chappell or Cell; for many a time defirous I was to know of you what should be the meaning of those frogs which are seen graven round about the foot of the palmetree therein; and what they did concerne either the said god Apollo, or the man himselfe who built and dedicated the faidhouse. And when Periander willed him to ask Chersias that question, who wist well enough what it was, for that it was with Cypschu at the dedication thereof; Chersias smiled and said; I will not expound the mystery thereof, unlesse I may know first of them that bee here, what is meant by these old said sawes; Nothing too much : Know thy felfe ; and that other mot, (which hath caused some to continue single and unmarried, others to sorbeare sureti-ship, and many to be distrustfull, to be mute and filent) to wit, Give thy word and pay: Be surety, and be sure of a shrewd turne. And what need is there quoth Pittacus, that we should interpret and declare these sentences, considering you so greatly praise the fables that Afope hath composed, which shew the substance of every one? Alope answered: So saith Chersias indeed when he is disposed to jest and be merry with me : but when he speaketh in good earnest, he affirmeth that Homer was the first author of these sentences, faying that Hetter knew himselfe well enough, who advancing forward to set upon other captains of the Greeks, Refused well and wisely for to fight With Ajax, sonne of Telamon that Knight.

He faith moreover, that My fer approved and commended this sentence, Nothing too much; whenhe admonished Diomedes in these tearms:

Sir Diomede, praise not me overmuch, Ne yet dispraise, I love no doings such.

And as for fureti-ship, others are of opinion that he condemneth it as a lewd, naughty, and dangerous thing in these words:

Who sureties are for men distress, and in calamity, Tast of entimes for their kind heart much infortunity.

But this Poet Cherfiss here faith: That the fiend Ate, which is as much to fay as Plague or Infortunity, was by Jupiter flung down from heaven to earth, for that she was present at the caution or warrantise which he interposed as touching the nativity of Hercules, whereby Jupiter was circumvented and overtaken, Then Solon, Seeing it is so (quoth he) I am of this mind, that we should give eate and credit to the most wise Poet Homer, whole counsell is this:

Since

Since that the night comes on a pace, and hath surprised us, Full meet it is her to obey, and end our speeches thus.

After we have therefore given thanks in powring out wine and offering it to the Muses, Neprune and Amphitrate, let us (if you think to good) end this our affembly and banquet. Thus Nicarchus, this our merry meeting brake up, and was for that time diffolved.

Instructions for them that mannage affairs of State.

The Summary.

Transpin any publike government she it of Prince, Seignorie or people, as it is dangerous and dete-Hable's faine are no lesse to feare anarchy and the horrible confusion of those States where every und is a Lord and Mafter. The wife man faid party well: That a people or City deflitute of government, is nere to ruine; and publike affaits profier well, when there be flore of good Counfellors. And on theother side, experience sheweth, that humane society cannot stand without Magistrates, the mainteiners of lawes and good order, which te the nerves or finewes, the cords and props of our life and converfation over with another. But if there be any may in the world lippery, it is that of the management of Sease-affairs, ty rasfon of the laudnelle of fome, whom I may call face fools, who run by heaps after publike offices, not suffering men of honour to emer into them, as fearing to be afterwards ranged and ordered by reason. Since then that survivion is a mortall plague in the mind and understanding of him who would advance himfelfe by crocked and indirect means, it behooveth on the contrary fide, that those who have a sincere affection to serve to melike place, take heed that they be not discouraged, alshough other melites ebey be kept under and put dewine by such persons as by good right puglis to serve, and not command. To bold therefore force meanain shis case, between mounting upuntowain glory and falling into cowardise, Plutach for an content and latisfic a friend of his, givet h good infinitions to every man that enter him to the managing of State-affairs: and in the fift place her requireth at his hands a good will, free fram commission discharges send of controls and adverse from ambition and emps afterwards, his adwice is that be endevour raketow shofe well, whom he must govern, for to acquit him well in his own duty, to case he be industed unto any high degree, in reforming himselfe, and being furnished with a good consciences, knowledge and elequences, proper instruments for voryor borow all difficulties. This done, he teacheth a States-mante manuage well his own words, alfordhat way he ought to take for the entrance into the condust of his weight; uffairs ; what friends he isto chuses and how he is to demean himselfe as well with shem as his enemies: afterwards he discussed and handleth this question, to with Whether fuch a person as he whom he bath represented, ought to intermeddle and deal in all offices, and refolverhabits he ought to mannage nove but that which is of greatest importance. Erom this he proceed dethto speake of that discretion which is requisite for the runging and bringing into order of flanderers and enemies; and withall, with what manner of affaires a politician should buse and imploy himselfe, and whereto his first and mind is to tend; wishing above all, that he should intertein the amity of other Lords and Rulers, who are able to further and advance the publike good; and in the mean time to be wel advised that he do not go about to fave, or ruinate rather; his owne Country by forsein meant; Herenpon he discourfeth of thos: maindies whereunto Common wealths be subject, and holdren this: That if there do arife any mischiefe, it ought to be repressed, kept dome und cujedat home. Consequenty, he thewerh unto a Magistrate the manner of conversing with his companions or collegues in office : and after he had commended those who walke fingly, and goe roundly and plainely to worke, he entreth very pretily into a discourse arising from the precedents, namely at touching policy and good government, declaring wherein it doth confift: and so toucheth in a word, the duty of good subjects in a State well ruled. Which done, he returneth to his former purpose, and maketh mention of certain costs, wherein a Magistrate may accommodate and frame himselfe to his own people: also what persons leought to use and employ for asseflance in the execution of important affairs, and from what vices he is to keep himselfe pure and clean; how he engle to efferm und regard true howeur, franding upon two points: the onesthat he do striff and re-Ay upon himfelfs: the other, that he be well beloved of the people, into whom he ought to shew himfelfeliherall. To this abovefaid, there is soined a certain discretion to be as a title largest is of Admirst are to their subjects (a thing much, practised in ord time, and in these daies twinedclean against the baire) proposing all in one traine, the true and most expedite way how to gaine the hearts of men, to white in Prince war Governour shall ever attaine, unlesse he be such an one as over am hor doth describe " and reprefenting on the other filleshie ridiculous and unhappy condition of ambitious persons, and other such as thirft after fhamefull glorg, whose name serveth for neught elsebut to play with the least peties in a common-wealth! Andfor a finall conclusion, he treateth of feditions and civil wars; namely, how a good May! firate ought to curry himfelf thereiniwhat a care he should have to quench with all speed such sires and keep his sabjects in good unity and concord and boyo he should easily come thereto, which is the very closing up of the booke, enriched with notable arguments, sentences, similitudes and examples, for those especially who have the command of others, and yet are besides, to appeare before the throne of their soveraignesthe examination, triall and fearfull judgement of whom, they cannot avoid,

Fthere be any speech in the world, Sir Menemachus, unto which a man may properly apply their veries of the Poet Homer:

Of all the Greeks there is no man, Who blame these words or gainesay can; But yet forsooth you say not all, Nor come are to the finials.

Certes, it is in the case of those Philosophers, who exhort sufficiently in generall termes, to undertake the affairs of State and publike government: but they teach us not how, nor give us precepts and directions thereto; who (methinks) may well be refembled to those, who snuffe and draw out the wieke of a lampe, but they poure no oile into it. Seeing then that you have upon very good reason deliberated and resolved to meddle in the State-affairs of your countrie, and defire according to the nobility of your house and native country, from whence you are descended,

To frame your speech with seemly grace,
And deeds performe, meet for your place.

And considering that you are not yet come to that maturity of yeers, as to have seen evidently. thelie of a wife man and true Philosopher in matters of government, or view'd his carriage and demeanour in State-affairs; ne yet to be a spectator of worthy and goodly examples practiled in deed and effect, and not dif, oursed upon in word onely; in which regards you have requested me earneft.y to give unto you certaine rules, precepts, and advertisements for your better knowledge and instruction, how you ought to behave your selfe in this behalfe; me thought I could not with any honesty deny your request: but my desire and wish rather is, that whattoever I have collecled to this purpose, may be answerable both to the ardent zeal of your intention, and also to the willing forwardnesse of mine affection; and verily to gratifie your minde, I have accompanied these precepts with many faire and beautifull examples.

First and formost therefore, let this be laid for a fure ground and strong foundation, That whoseever mindeth to be a States-man, and to mannage affairs of policy, bring with him a good intent, moved by reason and judgement, and in no wise arising upon any blind passion, or desire of vaineglory, or jealousie and emulation of another, or finally upon default of other occupations : for like as there be some who spend most of their time in the common hall or market place, although they have nothing there to do, because they have no good thing at home to be emploied about; even so, you shall have diversmen that thrust themselves into civill and publike affaires, for that they have no private businesse of their owne, worth tending, and so they use policy as a course of life, or rather patitine and recreation. Others there be againe, who being, by some fortune or chance arrived, or rather cast upon the management of Commonweale, and having thereof enough and (as it were) their bellies full, cannot with any ease withdraw and retire them elves, when they are once in, resembling those for all the world, who being embarked in some vessell, take the sea, only to be rocked and shaken therein a little for their exercise; but after they be carried by a gale of winde into the deep, when their heads once begin to turn, and their stomacks fick and ready to cast, they look out back toward the land, but for all that, forced they be to tarry still on shipboord, and to frame themselves to their present fortune.

Their lovely joies and pleasures are then gones To walke upon the hatches gaily dight, Withrowers feats in foilt or gallion, Whiles feats calme and weather faire and light:
Which yields prospect most pleasant to their fight,
And hearts content, to cut the waves aright.

And these are they, who as much as any, or rather most of all, discredit the thing, in that they repent and be much discontented with their choise; namely, when in stead of glory which they promifed themselves, they fall into infamie, and whereas they looked to be seared of others by the means, of their great credit and authority, they be carried into a world of affaires full of croubles and dangers. But he who commeth to the government of weale publike, and beginneth to enter upon it by found judgement and true discourse of reason, as a most honest vocation in it selfe, and most agreeable to his estate and quality, will no whit be discouraged or dismaied at any of these accidents, nor ever change his resolution. For a man is not to take upon him the mannagement of State-affairs, with intent to negotiate and traffick there, or to make a gainefull trade and occupation thereof to himselfe-like as in times past at Athens, Stratocles and Dromoclidas, with those about them, for to go unto their golden harvest (for so by way of jest and merry speech they called the Tribunall seat, and publike pulpit where orations were made unto the people) no nor upon any fit of a sudden passion that commeth upon him, as Cajus Gracehus did at Rome formetime, who at the very time when his brothers troubles were hot, and his death fresh and new, retired for a while out of the way, and betook himselfe to aprivate course of life, farre remote from the Commonwealth affaires; but afterwards, being juddenly enkindled and enflamed againe with choler, upon certaine outracious dealings and opprobrious words given him by some, would needs in all the hast upon a spieen, rush into the government of State, and quickly had his hands till of businesses, and his ambitious humour was foon fed and latisfied: but then when as he would with all his heart have withdrawne himselfe, changed his life, and taken his repote, he could not by any means lay downe his authority and puissance (to such greatnesse it was growne) but was killed before he could bring that about. As for these who compasse and dresse themselves as players forto act upon the scassold in some great Theater, and champions to contend with other concurrents, or else aime at vaineglory; it cannot be but they mult needs repent of that which they have done, especially when they once see that they must serve those whom they thought they were worthy to rule, or that they cannot chuse but displease them, whom they were debrous to gratifie and content. And verily this is my conceit of fuch, that they run headlong upon policy and State matters, like unto those who by fome misadventure, and sooner then they looked for, be fallen into a pit; for it cannot otherwise be, but they be wonderously disquieted, seeing the depth, thereos, and wish they had never comethere, but were out againe, whereas they, who confiderately, and upon good deliberation go down into the faid pit, carry themselves soberly with quietnesse and contentment of spirit, they are vexed, offended and difmaied at nothing, as who at their first entry, put on a resolute minde, proposing unto themselves vertue and their duty only, and intending no other thing for to be the scope and end of all their actions.

Thus when as men have well grounded their choice in themselves, untill it bee so surely setled and confirmed, that unneth it hardly can be altered or changed; then they ought to bend all their wits to the confideration and knowledge of the nature of their Citizens and Subjects, whose charge they have undertaken, or at least wife of that disposition, which being compounded (as it were) of themail, appeareth most, and carrieth greatest sway among them. For at the very first and all at once, togo about a change, and to order and to reforme the nature of a whole Commonalty, were an enterprite neither easie to be effected, nor take to be practited: as being a thing that requireth long time, and great authority and power. But do they must, as wine doth in our bodies; which at the beginning is moilined (as it were) and overcome by the nature of him who drunk it, but afterwards by gentle warming his stomack, and by little and little entring into his veines, it becommeth of ilrength to affect the drinker, and make a change and alteration in him; femblably, a wife politician and governour, untill such time as he hath wonne by the confidence reposed in him, and the good reputation that he hath gotten, so much authority among the people that he is now able to rule and lead them at his pleasure, will accommodate and apply himselfe to their manners and fashions such as he findeth them, and thereby conjecture and consider their humours, untill hee know wherein they take pleasure, whereto they are inclined, and what it is, wherewith they will toonest be lead and carried away. As for example, the Athenians as they are given to be hasty and cholerick; fo they be as foon turned to pity and mercy; more willing to entertain a suspition quickly, thanto have patience, and at leiture to be informed, and take certaine knowledge of a thing; and as they be more inclined and ready to inccour base persons, and of low condition; so they love, embrace, and effeem merry words and pleasant con eits, delivered in game and laughter, more then fage and ferious fentences; they are best pleased when they heare themselves praifed, and least offended againe with those that flout and mock them; terrible they are and dread, to their very Rulers and Magistrates, and yet courteous and mild enough, even to the pardoning of their professed enemies. The nature of the Carthaginian people is farre otherwise, bitter, fell, herce, sterne and full of revenge; obsequious to their betters and superiours; churlish and imperious over their inferiours and underlings; in feare most bale and cowardly; in anger most crueil; firm and constant in their resolution, and where they have taken a pitch; hard to be moved with any sports, passimes, and jollity; and in one word rough and untractable. You should not have seen these fellowes, if Clean had requested them sitting in counsell (forasmuch as he had sacrificed unto the gods, and was minded to fealt some strangers that were his friends, and come to vifit him) to put off their assembly to another day; to arise laughing, and clapping their hands for joy; nor, if while Alcibiades was a making unto them a tolemn oration, a quaile should have ef aped from under his gowne, and gotten away, would they have run after her away to catch her and given her to him againe? nay, they would have fallen all upon him; they would have killed them both in the place as if they had contemned them, and made fools of them: confidering that the banifhed Captaine Hanno, because in the Camp and Army when he marched, he used a Lion as a sumpter horse to carrie some of his baggage; saying, that this savoured strongly of a man that affected tyranny. Neither do I think that the Thebanes could ever have contained themselves, but have opened the letters of their enemies, if they had come into their hands: like as the Athenians did who having surprized King Philips posts and carriers, would never suffer one of their letters misfive to be broke open, which had the supers ription to Queen O'ympias my wife; nor discover the love-fecrets and merry conceits paffing from an husband being abient in another Country, and writing to his wife. Neither do I think, that the Athenians on the other fide, would have endured and borne with patience the proud spirit and scornefull contempt of Epaminondas, who would not make answer to an imputation charged against him, before the body of the people of Thetes, but arose out of the Theater where the people were assembled, and thorow them all went his way, and departed into the place of publike exercises. The Lacedamonians likewise would never heaveput up the infolent behaviour and mockery of Stratocles, who having perswaded the Athenians to facrifice unto the gods, in token of thanksgiving for a victory, as if they had been conquerours, and afterwards upon the certaine newes of a defeature and overthrow received, when hee faw the people highly offended and displeased with him, demanded of them what injury he had done them, if by his meanes they had been merry and seatled three dates together?

It by his meanes they had been interly as the As for the flatterers that belong to Princes Courts, they play by their Lords and Masslers, as those sowlers doe, who carch their birds by a pipe countersetting their voices; for even so they are the sowlers doe, who carch their birds by a pipe countersetting their voices; for even so they are the sowlers and the sowlers are the sowle to winde and infinuate themselves into the favour of Kings and princes, doe relemble them for all the world, and by this device entrap and deceive them. But for a good governour of a State, it is not meet and convenient that he should imitate the nature and the manners of the people under his government; but to know them and to make use of those meanes to every particular person, by which he knoweth that he may best win and gaine them to him: for the ignorance and want of skill in this behalfe, namely, how to handle men according to their humours, bringeth with it all disorders, and is the cause of irregular enormities, as well in popular governments, as among minnions and favorites of Princes. Now after that a Ruler hath gotten authority and credit once among the people, then ought he to strive and labour, for to reforme their nature and conditions if they be faulty; then is he by little and little to lead them gently (as it were) by hand unto that which is better: for a most painefull and difficult thing it is to change and alter a multitude all at once: and to bring this about the better, he ought first to begin with himselfe, and to amend the misdemeanours and disorders in his owne life and manners, knowing that he is to live from thenceforth (as it were) in open Theater, where he may be seen and viewed on every side. Now if haply it be an hard matter for a man to free his own mind from all forts of vices at once, yet at leastwife he is to cutoff, and put away those that be most apparent and notorious to the eies of the world. For you have heard (I am fure) how Themistocles when hee minded to enter upon the mannaging of State-matters, weaned himselse from such company wherein he did nothing but drinke, dance, revell and make good cheere; and when he fell to sitting up late and watching at his booke, to fasting and studying hard, he was wont to say to his familiars, that the Trophea of Miltiades would not suffer him to sleep and take his rest. Pericles in like case altered his fashions in the whole course and manner of his life, in his person, in his sober and grave going, in his affable and courteous speech, shewing alwaies a staied and settled countenance, holding his hand ever more under his robe, and never putting it forth, and not going abroad to any place in the City but onely to the Tribunall and pulpit and publike orations, or elfe to the Councell house. For it is not an easie matter to weld and manuage a multitude of people, neither are they to becaught of every one, and taken with their fafety in the catching; but a gracious and gainefull piece of worke it were, if a man may bring it thus much about, that like unto suspicious and crafty wild beaits, they be not affrighted nor let a madding at that which they heare and fee, but gently fuffer themselves to be handled, and be apt to receive instruction; and therefore this would not in any wise be neglected, neither are such to have a small regard to their owne life and manners, but they ought to fludy and labour as much as possibly they can, that the same be without all touch and reproach: for that they who take in hand the government of publike affairs, are not to give account, nor to answer for that onely which they either say or do in publike, but they are searched narrowly into and many a curious eie there is upon them at their boord; much liftening after that which palfeth in their beds; great fifting and fearning of their marriages, and their behaviour in wedlock, and in one word, all that ever they doe privately, whether it bee in jest or in good earnest. For what need we write of Alcibiades, who being a man of action and execution, as famous and renowned a Captaine, as any one in his time, and having borne himselse alwaies invincible and inferior to none in the mannaging of the publike State, yet notwithstanding ended his daies wretchedly, by meanes of his dissolute loosenesse and outragious demeanour, in his private life and conversation at home, infomuch as he bereft his owne Country of the benefit they might have had by his other good parts, and commendable qualities, even by his intemperance and fumptuous superfluity in expence? Those of Athens found fault with Cimon, because he had a care to have good wine: and the Romans finding no other thing in Scipio to reprove, blamed him for that hee loved his bed too well: the ill-willers of Pompey the Great, having observed in him that otherwhiles he scratched his head with one finger, reproached him for it. For like as a little freckle, mole or pendant-wert in the face of man or woman, is more offensive, than black and blew marks, than scars or maimes in all the rest of the body; even so, small and lightfaults otherwise of themselves, shew great in the lives of Princes, and those who have the government of the weale-publike in their hands, and that in regard of an opinion imprinted in the minds of men touching the estate of governours and magistrates, esteeming it agreat thing, and that it ought to be pure and elect from all faults and imperfections. And therefore deserved Julius Drussus, a noble Senatour and great Ruler in Rome to be highly praised, in that when one of his workmen promised him (if he so would) to devise and contrive his house so, that whereas his neighbors overlooked him, & saw into many parts thereof, they should have no place therein exposed to their view and discovery, and that this translating and alteration thereof should cost him but five talents: Nay (quoth he) thou shalt have tentalents. and make mine hou e fo that it may be seen into on every side, to the end that all the City may both fee and know how I live; for in truth he was a grave, wife, honest and comely perionage. But peradventure it is not to necessary that a house lie so open as to be looked into on allsides: for the people have eyes to pierce and enter into the very bottome of governours manners, of their counfels, actions, and lives, which a man would thinke to be most covert and secret, and no lesse quickfighted are they in their private carriage, as in that which they see them do, and heare them speake in publike; loving iome with a kind of admiration, and hating others in disdainfull and contemptuous manner. What? will some one say, do not some Cities other whiles love to be ruled by governors, whom they know to be dissolute and disordinate in their manner of life? Yes, I believe it very well. And io for footh, we see some women, when they are with child, long many times to eate grit of stones, and they who are stomack-sick, and have a peevish appetite, desire salt-sish, and such other naughty meats; but within a while after, when the fit is once past, they reject, refuse, and loath the same; even so many States and Commonalties oftentimes upon an insolency, wantonnesse and disordinate desire, or for default of better governours, be served with those that come first, and they care not with whom notwithstanding they have them incontempt and detestation, but afterwards they are very well content when sich speeches go of them, as Plato a comicall Poet in one of his Comedies inferreth to be spoken by the people themselves:

Agyrrius elfe Ile captaine chuse anon. And againe in another place he bringerh in the people calling for a bason and a feather for to provoke vomit, faying thus:

At my tribunall feat most eminent, Her feife to me Mantile doth prefent.

A stinking head it keeps and feedeth now, A malady most foule, I do avow.

And the people of Rome, at what time as Carbo avouched a thing, and bound it by a great oath, yea, and the same with a curse and execration, if it were not so; yet for all that, all with one voice sware aloud to the contrary, and protested that they would not believe him. Also at Lacedamon, when one Demosthenes, a wicked and dissolute person, had delivered his opinion and advice, very well fitting and behovefull to the matter in queltion, the people rejected it; but the Ephori having choice one of their Ancients and honourable Councellors of Estate, willed him to speak to the same point and the like effect; which was as much as if they had taken it out of one foule and filthy vessell, and put the same into another that was faire and cleane, and all to please and content the people and multitude: so effectuall is for the government of an Estate, the assured persivation of the honesty of a perfonge, and as forcible likewise is the contrary, I write not thus to this end, that we should neglect the grace of eloquence, and the powerfull skill of well-speaking, as if all should lie upon vertue, and nothing esse, but that we are to thinke, that Rhetorical speech and brave utterance is not the thing alone which perswadeth the people, but that it is a good help, and doth co-operate in perswasion, so that we may in some fort correct and amend that sentence of Menander:

The honest life of him that speakes in place, And not his tongue, doth credit win and grace.

For life and language both ought to concur, unlesse haply one would fay, That it is the Pilot only that governeth the Thip, and not the helme; and the rideralone turneth the horse head and not the reines or bridle; semblably, that the science of policy and government of weale-publike useth manners and not eloquence, as an helme or bridle, to mannage, direct and governe a whole City, which is (according to Plato) a creature (as one would fay) most easie to be turned so that it be conducted and guided, as it were, in the poope: for feeing that those great Kings, the fons of Jupiter (as Homer calleth them) let out and puffe up their magnificent port, with long tobes of purple, with icepters in their hands, with a guard of squires and pensioners about their perions, with whom they were environed on every side, yea, and with the oracles of the gods in their favour, subjecting unto their obeilance (by this outward venerable shew) the common fort, and imprinting an opinion that they are in greater state than men; and yet for all this, were desirous to learne how to speake wilely, and not carelesse and negligent to win grace by good speech, not recommending themselves to Jupiter only the Councellor, nor to bloudy Mars and warlike Minerva, but invocating likewise the Muse Calliope, with her perfivafive grace and vertue dulcing and appealing the violent mood and fierceneffe of the people. Seeing (I say) that mighty Princes be furnished with so many helps and meanes; is it posfible that a private person, with a simple robe and popular habit, taking upon him to wield and rule a whole City or State, should ever be able to effect his purpose, namely, to tame and range into order an unruly multitude, unlesse he have eloquence to aide him in this businesse, for to persiwade and bring them to the bent of his bow? For mine own part, I thinke no. As for the Masters and Captaines of galleys and other ships, they have other officers under them, as their boat-swaines, to give knowledge what they would have to be done; but a good governour of State ought to have within himselie the skill and knowledge of the steeres-manto sit at sterne and guide the helme, and besides that, good speech also to make known his will and pleasure, to the end that he need not at all the voice of another, nor to be forced to say as sphiroraes did when he was overcome and brade out by the eloquent words of Arisophon: My advertaires player acteth better than mine, but surely my play is much better than theirs: and that he have not need often times to have in his mouth these verse of Enripide:

And eloquence, whereby more perfect they In warlike feats might be another day.

Would God the feed and race of mortal men Were speechlesse cleanesor could not speake words ten.

As also of these:

Oh God, that mens affaires and caufes all Required no words, and for no fieech did call, That Orators, whose tongues do plead so hard, Were not employed, nor in so good regard.

For these sentences perhaps might give leave to some Akramenes, Nesiots, and Ictines, or such manner of people, who live by their handy-worke, get their living by the swear of their brows, and are past all hope to attaine unto any perfection of eloquence, to slie therefro: as it is reported of two Architects or great Masons at Athens sometimes, who came in question for their skill, whether of the twaine was more sufficient to make a great fabricke and publike piece of work; the one, who could loeake very well and expressed his mind with variety and elegancy of words, pronounced a premeditate oration as touching the frame and building thereof; which he did so well, that he moved the whole assembly the therewith; the other, who was more skilfoll in Architecture, and the better work man by far but one that could not deliver his mind so eloquently, when he came before the people, said no more but thus: My Masters of Athems, that which this man here hath said, I will do, And verily such good sellows as these, acknowledge no other goddesse or patronesse than Minerva the Arizan, surround Argane, and who as Sophoeles saith:

Upon the massive anvile tame, With weighty strokes of hammer strong, A livelesse bar of iron, and frame Obeisant to their sabours long.

But the Minister or Prophet to Minerva Polisis, that is to say, the protectresse of Cities, and to Themis or Justice the Protectresse of counsell:

Who of mens counsels president, Dissolves, or holds them resident.

He (Isay) having but one inftrument to use and occupie, which is his speech, by forming and fashioning some things to his own mould, and others which he finderh untoward and not pliable to the design of his worke (as if they were knurs and knots in timber, or flawes and rungs in iron) by softning, polithing, and making plaine and fmooth, embellisheth in the end a whole City. Bythis meanes the Common-wealth of Periotes, in name and outward appearance being popular, was in truth and effect a principality and regall State, governed by one man the principall person of the City: and what was it that did the deed? Surely the force and power of his eloquence: for at the fame time there lived Cimon, a good man, Ephialter also and Thurdides, who being one day demanded by Archidamus the King of the Lacedamonians, whether he or Pericles wrestled better: That were (quoth he) very hard to say; for when in wrestling I beare him down to the ground, he is by his words able to perswade the standers-by and beholders, that he is not fallen, and so goeth cleare away with it. And verily, this gift of his brought not only to him honour and glory, but also safety to the whole Ciry; which being by him ruled and perswaded, preserved, and maintained full well the wealth and estate which it had of her own, and torbare to desire the conquest of any other; whereas poore Nicias, although he had the same good meaning and intention, yet because he wanted that perswasive faculty with his smooth tongue and eloquent speech, like unto a gentle bit, when he went about to bridle and restraine the covetous desire of the people, could not compasse it, but maugre and in spight of hisheart was overswaied, carried away, and haled by the very necke into Sicily; such was the violence of the people. An old saying it is, and a true proverbe: That it is not good holding of a wolfe by the eares; but furely of a City or State, a man must principally take hold by the eares; and not as fome do, who are not sussicintly exercised, nor well seen in the seate of eloquence, search other absurd and soolish handles to catch hold by, for to winne and draw the people unto them; for divers you shall have, who thinke to draw and lead the multitude by the belly, in making great feafts and banqueting them; others by the purse, in giving them largestees of filter; some by the eye, in exhibiting unto them goodly sights of plaies, games, warlike dances and combates of seners at the utterance; which devices are not to draw and lead to the company of the and lead the people gently, but to catch them rather cunningly: for the drawing or leading of a multitude, is properly to perswade them by force of eloquence; whereas the other allurements and enticements relemble very well the baits that are laid for to take brute and wild beafts, or the fodder that herd-men ule to feed them with. Since then it is fo, that the chiefe instrument of awise and sagegovernour, is his speech, this principall care would be had, that the same be nor too much painted and set out, as if he were some young gallant that defired to shew his eloquence in a Theater and frequent assembly of a great faire or market, composing his oration as a chaplet of flowers with the most beautifull, sweet, and pleasant phrases or termes that he can chief; neither ought the same to be so painfully studied and premeditated as that oration of Demosshers was, which Pytheas faid (by way of reproach) that it imelled of lampe-oyle; nor full of over-much iophisticall curiosity of enthymemes and arguments too witty and subtile; nor yet with clauses and periods exactly measured to the rule and compasse. But like as Musicians are deficious that in touching and stroke of their strings there should appeare a sweet and kind affection, and not a rude beating: even so in the speech of a lage Ruler, whether it be in giving counsell or decreeing any thing, there onght not to be seen the artificiall cunning of an Oratour, nor any curious affectation: neither must it in any wife tend to his own praise, as if he had spoken learnedly, formally, subtilly, wittily, and with precise respect and distinctions: let it be full rather of naturall affection without art, of true heart and magnanimity, of franke and fatherly remonstrance, as may become the father of his countrey; full of forecast and providence, of a good mind and understanding, carefull of the common-weater having together with honest and comely dignity a lovely grace that is attractive, confishing of grave termes, pertinent reasons, and proper sentences, and the same significant and periwasive. For intruth the oration and stile of a States-man and governour admitteth in comparison of a lawyer or advocate pleading at the bar in court, more sententious speeches, histories, sables, and metaphors, which do then move and affect the multitude most, when the speaker knoweth how to use them with meafure, in time and place convenient; like as he did, who faid, My masters, see that you make not Greece one-eyed: (peaking of the City of Athens, when they were about to defroy it) and according as Demades also did, when he said, that he sate at sterne to governe, not a ship, but the shipwrack of a City and common wealth: Semblably Archdochus in saying,

Let not the stone of Tantalus This Isle alwaies hang over thus.

Likewise Pericles when he gave advice, and commanded to take away that eye-fore of the havein Pirran, meaning thereby the little Isle Egina. In the same manner Piccion speaking of the victory achieved by General Leophenes, said thus: The stadium or short race of this was is good, but steare (quoth he) the dolichus thereof; that is to say, the after-claps and length thereof. In sum, a speech standing somewhat of hautinesse, sravity, and greatnesse, is more bestitus a governour of State: and for example hereof, go no further than to the orations of Demosthenes penned against King Philip; and among other speeches, set down by I bucyhides, that which was delivered by the Ephorus Sthenestain: also that of King Archidamus, in the City Platae: likewise the oration of Pericles after that great petilenceat Athens. As for those long setmons, carrying a great traine of senences and continued periods after them, which Theopompus, Ephorus, and Anaximent, bring in to be pronounced by captaines unto their souldiers when they be armed and stand arranged in battell-lay; a man may say of such as the Poet did:

What fooles would speake thus many words, So neare to edge and dint of swords,

Over and befides; true it is that a man of government may otherwhiles give a taunt and nipping scoffe, he may cast out also a merry jest to move laughter, and namely, if it be to rebuke, chastile, year and to quippe one and take him up for his good, after a modest manner, and not to touch him too neere, and wound him in honour and credit to his difgrace, with a kind of scurrility. But above all It may be seeme him thus to do when he is provoked, thereunto, and is driven to reply and give one for another by way of exchange: for to begin first in that fort, and to come prepared with such premeditatestuffe, is more befitting a pleasant or common jester, who would make the company laugh, befides that, it carrieth also an opinion of a malicious and spitefull mind: and such are the bitting frumpes and broad jests of Cicero and Cato the elder; likewise of one Euxithens a familiar and disciple of Aristotle; for these many times began first to scoffe and taunt; but when a man never doth it but by way of reply or rejoynder, the sudden occasion giveth him pardon to be revenged, and withall such requitals carry the greater grace with them. Thus dealt Demosthenes by one who was deeply suspected to be a theefe: for when he would seeme to twit Demosthenes by his watching and fitting up all night at his booke for to endite and write: I wot well (quoth Demosthenes) that I trouble and hinder thee very much with keeping my candle or lampe burning all night long. Also when he answered Demades, who cried our aloud: Demosthenes would correct me (as much to say for sooth) as if according to the common proverbe, the sow should teach Minerva: Minerva (quoth he, taking that word out of his mouth) what is that you lay? Minerva was surprized not long fince in adultery. Semblably it was with no ill grace that Xenetus answered his countrey-men and fellow citizens, who cast in his teeth and upbraided him, for that being their leader and captaine he fled out of the field: With you (quoth he) my loving and deare friends, I ran away for company. But great regard and heed would be taken, that in this kind he overpasse not himleste, norgo beyond the bonds of mediocrity in such ridiculous jests, for feate that either he offend and displease the hearers unseasonably, or debase and abject himselfe too grossy, by giving out fuch ridiculous speeches: which was the fault of one Democrates, who mounting one day up into the pulpit or publike place of audience, faid openly to the people there affembled; That him-felfe was like unto their City, for that he had fmall force, and yet was puft up with much wind, Another time also, and namely, when the great field was lost before Charenes, he presented himselfe to ther time and properly the feather than the people in this manner: I would not for any thing that the common-wealth were driven to fuch calamitie and io hard an exigent, that you should have patience to heare mie, and need to take counfellat my hands: for as in the one he shewed himselfe a base and vile person, so in the other he played the brain-fick foole and senselesse affe: but for a man of State, neither is the one nor the other decent and agreeable. Furthermore, Phocion is had in admiration for his brevity of fipeeth, infomuch as Polyeuthun giving his judgement of him, faid, Demosfibeness indeed is the greatest Oratour, and the most famous Rhetorician, but Phocion, beleeve me, is the best speaker; for that his pithy speech was so couched, that in sew words it contained much substance and good matter. And even Demost benes himselfe, howsoever he made no reckoning of all other Oratours in his time, yet if Phocion role up to deliver a speech after him, would say: Lo here standeth up now the harchet or pruning knife of my words. Well then, endeavour you as much as possibly you can, when you are to make a speech before the multitude to speak considerately and with great circumwhich you are the mark a peter words to, as they may tend to lafety and fecurity, and not in any cafe to the vain and frivolous language: knowing well that Perioles himfelf, that great governour, was wont to make his prayer unto the gods before he entred into his oration in publike audience: That he might letfall no word out of his mouth impertinent to the matter which he was to handle; and yet for all this, you must be well exercised neverthelesse, and practised in the knowledge how to be able to answer and replie readily; for many occasions passe in a moment, and bring with them as many sudden cases and occurrences, especially in matters of government. In which regard, Demost hence was (by report) reputed inferior to many others in his time, for that other whiles he would withdraw himselfe and not be seene when occasion was offered, if he had not well premeditated and studied aforehand of that which he had to fay, Theophrafiu also writeth of Alcibiades, that being defirous to speake, not only that which was convenient, but also in manner and forme as it was meet; many a time in the midst of his oration would make a stay, and be at a non plus, whiles he sought and studied for some proper termes, and laboured to couch and compose them fitting for his purpose: but he who taketh occasion to stand up for to make a speech of sudden occurrences, and respective to the occasions and times presented unto him, such a one I say of all others doth most move and assonish a multitude. He, I say, is able to lead them as he list and dispose of them at his pleasure. After this manner plaied Leon the Bizantine, who was fent upon a time from those of Constantinople unto the Athenians, being at civill debate and diffention among themselves, for to make remonstrances unto them of pacification and agreement : for a very little man was he of stature, and when the people law him mounted up into the place of audience, every one began to reigh, tittre, and laugh at him; which he perceiving well enough: And what would you do and say then (quoth he) if you faw my wife, whose crown of her head will hardly reach up so high as myknee? At which word they took up a greater sit of laughter than before throughout the whole assembly: And yet (quoth he againe) as little as we both be, if we chance to be at variance and debate one with another, the whole City of Constantinople is not big enough for us, nor able to hold us twaine. Pytheas likewise, the Orator, at what time as he spake against the honours which were decreed for King Alexander, when one said unto him: How now sir, dare you presume to speake of so great matters, being as you are, so young a man? And why not (quoth he) for Alexander whom you made a god among you by your decrees, is younger than my felle.

Furthermore, over and befides a ready tongue and well exercised, he ought to bring with him a strong voice, a good breast, and a long breath, to this combate of State government; which I assure you is not lightly to be accounted of, but wherein the champion is to be provided for all feats of masteries or fight; for searcleast if it chance that his voice faile or be weary and faint, he be overcome and supplanted by some one,

Catchpoll, Crier, and of that ranke,

Wide-mouth's Juster or mount-banke.

And yet Caso the younger, when he suspected that either the Senate or the people were forestalled by graces, labouring for voices, and such like prevention, so as he had no hope to perswade and compasse such matters as he went about, would rise up and hold them all a day long with an oration; which he did to drive away the time, that at least wife upon such a day there should be nothing done or passe against his mind. But as touching the speech of a governour, how powerfull and effectuall it is, and how it ought to be prepared, we have this already fufficiently treated, especially for such an one as is able of himselse to devise all the rest, which consequently solloweth here-

Moreover two avennes (as it were) or waies there be to come unto the credit of government; the one short and compendious, yeelding an honourable course to win glory and reputation; but it is not without some danger; the other longer and more bale and obscure, howbeit al waies safe and fure. For some there be, who making faile and serting their course (as a man would say) from some high rock situate in the maine sea, have ventured at the first upon some great and worthy enterprise, which required valour and hardinesse, and so at the very beginning entred into the midst of Stateaffaires, supposing that the Poet Pindarus laid true in these his verses:

A worthy worke who will begin, Must when he enters first therein, Set out agay fore-front to view Which may far off the lustre shew;

For certainly the multitude and common fort being fatisfied and full already of those governours whom they have been used to a long time, receive more willingly all beginners and new-commers, much like as the spectatours and beholders of plaies or games have better affection a great deale to iee a new champion entring fresh into the lists. And verily all those honours, dignities, and powerfull authorities which have a sudden beginning and glorious encrease, do ordinarily astonish and daunt all envy: for neither doth the fire (as Ariston faith) make a smoake which is quickly kindled, and made to burne out of a light flame; nor glory breed envy when it is gotten at once and speedily; but fuch as grow up by little and little, at leilure, those be they that are caught therewith, some one way and some another. And this is the cause that before they come to flower (as it were) and grow to any credit of government, fade and become dead and withered about the publike place of audience, But whereas it falleth out according to the Epigram of the currier or runner Ladas,

No sooner came the sound of whip to care, But he was at the end of his careare, And then withall, in one and selfe-same trice He crowned was with laurell for his price.

that some one hath at first performed an embassage honourably, rode intriumph gloriously, or conducted anarmy valiantly, neither envious persons nor spightfull ill-willers have like power against such as against others. Thus came Aram into credit the very first day, for that he had defeated and overthrown the tyrant Nicocles. Thus Alcibiades won the spurs, when he practised and wrought the alliance between the Mantineans and the Athenians against the Lacedamonians. And when Pompey the great would have entred the City of Rome in triumph, before he had shewed himselfe unto the Senate, and was withstood by Sylla, who meant to impeach him, hestick not to say unto him, More men there be fir, who worthip the Sun rifing, than the Sun fetting; which when Sylla heard, he gave place and yeelded unto him without one word replying to the contrary. And when as the people of Rome chose and declared Cornelius Scipio Contull all on a sudden, and that against the ordinary course of law, when as himselfe stood only to the Ædile, it was upon some vulgar beginning and ordinary entrance into affaires of state, but for the great admiration they had of his rare and singular prowesse, in that being but a very youth, he had maintained single sight and combate hand to hand with his enemy in Spaine, and vanquished him; yea, and within a while after, in the neck of it had atchieved many worthy exploits against the Carthaginians, being but a military Tribune or Colonell of a thousand foor: for which brave acts and services of his, Cato the elder as hereturned out of the campe cried out with a loud voice of him:

Right wife and fage indeed alone is he, The rest to him but slitting shadows be.

But now fir, seeing that the Cities and States of Greece are brought to such termes, that they have no more armies to conduct, nor tyrants to be put down, nor yet alliances to be treated and made, what noble and brave enterprite would you have a young gentleman performe at his beginning and entrance into government? Mary, there are left for him publike causes to plead, ambassages to negotiate unto the Emperour, or tome foveraigne potentate; which occasions do ordinarily require a man of action hardy and ardent at the first enterprise, wise and wary in the finall execution. Besides, there be many good and honest customes of ancient time, either for-let or grown out of kind by negligence, which may be set on foot, renewed, and reformed againe : many abuses also by ill cuiflome are crept into Cities, where they have taken deep root, and been let led to the great dishonour and damage of the Common-wealth: which may be redefled by his meanes. It falled not many times, that a great controverse judged and decided aright; the triall likewise and proofe of faithfull trust and diligence in a poore mans cause maintained and defended frankly and boldly against the oppression of some great and mighty adversary; also a plaine and stout speech delivered in the behalfe of right and justice, against some grand Seignior who is unjust and injurious, have afforded honourable entries unto the management of State-affaires. And many there be, who have put forth themselves, made their parts known, and come up, by entertaining quarrels and enmities with those personages, whose authority was odious, envied, and terrible to the people: for we alwaies see that presently the pussiance and power of him that is put down and overthrown, doth accrue unto him who had the upper hand, with greater reputation: which I speake not as if I did approve and thought it good for one to oppose himselfe by way of envy unto a min of honour and good respect, and who by his vertue holdern the chiefe place of credit in his countrey, thereby to undermine his estate, like as Simmias dealt by Pericles, Alemaon by Themistocles, Clodins by Pompeius, and Meneclides the Oratour by Epaminondas; for this course is neither good nor honourable, and befides, lefte gainefull and profitable: for tay that the people in a fudden fit of furious choier commit some outrage and abuse upon a man of worth; afterwards, when they repent at leifure (being coole) that which they did hastily in their hear of bloud, they thinke there is no readier nor juster means to excuse themselves to him, than to deface, yea, and undo the said party who first moved and induced them to those proceedings. And verily, to setupon a wicked person, who either by his audacious and inconfiderate rashnesse, or by his fine and cantelous devices hath gotten the head over a whole City, or brought a State to his devotion, fuch as were in old time Cleon and Clitophon at Athens; to let upon those (I say) for to bring them under, yea, and utterly to deliroy them out of the way, were a notable preamble (as it were) to the Comedy for him that is mounted upon the stage of a Common-wealth, and newly entred into the government thereof. I am not ignorant likewife, that fome by clipping the wings, or paring the nailes (as a man would fay) of an imperious Senate and Lordly Seigniory, taking upon them too much, and tyraunizing by vertue of their absolute soveraignty, which was the practice of one Ephialtes at Athens; and another in the City Elis, whose name was Phormio, have acquired honour and reputation in their countrey: but I hold this to be a dangerous beginning for to be enterprised by them that would come to the managing of State-affaires. And it feemeth that Solon made choise of a better entrance than fo for the City of Athens being divided into three parts or regions; the first, of those that did inhabit the hill; the second, of them who dwelt upon the plaine; and the third, of such as kept by the water-fide; he would not feem to fide with any one of these three parts, but carried himself indifferent unto them all, faying and doing what he could to reconcile and re-unite them together: by which meanes chosen he was, by the generall consent of them all, the Lord Reformer, to draw new laws and conditions of pacification among them; and by this practice he established and confirmed the State of Athens. Thus you fee how a man may enter into the government of the Commonwealth by honourable and glorious commencements: and this may suffice for the former avenue of the twaine aforesaid unto the affaires of State.

As for the other way, which as it giveth more fure accesse, so it is not so expedite and short; there have been many notable men who in old time made choice thereof, and loved it better : and by name, Arifides, Phocion, Pammenes the Theban, Lucullus in Rome, Cato and Agefilaus at Lacedamon: for like as the Ivy windeth about trees stronger than it selfe, and riseth up alost together with them ; even to each one of these before-named, being yet young novices and unknown, joyning and coupling themselves with other ancient personages who were already in credit by rising leisurely under the wing and shadow of others, and growing with them, grounded themselves and tookegood rootagainst the time that they undertook the government of State. Thus Clisthenes tailed Aristides; Chabrias advanced Phocion; by Sylla Lucyllus role; Cato by Fab. Maximus; Epaminondas came up by Pammenes; and Agestlaus by Lylander; but this man named last, upon acertaine inordinate ambition and importune jealousie did wrong unto his own reputation, by casting and rejecting behind him a worthy personage, who guided and directed him in all his actions: but all the rest wisely and honefly reverenced, acknowledged, yea, and aided with all their power, even to the very end, the authors of their rifing and advancement; much like unto those bodies which are opposed full against the fun, in returning and lending back the light that thineth upon them, do augment and illustrate the same so much the more. Thus when evillrongued persons, who envied and maligned the glory o Scipio. gave out that he was but the player and actor only of those worthy feats of armes which hef executed; for the author thereof was Lalius his familiar friend; yet Lalius for all these speeches was never moved nor altered in his purpose, but continued still the same man to promote and second the glory and vertue of Scipio. As for Afranius the friend of Pompeius, notwithstanding he was but of base and low degree, yet being upon termes to be chosen Consull, when he understood that Pompeisu favoured others, gave over his sute, and let fall the possibility that he had; saying withall: That it would not be so honourable unto him for to be promoted unto that dignity of Consulate, as grievous and troublesome, to obtain the same against the good-will, and without the sayour and affistance of Pompeius; and so in deferring and putting off the matter but one yeare longer, he had northe repulse when the time came, and therewith he kept his friend still, and enjoyed his favour, And by this means it commeth to passe, that those who are thusled by the hand of others, and trained to the way of preferment and glory in gratifying one do gratific many withall; and befides, if any inconvenience chance to enfue, the lefte odious they be and hatefull for it: which was the reason that Philip King of Macedonie earnestly exhorted and admonished his son Alexander, that he should provide himselse of many friends and servitors whiles he might, and had leisure, even during the reign of another, namely, by converfing and conferring graciously with every one, and by cheerful behaviour and affability to all, for to win their love and favour; but when he was once invested in the kingdome, to chuse for his guide and conductor in the managing of State-affaires, not simply him who is of most credit and greatest reputation, but rather the man who is such an one by his defert and vertue; for like as every tree will not admit a vine to wind about the trunke and body thereof; for somethere be that do choake and utterly mar the growth of it; even so in the government of Cities and States, those who are not truly honest and lovers of vertue, but ambitious and desirous of honour and soveraignty only, afford not unto young men the means and occasions of worthy enterprises and noble acts, but upon envy and jealousie hold them under and put them back as far as they can, and thus make them to consume and languish, as if they detained from them their glory, and cut them short of that which is their only food and nourishment. Thus did Marius in Africk first, and afterwards in Galatia by Sylla, by whose meanes he had performed much good service; and in the end would not use him at all, but cast him off; for that in truth, he was vexed at the heart to see him grow up as he did, and to winne to great reputation under him, howloever he would have feemed to colourthe matter, and make the fignet in the colet of his Ring which he fealed withall, the pretence and cloake thereof. For Sylla being Treasurer in Africk, under Marius the Lord Generall, was sent by him unto King Bocchus, and brought with him Jugartha prisoner; and being a young gentleman as he was, and beginning to talte the sweetnesse of glory; he could not carry himselfe modelly in this good fortune of his, but must needs weare upon his finger a faire Seale Ring, wherein he caused to be engraven the history of this exploit, and namely, how Bocchus delivered into his hands Jugartha prisoner: hereat Marius tooke exceptions, laid this to his charge, and made it a colourable occasion of rejecting and putting him out of his place: but he joyning himselfe with Catulus and Metellus, good men both, and the advertaries of Maries, soone after chased Marins, and turned him out of all in a civill war, which was well neare the ruine and overthrow of the Roman Empire. Sylla dealt not so with Pompeins; for he evermore advanced and graced him from his very youth, he would arise out of his chaire, and vaile bonnet unto him when he came in place: femblably he carried himselfe roward other young gentlemen and gallants of Rome. imparting unto some the meanes of doing the exploits of captaines and commanders: yea, quickning and putting others forward who were unwilling of themselves; and in so doing he filled all his Armies with zeale, emulation, and defire of honour, striving who should do better, and by this meanes became himielle superiour evermore, and ruled all ; at length desirous to be not the only man, but the first and the greatest among many that were likewise great. These be the mentherefore with whom a young States man ought to joyne; to thele he ought to cleave, and in them, as it we're, to be incorporate: not as that Cockattice or Bafiliske in £/op/fables; who being carried alloft bh the Moulders of the Eagle, no fooner came neare to the fun beames, But fuddenly tooke his flight. and came to the place before the Eagle: and after that manner to rob them of their honour, and fecreely to catch their glory from them; but contrariwise to receive it of them with their consent and good favour, and to give them to understand that they had never known how to rule unlesse they had learned first of them to obey well, as Plate faith.

Next after this followeth the election and choise that they ought to make of their friends : In which point they are not to. take example either by Themifocies or Clean: As for Cleany, whethe heavy that he wasto undertake the government upon him, affembled all his friends rogether, and declared unto them that he renounced all their amity, faying; That friendship was oftentimes a eause that disabled men, and withdrew them from their right intention in affaires of State; but it had been far better done of him to have exiled and chased out of his mind all avarice and contentions humours, to have cleaned his heart from envy and malice: for the government of Cities hath not need of those who are friendlesse and destitute of familiar companions, but of such as be wise and honest: but when he had banished and put away his friends, he entertained round about him'a forg of flatterers, who daily stroaked and licked him, as the comicall Poets use to say, He became rough and severe to good and civill men, but instead thereof he debased himselfe to court, flatter, and please the multitude, doing and laying all things to content them, and taking rewards at every mans hand, combining and forting himselfe with the world and most lewed people in the whole City, by their meanes to make head, and fer against the best and most honourable persons. Themistacles yet tooke another courie, who when one faid unto him; You shall do the part of a good Ruler and Magilirate, in case you make your selfe equal unto every one alike; answered thus, I pray God I may never fit in such a throne or seat, wherein my friends may not prevaile more with me, than they that are not my friends. But herein he did not well, no more than the other, thus to promise any part and authority of his government unto those with whom he had amity, and to jubmit the publike affaires unto his private and particular affections: howbeit, for all this heapswered very well, unto Simonides, requesting somewhat at his hand that was not just : Neither were he. a good Mufician or Poet, (quoth he) who should sing against measures: nor the Magistrate righteous who in favour of any perion doth ought against the laws. For in truth a shamefull thing it were, and a great indignity; that in a ship the master or owner thereof should give order to be provided of a good Pilot and Steresman; that the Pilot also should chuse good boat-swaines and other Mariners.

And hoife up faile above, when winds do blow.

Also that an architect or master-builder, knoweth how to chuse those workemen and labourers under him, who will in no case hur his worke, but see it found take paines with him for his best behoofe: and a States—man or governour, who as Pindarus saith well,

Notknow at the very first to chuse friends of the same zeale and affection that he is himselfe, to see could and affist him in his enterprises, and to be as it were the spirits to inspire him with adesire of well-doing; but to suffer himselfer to be bent and made pliable unjustly and violently; now to gratistie the will of one; and anon, to serve the turne and appetite of another: For such a manifest her properly a carpenter or mason, who by errour, ignorance, and want of experience, useth his squares, his plumbs, levels and rules so, that they make his worke to rise trooked and out of square in the end. For certainly friends be the very lively tooles, and sensible instruments of governours; and in case they do amisse and worke without the right line, the Rulers themselves are not onlip and go arry with them for company, but to have a carefull eye unto this, that unwriting to them they do not erre and commit a fault. For this it was that wrought Solon dishonour, and caused him to be ruproached and accused by his own Citizens, for that having an intention to ease mens give ous debts, and to bring in that which at Ashem they called Sisachina, as if one would say, an area siation of some heavy burden, which was a pleasing and planshole name, importing a general littiking out of a lebts, and a cancelling of bonds; he imparted this designe and purpote of his to some of his 'riends, who did him a threwd curne, and most unjustly wrough thim much mitchiefe; for upon this inkling given unto them, they made haste to take up and borrow all the money they could, as far as their credit would extend: not long after when this edict or proclamation aforefaid concerning the annulling of all debts was come forth and brought to light; these friends of his were found to have purchased goodly houses, and faire lands, with the monies which they had levied. Thus Salon was charged with the imputation of doing this wrong, together with them, when as himselfe indeed was wronged and abused by them. Agesiams also shewed himselse in the occasions and sittees of his friends most weakeand seeble minded, more iwis than in any thing else, reiembling the horse Pegasu in Euripides.

And helping his familiar friends in all their diffresses more affectionately and willingly than was meet and reason for whensoever they were called into question in justice for any transgressions, he would feeme to be privy and party with them in the same. Thus he faved one Pha idas who was accuted to have surprised secretly the Castle of Thebes called Cadmia, without commission and warrant, alledging in his defence, that such enterprises outgh to be executed by his own proper motive without attending any other commandement. Moreover, he wrought to with his countenance and favour that one Sphodrias, who was attaint for an unlawfull and heinous act, and namely, forentring by force and armes with a power into the countrey of Attica, what time as the Athenians were allied and confederate in amity with the Lacedamonians, escaped judgement, and was sound unguilty; which he did, being wrought thereto and mollified (as it were) by the amorous prayers of his ion. Likewise there is a missive of his found, and goeth abroad to be seen, which he wrote unto a certaine great Lord or Potentate in theletermes: If Nicias have not trespassed, deliver him for itstice take; if he have transgressed, deliver him for my Take; but howsoever it be, deliver him and let him go. But Phocion contrariwile would not to much as affift in judgement Charillus his own fon in law, who had married his daughter, when he was called into question and indited for corruption and taking money of Harpalis, but left him and departed, faying: In all causes just and reafonable I have made you my allie, and will embrace your affinity; in other cases you shall pardon me. Timoleon also the Corinthian, after that he dealt what possibly he could with his brother by remonstrance, by prayers and intreaty to reclaime and disswade him from being a tyrant; seeing that he could do no good on him, turned the edge of his fword against him, and joyned with those that murdered him in the end : for a Magistrate ought to friend a man, and stand with him not only with this gage, as far as to the altar, that is to fay, untill it come to the point of being for worne for him, according as Pericles one day answered to a friend of his, but also thus far forth only, as not to do for his take any thing contrary to the laws, against right, or prejudiciall to the common-weale: which rule being neglected and not precisely observed, is the cause that bringeth great losse and ruine to a state; as may appeare by the example of Phaebidas and Sphodrias, who being not punished according to their deferts, were not the least causes that brought upon Sparta the unfortunate war and battell at Lendra. True it is, that the office of a good ruler and administrator of the wealepublike, doth not require precisely and force us to use severity, and to punish every slight and small trespasse of our friends; but it permitteth us after we have looked to themaine chance, and secured the State, then as it were of a surplussage to succour our friends, to assist and help them in their affairs, and take part with them. Moreover, there be certaine favours which may be done without envy and offence; as namely, to fland with a friend rather than another, for the getting of a good office; to bring into his hand some honourable commission, or an easie and kind embassage, as namely, to be sent unto a Prince or Potentate in the behalfe of a City or State, only to salute him and do him honour; or to give intelligence unto another City of important matters, in regard of amity, league, and mutuall fociety; or incase there fall out some businesse of trouble, difficu ty and great importance, when a Magistrate hath taken upon himselse first the principall charge thereof, he may chuse unto him for his adjunct or affiltant in the commission some special friend, as Diomedes did in Homer:

Tochuse mine own companion,

Since that you will me let,

Ulysies that renowned knight,

How can I then forget?

Ulysies Likewise as kindly rendreth unto him the like praise againe:

These cours or is brave, concerning which

Of me you do durand,

O aged fire arrived here

Of late; from Thracian land

Are bither come, and there were bred:

Their Lord them loss in fish,

Whom valian Diomedes stew By force of arms ouright, And twelves friends more and doughty knights; As ever horfe didride, Were with him staine for company, And laydead by his stde.

This model kind of yeelding and submission to gratifie and pleasure friends, is no lesse honourable to the praifers than to the parties praifed; whereas contrariwife, arrogancy and felfe-love (as Platofaith) dwelleth with folitudes, which is as much to fay, as it is forfaken and abandoned of all the world. Furthermore, in these honest favours and kind curtesses which we may bestow upon some friends, we ought to affociate other friends besides, that they may be in lone for interested therein alfo; and to admonish those who receive such pleasures at our hands, forto praise and thanke them, yea, and to take themselves beholding unto them; as having been the cause of their preferment, and those who counselled and perswaded thereto: bit if peradventure they move us in any undecent, dishonest, and unreasonable sures, we must flatly deny them; howbeit, not after a rude, bitter, and churlish fort, but mildly and gently by way of semonttance, statid to comfort them withall, the wing unto them that such requests were not beleeming their good reputation and the of pinion of their vertue. And this could Epaminondas do of all men litthe world ben and that them off after the cleanliest manner; for when he refused arthe instant site of Pelephole, to deliver out of prifon a certaine Tavetnor, and within a while after, let the fame party go at liberty at the request of his lemmon or harlot whom he loved; he faid unto him: Pelopida, fuch graces and tavours as these we are to grant unto our paramours and concubines, and not unto such great Captaines as your felfe, But Cato after a more furly and boilterous fort in the like cale answered unto Catalina, one of his inward and most familiar friends. This Canal a being Centon, moved Chief who then was but Questour or Treasurer, that for his sake he would dismisse and fer free one of his clarkes of the Finances under him, against whom he had commenced sure and entred processe in law That were a great shame indeed (quoth he) for you, who are the Censour, that is to fay the corrector and reformer of our manners, and who ought to schoole and instruct usthat be of the younger fort, thus to be put out of your course by our under officers and ministers: for he might well enough have denied to condescend unto his request in deed and effect, without such sharpe and biring words; and namely, by giving him to understand that this displeasure that he did him in resulting to do the thing, was against his will, and that he could neither will nor chuie; being forced thereto by justice and the

Over and besides, a man in government hath good meanes with honesty and trossour to help his poore friends, that they may advantage themselves and reape benefit by him from the commonwealth. Thus did Themistocles after the battell at Marathon : for seeing one of them that lay dead in the field to have hanging at his neck, chaines, and collars, with other bracelets of gold about his armes, passed by, and would not seeme for his own part to meddle with them, but turning back took familiar friend of his, one of his followers : Here(quoth he)off with these ornaments and take them to your selfe, for you, are not yet come to be such an one as Themistocles. Moreover the affaires and occurrences daily incident in the world, do present unto a Magistrate and great Ruler such like occas fions, whereby he may be able to benefit and enrith his friends: for all men cannot be wealthy hop like to you O Menemachus. Give then unto one friend a good and just cause to plead unto and defend, which he may gaine well by and fill his purie; unto another, recommend the affaires and builtneffe of some great and rich personage, who hath need of a manthar knoweth how to manage and order the same better than himselse; for another, harken out where there is a good bargaine robb made, as namely, in the undertaking of some publike work, or help him to the taking of a good farme at a reasonable rent, whereby he may be a gainer. Epaminondas would do more than thus; for upon a time he sent one of his friends who was but poore unto a rich Burgesse of Thebes, to demand a whole talent of moneyfreely to be given unto him, and to fay, that Epaminondas commanded him to deliver so much : The Burgesse wondring at such a message, came unto Epaminondas, to know the cause why he should part with a talent of silver unto him; mary (quoth he) this is the reason; The man whom I fent is honest, but poore, and you by robbing the common-wealth are become rich. And by report of Xemphon, Agefilam took no small joy and glory in this, that he had enriched his friends, whiles himselse made no account at all of money.

But forasmuch according to the laying of Simonides, as all larkes ought to have a cop or creft upon the head; so every government of State bringeth with it enmitties, envies, and litigious jetal louses; this is a point wherein a man of estate and affaires ought to bewell enformed and instructed. To begin therefore to treat of this argument, many there be who highly praise Themisphetic and Aristides, for that whensoever they were to go out of the territory of Articas, either in emphasizes or to manage wats together; they had no sooner their charge and commission, but they presently laid downe all the quarrels and emmitte between even in the very confines and frontiers of their countrey, and afterwards when they were returned, tooke up and entertained them againe. Some also there are who be wonderfull well pleased with the practice and fashion of Cretinas the Magnetian. This Cretinas had for his concurrent an adversary in the government of State, a nobleman of the same City named Hermiss, who although he were not very rich, yet

ambitious he was, and carried a brave and haughty mind: Cretinas in the time of the war that Mithridates made for the conquest of Asia, seeing the City in danger, went unto the said Hermias, and made an offer unto him to take the charge of captain generall for the defence of the City, and in the mean while himself would go forth and retire to some other place: or otherwise, if he thought betthe state of the state of the state of the war, then he would depart out of the City into the countrey for the time, for feare left if they tarried both behind and hindered one another as they were wont to do by their ambitious minds, they should undo the state of the City: This motionliked Hermias very well, who, confessing that Cretinas was a more expert warrior than himself departed with his wife and children out of the City: Now Cretinas made means to fend him out before with a convoy, putting into his hands his own money, as being more profitable to them who were without their houles and fled abroad, than to fuch as lay befreged within the City, which being at the point to be loft, was by this means preferved beyond all hope and expectation: for if this bear at the point to be noble and generous speech proceeding from a magnanimous heart, to say thus with a lond voice:

My children well I love, but of my heart,

My natrue foile by far bath greater part.

Why (hould not they have this speech readier in their mouths, to say unto every one? I have this or that man, and willing I would be to do him a displeasure; but my native countrey I love so much the more? For not to defire to be at variance and debateftill with an enemy, in such causes as for which we ought to abandon and cast off our friend, were the part of a most fell, savage, and barbarous nature : yet did Phocion and Cato better in mine opinion, who entertained not any enmity with their Citizens in regard of difference and variance between them about bearing rule and government; but became implacable and irreconcilable only inpublike causes, when question was of abandoning or hurring the weale publike; for otherwise in private matters, they carried themselves kindly enough, without any rankor or malice even toward them, against whom they had contested in open place, as touching the flate; for we bught not to efterme or repute any citizen an enemy, unleffe fuch an one be bred amongst them as Arifion, or Nabia, or Casilina, who are to be reckoned botches rather, and pestilent maladies of a City than Citizens: for of all others if haply they be at a jar or discord, a good Magistrate ought to bring them into tune and good accord again, by gently setting up and letting down, as a skilfull Musician would do by the strings of his instrument; and not in anger to come upon those that are delinquents, roughly and after an outragious manner, even to their detriment and difgrace; but after a more mild and civill fort, as Homer speaketh in one place ? Certes, faire friend, I would have held,

That others for your wit you had exceld.

As also in another:

You know, if that you lift (iwis) To tell a better tale than this.

Yea, and when they shall either say or do that which is good and convenient, not to shew himselfe to grieve and grudge at their credit and reputation which they win thereby, nor to be spary in affording them honourable words to their commendation and advantage: for in so doing, thus much will be gained, that the blame which shall be laid upon them another time when they deserve it, will be better taken, and more credit given to it: and besides, by how much more we shall exalt their vertues, so much the more we may beat down and deptelle their vices when they do amisse, by making comparison of them both, and shewing how much the one is more worthy and beseeming than the other: for mine own part, I hold it meet and good, that a man of government should give testi-mony in the behalfe of his adversaries in righteous and just causes; also assist and help them out of troubles, in case they be brought into question by some lewd sycophants, yea, and discredit and disable the imputations charged upon them, namely, when he seeth that such matters for which they are molested, be far from their intention and meaning. Thus Nero, a cruell tyrant though he was, a little before he put Thrasem to death, whom he hated and seared most of all men in the world, notwithstanding one laied to his charge before him that he had given a wrong doome or unjust sentence : I would (quoth he) that I could be affured that Thrasea loved me so well as I am sure he is a most upright and just Judge. Neither were it amisse for the assonishing and daunting of others, who be of a naughty nature, when they do commit any grosse saults, to make mention other-whiles of some adversary of theirs, who is of a more modelt behaviour and civill carriage, by saying : fuch an one (I warr ant you) would never have faid or done thus. Moreover, it were not impertinent to put some who do offend, in mind of their fathers and ancestors, that have been good and honest, like as Homer did:

And Appins Claudius being the concurrent to Scipio Africanus, when they food both for one Magiftracy, faid unto him as he met him in the ftreet : O Paulus Emplius, how deeply wouldft thou figh for griefe and forrow, in case thou wert advertised that one Philonicus a Publicane or Banker and no better, accompanied and guarded thy fonthorow the City, going down toward the affembly of Comices for to be chosen Censor? This manner of reprehension, as it admonishes the offender, so it doth honour unto the admonisher. Neffor likewise in a Tragedy of Sophocles answereth as politickly unto Ajax, when he reproached him, faying:

I blime not you, fir Ajan, for your feech, Naught though it be ; your words are nothing lieels.

Semblably, Cata who had contested against Pompey, for that being combined and in league with The line Cafar, he affaulted and forced the City of Rome, when as afterwards they were grown to open war one against the other, opined and gave his advice to confer the charge and regiment of the common-weale upon Pompeius, saying withall: That they who would do most milithiese; were the fittest men to stay the same: for this a blame or reproofe mingled with a praise and commendations especially, if the same grow to no opprobrious termes, but be contained within the compasse of a franke and free remonitrance, working not a full fitfull flomack, but a remorte of conficience and repentance, feemeth kind and dutifull; whereas delpiteous reproaches are never feemely and decent in the mouth of a Magistrate and man of honour. Marke the opprobrious termes and rauns that Demosthenes let flie against Aschines, those also that Aschines gave him : likewise the bitter frumps which Hyperides wrote against Demades; and see if Solon ever delivered such, or if there came the like out of the mouth of Pericles, of Lycurgus the Lacedamonian, or of Pittacus the Lesbian; and as for Demosthenes, he forbare such sharpe and sutting termes otherwise, and never used them but in pleading against some criminals causes; for his orations against Philiparecleare and void of all nips, flouts, and scoffes whattoever: and intruth indemanner of dealing defameth the you of an impairment that those against whom they be spoken; they bring confusion in all affaires; they trouble affemblies both in Councel House and also in Common Halls in which regard, Phosion yeelding upon a time to one that was given to raile, brake off his oration, held his peace for a while and came down; but after, the other with much ado held his tongue and gave overhis foule language; he mounted up into the place of audience againe, and going on in his former speech which was interrupted and discontinued, said thus: Now that I have already my masters ipolici sufficiently of horlemen,men of armes, and fouldiers heavily armed at all peeces; it remaineth to discourse of light footmen, and targuetiers nimbly appointed.

But forasmuch as this is an hard matter unto many, to beare with such broad language, and to containe, and oftentimes these taunting scoffers meet with their matches, and have their mouth's stopped, and are put to silence by some pretty replies : I would wish that the same were short pithy; and delivered in very few words, not shewing any heat of anger and choler, but a kind of sweet mildnesse, after the manner of a grave laughter, yet withall somewhat tart and biting; and such ordinarily be those that are returned fitly in the same kind against them that first began: for like as those darts which are re-harged upon them that flung them first, teeme to be driven with good will, and fent back againe with great force and firme ftrength of him who was ftricken with them; even fo it seemeth that a sharpe and biting speech retorted against him who first spake it commeth forceable and with a power of wit and understanding from the party who received it! such was the reply of Epaninondas unto Callifratus, who reproached and upbraided the Thebanes and Argives with the Parricides of Occipus and Orestes, for that the one being borne in Thebes slew his own father, and the other at Argos killed his mother : true indeed quoth Epaminondas, and therefore we banished them out of our Cities but you receive them into yours, Semblable was the answer of Analoidas a Lacedamonian unto an Athenian, who said unto him after a boatting and vaunting manner: We have driven you oftentimes from the river Cephalus; but we (quoth he) never yet drave you from the river Eurotas: In like fort replied Phocion pleasantly upon Demades when he cried aloud, The Athenians will put thee to death if they enter once into their raging firs: Butthey (quoth he) will do the same by thee, if they were in their right wits: and Craffus the oratour when Domitius demanded this question of him; When the Lamprey which you kept and red in your poole was dead did you never weep for it, and say true? Came upon him quickly againe in this wife: And you fir when you had buried three of your wives one after another, did you ever fled teare for the mat-ter and tell truth? And verily these rules are not only to be practised in matters of State-affaires, but they have their use also in other parts of mans life,

Moreover, some there be who will intrude and thrust themselves into all sorts of publike affaires, as Cato did; and their are of opinion, that a good Citizen should not refuie any charge or publike administration so far forth as his power will extend: who highly commend Epaminondas; for that when his adversaries and ill wil ersupon envy had caused him to be chosen a baylife and receiver of the Citie revenues, thereby to do him a spight and shrewd turne; he did not despite and thinke baiely of the faid office; but faying, that not only Magistracy sheweth what manner of man one is, but also a man sheweth what the Magistracy is, he brought that office into great dignity and reputa-tion, which before was in no credit and account at all, as having the charge of nothing elle but of keeping the streets cleane, of dung-farming and carrying dung forth out of the narrow lares and blind allies, and turning water courses. And even I Plutarch my selfedoubt not, but I make good sport and game unto many who passe through our City, when they see me in the open streets otherwhiles busie and occupied about the like matters; but to meet with such, I might help my selfe with that which I have found written of Anishhenes; for when some there were that marvelled much at him for carrying openly in his hands through the market place a peece of falt-fish, or stock-fish which he had bought: It is for mine own selfe (quoth he aloud) that I carry it; but contrativile mine answer is to such, as reprove me when they find me in proper person present, at the measuring and counting of bricks and tiles, or to see the stones, sand, and lime laid downe.

which is brought into the City; it is notfor my felfethat I build, but for the City and Commonwealth, for many other things there be, which it a man exercise or manage in his own performandon himicife, he maybe thought base minded and mechanical; but in case he do it for the Commonwealth and the State, and for the country and place where he liveth, it cannot be accounted a vise or ungentleman-like service, but a great credit even to be serviceable, ready, and diligent to execute the meanest subject on the control of the meanest subject as the two great and anoney. Creiolasse the Peripatetick among the rest, who was of this mind, that as the two great galiasses of with Salaminia at Ashani, and Paralos were not thot of ilanched into the sea for every small matter, but only upon urgent and necessary occasions; even so a man of government should be employed in the chiefe and greatest assairses, like as the soveraigne and King of the world, according to the Poet Europide;

For God himfelfe doth mannage and dispence
Things of most weight, by his fole government;
But maters sight and of small consequence,
He doth refer to fortunes regiment.

For we cannot commend the excessive ambition, the aspiring and contentious spirit of Theagenes, who contented not himselfe to have gone through all the ordinary games with victory, and to have won the prizes in many other extraordinary matteries and feats of activity, to wit, not only in that generall exercise Paneration, wherein hand and foot both is pur to the uttermost at once, but also at buffets, and at running a course in the long race: Finally, being one day at a solemne anniversary feal or yeares, maund in the memoriall of a certaine demi-god (as the manner was) when he was fet, and the meat lerved up to the boord, he would needs rule from the table for to perform another generall Pancratium: as if forfooth it had belonged to no man in the world to atchieve the victory in fuch feats but himselfe, if he were present in place: by which profession he had gotten together as good as twelve hundred Coronets, as prizes at such combates, of which themost part were of imall or no value at all i a man would lay they had been chasse, or such refuse and niferaffe. Like unto him for all the world be those, who are roady (as a man would say) at all houres to cast off all their cloaths to their very single wastcoat or shirt, for to undertake all affairs that shall be presented; by which means, the people have enough and too much of them; they become odious and irkesome unto them; in such fort that if they chance to do well and prosper, they enwythem; if they do otherwise than well and miscarry, they rejoyce and beglad at heart therefore. Againe, that which is admired in them at their first entrance into government, turneth in the end to a jest and meere mockery, much after this order; Metiochus is the generall Captaine; Metiochus looketh to the high waies; Metiochus bakes our bread; Metiochus grindes our meale; Metiochus doth every thing, and is all in all; finally, Metiochus shall pay for this one day, and crie, woe is me in the end. Now was this Metiochus one of Pericles his followers and favorites, who making use of his authority out of measure and compasse, by the countenance thereof, would employ himselfe in all publike charges and commissions whatsoever, until at the latt he became contemptible and despised. For in truth a man of government ought to carry himselfe, as that the people should evermore have a longing appetite unto him, be in love with him, and alwaies defirous to fee him againe, if he be abtent. This policy did Scipio Africanus wifely practice, who aboad the most part of the time in the countrey; by this meanes both easing himselfe of the heavy load of envy, and also giving those the while, good leiture to take breath, who seemed to be kept down by his glory. Times at the Clazomenian was otherwise a good man and a sufficient Politician, howbeit little wist he how he was envied in the City, because he would seeme to do every thing by himselse, untill such time as there besel unto him such an accident as this. There chanced to be playing in the midft of aftreet, as he passed by, a company of boies, and their game was who could drive with a cudgell a certaine cockall bone out of an hole. Some boies there were who held that the bone lay fill within; but he who had fmitten it, maintained the contrary (and faid withall) I would I had as well dashed out Timesias braines out of his head, as I am sure this bone was stricken our of the hole: Timesias over-heard this word, and knowing thereby what envy and malice all the people bare unto him, returning home presently to his house, and told his wife the whole matter, commanding her to truffe and pack up allboth bag and baggage, and to follow afterhim; who immediately went out of doores, and departed for ever out of the City Clazomene. It should seeme also that Themistocles was almost in the same plight, and wanted but alittle of the like shrewd turne from the Athenians, when he was driven thus to say unto them: Ah my good friends and neighbours, why are you weary and thinke much to receive to great good atmy hands? But as touching these persons abovesaid, some words of theirs were well placed, and others not. For a wife States-man, in care, affection, and forecast, ought not to refule any publike charge what soever, but to take paines in having an eye to all, and to understand and know every particular; and not to referve himfelfeclose, as it were, someholyanchor or facred tackling laidup in some secret cabin of a ship, and not to attend only upon extremities, and to tarry untill he be employed upon occasions of great necessity and utmost danger. But like as good Patrons or Masters of a ship, lay their own hands to some businesse, but others they performe sitting them. selves a far off by the meanes of their tooles and instruments, and by the hands of other servicors, turning about, stretching and winding up, or letting down, and slacking the ropes as they see cause, employing the mariners, some to row, others to attend and be occupied in the proof and foreship, and others again to cry unto their fellows to ply their work; and some of them they call many times into the poop, and putting the helm into their hands, fee them to fleer and guide the flem; even fo ought a wife Governour of the Common-wealth to yeeld now and then unto others the honour of command, and otherwhiles to call them after a gracious and courteous fort to the Pulpit, or publick place of audience, to make orations to the people, and not to move all matters belonging to the State by his own personal speeches, nor by his decrees, sentences, acts, (and as it were) with his own hands execute everything; but to have about him faithful and trufty persons to be his Ministers, who might second and affift him; and those he should employ, some in this charge, and others in that, according as he feeth them to be sufficient, meet, and fit for employment. After this manner did Pericles use Menippus for his expeditions and conduct of war affairs; thus by the means of Ephialtes he took down and abridged the authority of the high Court Areopagus. Charmus he employed in compassing and contriving the Law or Decree that passed against the Meconstruint in curpos he fent with a Colony for to people the City of Thurs. And in this doing, he not only diminished the envy of the people against himselfe, in that it feemed that his power and authority was thus divided and parted among many; but also he managed the affairs of the State better and more commodiously by far. For like as the division of the hand into singers enfeebleth not the force of the whole hand, but maketh it more fit for use, to handle all tools and infirmments, or to work anything more artificially; even to, he that in matters of government doth communicate part of the management of the publick affairs with his friends, causeth by this participation all things to be better done, and with more expedition; whereas that man, who upon an unfatiable delire to shew himselfe, to have credit and to win name and authority, layeth all the weight of the State upon his own shoulders, and wil be doing of every thing; undertaking oftentimes that charge, whereunto he is neither framed by nature, nor fitted by exercise; as Cleon did in leading an Army; Philopamenes in conducting a Navie; and Annibal in making Orations to the people, maketh himselfe inexcusable, if haply ought fall out otherwise then well. To such an one may well be applied a verse out of Euripides:

You work not intimber, but in other matter, Being your selfe but only a Carpenter.

even so, you not able to deliver an eloquent speech, have undertaken an embassage; being idle and given to take your ease, you will needs have the charge of a Steward, and governan house inot skilful and ready in casting accounts, you will needs be a Treasurer, or Receiver; being aged and fickly, you are become a Commander and General of an Army, Pericles did far better then fo; for he parted the government with Cimon; and retaining to himselfe the wholepower of ruling within the City, he left unto Cimonfull Commission and Authority to manthe Armado, and in the mean while to make war upon the Barbarians, because he knew his own selfe more fit for civil regiment at home, and the other more meet for war-like command abroad. In this respect Eubulus the Anaphlyftian is highly commended, who, notwithftanding the people had a great affiance and truft in him, yea, and gave him as much credit as no man more, yet could he never be brought to deal in theforraignaffairs of Greece, nor to take upon him the conduct of an Army: but refolving with himselfe ever from the beginning to attend and be employed in many matters, he mightily encreafed the revenues of the City, and enriched the State exceedingly. But Iphicrates for exercising and practicing to make declamations at home in his own house in the presence of many others, made a fool of himselfe, and was laughed to scorn for his labour; for say that he had proved no bad Orator, but a most excellent speaker; yet should he have stood contented with the reputation that he had won of a good warrior, by leats of arms, and have left the Schools of Rhetorick, for Sophisters, Orators, and such professors.

But forasmuch as all common people are by nature malignant, especially to those who are in place of authority, taking pleasure to quarrel and find fault with them; and suspecting ordinarily that many profitable Acts and Ordinances by them fet down, unleffe they be debated by factions and with some contradiction, are contrived by secret intelligence under hand, and by way of conspiracy; even this is the thing that most of all bringeth the private amities and societies of States-men and Governours into an ill name and obloquy: howbeit, for all this, we are not to admit, or grantunto them any true enmity in deed or discord, as did sometimes a popular man, and a Governour of Chios, named Onomademus, who after he had in a certain seditions tumu't gotten the upper hand of his advertaries, would not banish out of the City all those who had taken part against him; For fear lest that (quoth he) we fall out with our friends, when we have no more enemies: for surely this were meer folly. But whenfoever the people shall suspectany Ordinance or Act proposed which is of great consequence, and tending to their good, it behoveth not at such a time, that all (asit were) of one complot should deliver one and the same sentence; but that two or three opposing themselves without violence, should contradict their friend, and afterwards being convinced and overweighed by found reasons, change their mind, and range themselves to his opinion; for by this means they draw the people with them, namely, when they seem themselves to be brought thereto in regard of a publick benefit and commodity. And verily in trifling matters and of no great importance, it were not amisse to suffer our very friends in good earnest to differ and difagree from us, and to let every one take his way and follow his own mind, to the end that when fome main points and principal matters of greatest moment shall come in question, and be debated, it might not be thought that they have complotted together, and fogrown to a point and accord about the best.

Moreover, we are thus to think: That a wife man and a politician is by nature alwayes the Governour and chiefe Magistrate of a City, like as the King among the Bees i and upon this personation to ought to have evermore the reines in his hand, and to sway the affaires of State: however the state of the state of the state in the people do nominate and chuie by their free voices: for this office-managing, and defire to be alwayes in place of authority, is neither venerable for his petion, nor yet plausible to the people; and yet mult not herejed the same, in case the people call him lawfully to it, and confer the sime upon him; but to accept thereof, although peradventure they be offices somewhat inferiour to the reputation that he hath already, yea, and so employ himselfe therein willingly and with good affection; for reason it is and equity, thatas we our telves have been honoured already by places of great dignity, fo reciprocally we should grace and countenance those which be of meaner quality; and whensoever we shall be chosen to supream Magistracies, to wit, unto the flate of Lord Governour and general Captain in the City of Asbans, or the Prytanship in Redder, or Becotar, by which ishere in Reasons, it may be seem us very well in modesty to yield and rebate a little of the soverally power in our port, and with moderation to exercise the same; but contrarivise unto meaner room to adde more dignity, and shew greater countenance, to the end that we be not envied in the one of depised in the other.

Now for a man that entreth newly into any office whatfoever it be, he ought not only to call to remembrance, and use the speeches that Perioles made the first time that he took upon him the rule of State, and was to shew himselfe in open place: namely, Look to thy selfe Pericles, thou rulelt free men and not bond-flaves; thou governest Greeks, and not Barbarians; nay, thou art the head Maguitrate of the Citizens of Athens: but also he is to reason and say thus to himle fe: Thou art a Commander and yet a Subject withal ; thou art the Ruler of a City under Roman Proconfuls. or else the Procurators, Lieutenants and Deputies of Cafar. Here are not the plaines (as he said) of Lidia, for to run with the lance, nor the ancient City Sardis, noryetthe puissance of the Lydians which was in times past. The robe must not be made so large, it must be worn more strait; your eye must be always from the Emperours pavilion unto the Tribunal sear of justice; and you are not to take logreat pride, nor trust so much unto a Crown standing upon the head, seeing how horned shooes of the Roman Senators are above the same : but herein you ought to imitate the Actors and Plaiers in Tragedies, who adde somewhat of their own to the Roll or written part that they doe play, to wit, their paffionate affection, gefture, accent and countenance, which is fit and agreeable to the person that they do represent; and yet withall, they forget not to have an eye, and ear both, to the prompters. This (I say) we must do, for sear lest we passe those bounds and exceed the meafures of that liberty which is given us by those who have the power to command us; for I assure you, to go beyond those precinets and limits, bringeth with it danger; I say not to be hissed from off the stage, and be laughed out of our coats; but many there have been,

Upon whose neck! for punishment, The edge of trenchant axe and gleave Hath fallen, to end all their torment, And headfrom body soon did reave.

as it beielto Pardalus your countrey man, with those about him, for stepping a little at one side without their limits. And such another also there was, who being confined into a certain desart sile, became (as Solon faith)

A Sicinitanor Pholegandrian, Who born fometime was an Athenian,

We laugh heartily at little Children, to fee how otherwhiles they go about to pur their Fathers shooes upon their own feet, orto fet Crownes upon their heads in sport; and Governours of Cities relating so lishly oftentimes unto the people, the worthy acts of their predecessors; their noble courage and brave minds, their notable enterprizes atchieved, far different and disproportioned to the present times and proceedings in their dayes, and exhorting them to follow the same, set the multitude alost: but as they do ridiculously, so asterwards (beleeve me) they suffer not that which deserved to be laughed at, unsless haply they be so base minded, that for their basenesse to no account made of them. For many other Histories there be of ancient Greece, which associates as namely, those at Asheus which put the people in remembrance, not of the prowesse of the Ancestors inmartial affaires, but for example to decree of that general abolition and oblivion of all quartels and matters past, which sometimes was concluded there, after that the City was delivered and freedfrom their captivity under the thirty Tyrants, as also another act, by vertue whereof they condemned in a grievous sine the Poet Phrinichus, for that he represented in a Tragedy the winning and razing of the City Miletus. Likewile, how by a publick ordinance, every man wore chaplets of showers upon their heads, when they heard say that Cass and how, when intelligence came of the cruel execution and bloody massacre committed in Argos, wherein the Argives caused to be put to death 1500: of their own Citizens, they caused in a solemn procession, and general assembly of the whole City, an espiatory satisfact to be carried about, that it might please the gods to avertand turn away such truel thoughts from the hearts of the Athenians; semblably, how at what time as there was a general learch made throughout the City in every house, for those who banded with Harpalus, they passed by one house only of a man newly, matried, and would not suffer it to be searched. For in these precedents and such like, they might well enough in these days simitate and resemble their ancient to restates. But as for the battel of Marathon: the field sought neer the River Eurynedon, and the noble fight at Plates, with other such that the such that of the samples which do nothing else but blow and puff up a multitude with vanity, they should leave such those sor the Schools of Sophiliters and Masters of Rhetorick.

Well, we ought in our feveral governments to have a due regard not only to maintain our felves and our Cities so wisely, that our soveraigns have no occasion to complain; but we must take order also to have one great Seignior or other, who hath most authority at Rome, and in the Court of the Emperor, to be our fait and special friend; who may serve us instead of a Rampier to back us, and to defend all our actions and proceedings in the government of our Countries: for fuch Lords and great men of Rome stand ordinarily passing well affected to those affairs, which their dependants and favorites dofollow, and the fruit which may be reaped by the amity and favour of fuch grand Seigniors, it were not good and honest to convert into the advancement and enriching of ourselves, and our particular private friends; but to employ the same as Polybins did sometime and Panatius, who by the means of the good grace of Scipio wherein they stood, did benefit and advantage their countrey exceeding much: in which number may be ranged Arius, for when Calar Augustus had forced the City Alexandria, he entred into it, holding Arius by the hand, and devifing with him alone of all his other friends what was to be done more: afterwards when the Alexandrians looked for no other but fackage, and all extremities, and yet belought him to pardon them; I pardon you (quoth he) and receive you into my grace and favour; first in regard of the nobility and beauty of your City; secondly for Alexander the great his sake, the sounder thereofs and thirdly for the love of this my friend Arius your Citizen. May a man with any reason compare with this gracious favour, the most large and gainful commissions of ruling and governing Provinces, which many make lo great fuit for at the Court, and that with such abject serviced and base subjection, that some of them have even waxed old in giving attendance thereabout, at other mens gates; leaving in the mean while their own home affairs at tix and leven? wereit not well to correct and amenda little the sentence in Euripides, singing and saying it thus; If it be honest and lawful to watch and make Court at the gates of another, and to be subject to the fute of some great Seigniour: furely most commendable and behoveful it were so to do, for the love and benefit of a mans country, in all other cases to seek and embrace amities, under just and equal conditi-

Moreover, a governor in yielding and reducing his country unto the obedience of mighty Soversigns abroad, ought to take good heed that he bring it not into fervile subjection, left when it is once tied by the leg, he suffer it to be bound also by the neck : for somethere be who reporting all things both little and great unto these Potentates, make this their servitude reproachable; or to speak more truely, they deprive their country of all policy and form of government, making it so fearful, timorous, and fit for no authority and command at all a and like as they who use themfelves to live so physically, that they can neither dine nor sup, nor yer bath without their Physician, have not so much benefit of health as nature it selfe doth afford them; even so those Cities and States which for every decree and resolution of their counsel, for all grace and favour, yea, and for the smallest administration of publick affairs, must needs adjoyn the consent, judgement, and good liking of those Seigniors and good Masters of theirs, they even compel the said great Lords to be more powerful and absolute over them then they would themselves. The causes hereof commonly be these; to wit, the avarice, jealousie, and emulation of the chiefe and principal Citizens in a State; for that being defirous otherwhiles to opprefie and keep under those who be their inferiours, they constrain them to abandon their own Cities, or else being at some debate and difference with other Citizens their equals, and unwilling to take the foile one at anothers hand in their own City; they have recourse unto other superior Lords, and so bring in forraigners who are their betters. Hereupon it cometh to passe, that the Senate, People. Judicial Courts, and all that little authority and power which they had is utterly loft. A good governour therefore ought to remedy this muchiefe, by appealing such Burgesses as be private and meane Citizens, by equality, and those who are great and mighty, by reciprocal yeelding one to another; and so by this course to keep all affairs within the compasse of the City, to compose all quarrels, and determine all controversies at home, cuting and healing such inconveniences as secret maladies of a common wealth, with a civil and politick medicine; that is to say, to chuse rather for his owner. part for to be vanquished and overthrown among fellow Citizens, then to vanquish and win the Victory by forraigne power, and not to offer wrong unto his natural countrey, and be a cause to overthrow the rights and priviledges thereof; as for all others, he is to befeech them, yea, and to perswade with them particularly one by another, by good reasons and demonstrances of how many calamities peevish obstinacy is the cause; and how, because they would not each one in his turne and course frame and accommodate themselves at home to their sellow-Citizens, who many times be of one mind and linage to their neighbors and companions in charges and offices, and, that with honour and good lavour, they are come to this paffe, as to detect and lay open the fecter diffentions and debates of their own City, at the gates of their advocates, and to put their causes into the hands of pragmatical Lawyers (at Rome) with no lesse shame and ignominy, then loss and dammage.

Phylitians are wont when they cannot expel and fully exclude out of the body inwardly fome kind of maladies, to turn and drive the same without foorthot the superficial parts; but contrasting wife, a man of government, if he be not able to keep a City altogether in peace and concord, but that some troubles will arise, yet at least wife he must endeavour to contein that within the City which is the cause thereos, and nurseth the sedition, and in keeping it close to labour for to head and remedy it; to this end, that if it be possible he have no need either of Physician or Physics from forraign parts; for the intentions of a man of state and government ought to be these, namely, to proceed in his affairs surely, and to flie the violent and furious motions of vain-glory, as hath been said already, howbeit in his resolution,

A courage bold, and full of confidence Undaunted hears, and featelf be mush have, Which will not qualle for any confequence, But fee the end: much like to fouldiers brave, In field themselver who many do behave, And hazard lims and life for to defend Their country deer, and enemies to offend:

and not onely to oppose himselfe against enemies, but also to be armed against perilous troubles and dangerous tumults, that he may be ready to resist and make head: for he ought not in any case himself to move tempets and raise commotions, no nor when he feeth boisterous storms comming, for sake and leave his country in time of need. He must not (1 say) drive his City under his charge upon apparent danger, but so son as ever it once begin to be tossed, and to stoat in jeopardy, then is it his part to come to incocour, by caling out from himselse (as it were) a facred Anchor, that is to say, to use his boldnesse and liberty of speech, considering that now the main point of all light a bleeding, even the fastery of his countrey. Such were the dangers that happed unto Pergamm in Norsest time, and of late days to the Rhodians, during the Empire of Domitian, as also before unto the Thessalians, while Angussum was Emperor, by occasion that they had burned Pergam quick. In these and such like occurrences, a man of State and government, especially if he be worthy of that name,

Never shall you see Sleepy for to be.

nordrawing his foot back for fear, no nor to blame and lay the fault on others, nor yet to make shift for one, and put himselfe out of the medly of danger, but either going in embassage, or embarked in some ship at sea 3 or else ready to speak first, and to say not only thus, but although himselfe be not culpable at all with the multitude, yet will he put his person into danger for them. For furely this is an act right honest, and besides the honesty in it selfe, it hapneth divers times, that the vertue and noble courage of fuch a man hath been to highly admired, that it hath daunted the anger conceived against a whole multitude, and dispatched all the fiercenesse and fury of a bittermenace: like as it befel unto a King of Persia in regard of Bulis and Speribis two Gentlemen of Sparta: and asit was feen in Pompey to his hoft and friend Sthenon: for when he was fully determined to chastise the Mamertines sharply, and to proceed against them in all rigor, for that they had rebelled, the faid Schenonstept unto him, and thus frankly spake; That he should doe neither well nor juftly, in case he did to death a number of innocents, for one man who alone was faulty; for it is I my lelfe (quoth he) who caused the whole City to revolt and take Arms, inducing my friends for love, and forcing mine enemies for fear. These words of his went so neer unto the heart of Pompey, that he pardoned the City, and most courteously entreated Schenon; semblably, the host of Solla, having shewed the like valour and vertue, although it were not to the like person, died a noble death: for when Sylla had won the City Pransfe by affault, he meant to put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword excepting only one host of his, whom in regard of old hospitality he fur-red and pardoned: but this host and friend faid flatly unto him, that he would never remain alive to see that bloody massacre, nor hold his life by the murtherer of his country; and so cast himselfe into the troop of his fellow Citizens in the heat of execution, and was killed with them. Well pray unto the gods we ought, to preferve and keep us that we fall not into fuch calamities and troublefometimes: to hope allo and look for better days.

Moreover, we are to effeem of every publick magistracy, and of him who exerciseth it, as

Moreover, we are to effeem of every publick magistracy, and of him who exercise thir, as of a great and facred thing, and in that regard to honour the same above all. Now the honour which is due unto Authority, is the mutual accord and love of those who are set in place to exercise the same together; and verify this honour is much more worth, then either all those Crowns and Diadems which they bear upon their heads, or their stately Mantles and Robes of Puple, wherewith they bearrayed. Howbeit, they that laid the first ground and beginning of Amity;

their service in Wars, when they were fellow Souldiers, or the passing of their youthful yeares together; and contrariwife, take this a caule now of enmity, that they either are joined Captaines gerner a matching for the conduct of an Army, or have the charge of the Common-weale together, it cannot be avoided, but that they must incurre one of these three mischiers. For either if they efleem their fellows and companions in government to be their equals, they begin themselves first to grow into terms of diffention; or it they take them to be their betters, they fall to be envious: or else in case they hold them to be inferiour unto them in good parts, they despise and contemne them. Whereas they should indeed make Court unto the greater, honor and adorn their equals, and advance their inferiours, and in one word, to love and embrace all, as having an amity and love engendered among themselves, not because they have eaten at one table, drunk of the same cup, or met together at one feast, but by a certain common band and publick obligation, as having iniome fort a certain fatherly benevolence, contracted and grown upon the common affection unto their Country. Certes, one reason why Scipio was not so well thought of at Rome was this; that having invited all his friends to a folemn feast at the dedication of his temple to Hercules, hee left out Mummius his colleague, or fellow in office : for lay that otherwise they took not one and other for fo good friends; yet foit is, that at fuch a time, and upon fuch occasions, they ought to have honoured and made much one of the other, by reason of their common magistracy. If there Scipio, a noble perionage otherwise, and a man of wonderful regard, in urred the imputation and note of infolency and prefumption, because he forgat, or omitted so small a demonstration and token of humanity: how can it be, that he who goeth about to impair the dignity and credit of his companions in government, or diffrediteth and diffraceth him in those actions, especially which proceed from honour and bounty, or upon an arrogant humor of his own, will feem to do all, and attribute the whole to himselfe alone, how can fuch an one (I fay) be reputed, either modelt of reafonable? I remember my felfe, that when I was but of young years, I was fent with another, in embassage to the Proconsul; and for that my companion stayed about (I wot not what behind) I went alone and did that which we had in commission to do together: after my return, when I was to give an account unto the State, and to report the effect of my charge and nieslage back again; my father arose, and taking me apart, willed me in no wiseto speak in the singular number, and say, departed or went, but We departed; Item, not I (aid, or (quoth I) but We faid; and in the whole recital of the rest to joyn always my companion, as if he had been associate, and at one hand with me in that which I did alone. And verily this is not only decent, convenient, and civil, but that which more is, it taketh from glory that which is offenfive, to wit, envy, which is the cause that great Captains attribute and ascribe their noble acts to fortune and their good angel, as did Timolean, even he who overthrew the Tyrannies established in Sicily; who founded and erected a Temple to Good-Fortune; Python also when he was highly praifed and commended at Athens for having flain King Cotys with his own hand; It was God (quoth he) who for to do the deed used my. hand. And Theopompus King of the Lacedemonians, when one laid unto him that Sparta was faved and stood upright, for that their Kings know how to rule well; Nay, rather (quoth he) became the people know how to obey well and to fay a truth, both these depend one upon the other how? beit, most menare of this opinion, and so they give out; that the better part of policy or know-ledge belonging to civil government lieth in this, to fitmen, and stame them meet to be well ruled and commanded; for in every City there is always a greater number of Subjects then Rulers; and each one in his turn (especially in a popular state) is governor but a while, and sorie, asterwards con-tinueth governed all the rest of his life, in such sort, that it is a most honest and profitable appress tillip (as it were) to learn to obey those who have authority to command, although haply they have meaner parts otherwise, and be of lesse credit and power then our selves: for a meer absurdity it were, that (whereas a principal, or excellent actor in a Tragedy, fuch as Theodorius Was, or Polish, for hire waiteth oftentimes upon another mercenary Player who hath not above three words in his part to fay, and speaketh unto him in all humility and reverence, because peradventure he hath the royal band of a Diademe about his head, and a Scepter in his hand) in the true and unfained aftirms of our life, and in case of policy and government, a rich and mighty person should despite and set light by a magifirate for that he is a simple man otherwise, and peradventure poor and of mean estate; yea, and proceed to wrong, violate and impair the publick dignity wherein he is placed, yea, and to offer violence thereby unto the authority of a State; whereas he ought rather with his own credit and puissance, help out the defect and weakness of such a man, & by his greatness, countenance his authorrity: for thus in the City of Lecedemon, the Kings were wont to rife up out of their Thrones before the Ephora, and who oever else was summoned and called by them, came not an ordinary food pice, or fair and foftly, but running in great hafte, in token of obedience, and to thew unto other Citizens how obeisant they were, taking a great joy and glory in this, that they honour their Maxigistrates, not as some vain-glorious and ungracious fors, void of all civility and minimax; Wanting judgement and discretion, who to shew, for footh, their exceeding power upon which they stand much and pride themselves, will not letto offer abile into the Judges and Wardens of the publick games, combats, and pastimes, orto give reproachful terms to those that lead the Dance, or set out the Plaies in the Bacchanal feast, yea, and mock Captaines, and laugh at the Presidents and Wardens of the publick exercises for youth, who have not the wit to know; That to give honour is oftentimes more honourable then to be honoured i for furely to an honourable Cc 3 person who beareth a great sway, and carrieth a mighty port with him in a City, it is a greater ormament and grace to accompany a Magistrate, and as it were to guard and squire him, then it he said Magistrate should put him belove, of seem to wait upon him in his train; and to say a truth, as this were the way to work him displacture and procure him envy from the hearts of as many as see it; so the other would winhim true glory which proceedeth of love and benevolence: And verily when such a man is seen otherwhiles in the Magistrates house, when he saluteth or greetesth him first, and either giveth him the upper hand, or the middle place, as they walk together, he addeth an ornament to the dignity of the City, and lofeth thereby none of his own. Moreover, it is a popular thing, and that which gaineth the hearts of the multitude, if such a person can bear patiently the hard tearms of a Magistrate whiles he is in place, and endure his cholerick fits; for then he may with Diomedes in Homer say thus to himselfe:

However now I little do say, It will be mine honor another day,

Or as one faid of Demostbenes; Wellhe is not now Demostbenes only, but he is a law-giver, he is a prefident of the facred plaies and solemn games, and a crown he hath upon his head, &c. and thereforeit is good to put up all now, and to defer vengeance until another time; for either we shall come upon him when he is out of his office, or at leastwise we shall gain thus much by delay, that choler will be well-cooled and allaied by that time.

Moreover, in any government, or magistracy whatsoever, a good subject ought to strive (as it were) a vie with the rulers, especially if they be persons of good fort, and gracious behaviour, in diligence, care, and fore-cast for the benefit of the State; namely, in going to them, to give notice and intelligence of whatfoever is meet to be done, in putting into their hands for to be executhe an intelligence of what with mature deliberation rightly refolved upon, in giving means unto them for to win themselves honour, and that by the benefit of the Common weale: But if such persons they be, as either for fear and falle heart, or upon a froward previfinesse and disposition give no ear to fuch motions, and are not willing to put that in execution which is prefented unto them 3 then it is his part himself in person to go and declare the same in publick place to the body of the people, and in no wife to neglect, difanul, or paffe with connivance any thing that concerneth the wealepublick, and never to pretend any colourable excuse, by saying, it appertained unto none other but the head Magistrate, thus to deal curiously and be bussy occupied in medling with the affairs of State; for a general Law there is which giveth always the first and principal place of rule in a Common-wealth unto him who dealeth justly, practifeth righteousnesse, and knoweth what is expedient and profitable, as we may see by the example of Xenophon, who in one place written thus of himfelfe: There was in the army (quoth he) one named Xemophon, who was neither Lord General, nor Lieutenant; but for skill and knowledge of that which was to be done, and for resolution to enterprize and execute the same, put himselfe forward, and gave charge unto others, wherein he so behaved himselfe that he saved the Greeks. And the most glorious feat of arms that ever Philopenen archived was this, that when he heard news how King Agis had surprized the City of Messes, and that the General of the Acharans would not go with aid and rescue, but drew back for sear she with a troop of the most forward and resolute gallants, without warrant, or commission from the State delivered the faid City from out of the hands of Agis: which I write not as if I allowed of innovations, or such new enterprizes and extraordinary attempts upon every small and light occasion, but only either in time of need and extremity, as Philopomen did then, or for honest occations, as Epaminondas, who continued in his Beotarchy four months longer then was ordinary by the Laws of the Country, during which time he put on arms, and entred into Laconia, re-edified Meffene, and peopled it, to the end that if afterwards there should ensue any complaint, or imputation, we may answer with credit, and either alledge for excuse, necessity, or set against it the peril to which we exposed our selves, the bravenesse of the exploit, and the service so well performed to make amends

There is reported a fentence of Jason who long since was the Tyrant or Monarch of Sieily, which he had often in his mouth, and always repeated so often as he did violence or outrages to any of his subjects, that they cannot chuse but commit unjustice in small matters, who would do justice in great causies; as if a man would say, that necessary it is for him to offer wrong in detaile who mindeth to do right in the grosse. But as touching this sentence a man may soon perceive at the first fight, that it is a speech meet for him that intendent to make himselfe an absolute Lord, and tousing tyranny. Yet is this rule more civil and politick, that a governour to gratifie the people, is to pals by small matters, and to wink at them, that he may in greater things stand against them, and stay them from breaking out coofar. For he that in every thing will be peering and looking too narrow-ly, without any yeelding, or relaxation, but is always severe, rigorous and inexorable, doth by his example trim and accustome the people likewise to be quarrelsomeand contentious with him, yea and to be ready upon all ocasions to take offence and discontentment.

But foftly for to strike the faile Or slack the belm doth much availe With violence when billows great Arifo, and an the ship do beat.

and even so a governor ought in some things to yeeld, and not to be so precise and straight laced himselse, but to sport as it were, and take his passimes graciously with his people; as namely to celebrate feftival facritices, behold folemn plaies, games, and combats, and to fit in the Theaters with them, partly inmaking femblant, as though he neither faw nor heard many things, like as we wont to do by the faults at home of our little children; to the end that the authority of reproving them roundly, and admonishing them frankly, like unto the vertue of a medicine not dull and enervate with much use, but remaining still in full vigor and strength, may be more effectual, carry the greater credit, touch the quick indeed, and fling in matters of greater consequence. Alexander the great when he heard that his fifter had been too familiarly acquainted with a lufty young gentleman and abeautiful, was nothing displeased therewith, but said; We must give her also a little leave to enjoy somewhat the pleasure and prerogative of a Prince; which was neither well done of him to allow such things in her, nor yet with good respect of his own honour and dignity; for we ought not to think this the fruition, but the ruine and dishonour rather of a princely State. And therefore a wife governor will not permit as much as possibly lieth in him, that the body of the people shall do in jury unto any particular inhabitants, as namely in confication of other mens goods, or in difiribution, and parting among themselves the mony of the common stock: but to resist such courses with all his power, and with remonstrances, perswasions, threats, and menaces withstand the inordinate desires of a multitude: contrary to the practice of Cleon and his followers at Athens, who feeding and fostering such soolish appetites and corrupt humors of the people, caused many drone Bees (as Plato faith) to breed in the City, who did no other good but fling and prick one or other. But if the people at any time take occasion by solemnising some festival day, according to the custom of the Country, or by the honor of some god or goddesse, to set out any goodly shew, play, of stately spectacle, or to distribute some small dole, or to exhibit a pleasant granuity, honest countesse, or publick magnificence: lawful it is and reasonable, that they should in such cases enjoy in some fort the fruit both of their liberty, and also of their wealth and prosperity. For in the governments of Pericles and Demetrius Phalereus, there be many examples extant of the like nature; as for Cimon he beautified the market place of Athens with rows of palm trees, planted directly, and ranged by him, with pleafant walks, and fair allies. And Caso feeing about the time of Cavilines conspiracy, that the Commons of Rome were in a commotion and hurliburly by the faction of Julius Cafir, and growne in manner to these terms, for to bring in a change and alteration of the whole State; per-fivaded the Senate to ordain, that there should be some perty dole of money given among the poor Commoners; which coming in so good and fit a time, appealed the tumult, and repressed the fedicommones; when the state of the State, when he harr put the people by some great matter which tended to their shame and losse, will again by somelight gratuity and pleasure which he is content to grant, cheer, and recomfort them, yea and allay their mood when they be ready to whine and complain. And other whiles, good policy it is, of purpose to withdraw them from some soolery, unto which without all sense and reason their mind and affection standeth, to draw and lead them unto other things that be good and profitable; like as Demades his practile was, at what time as he had the receit of all the regood and rother his hands; for when the people of Athem were fully bent to fend forth certain Gallies, for to succorthose who had taken arms and rebelled against Alexandr the great, and to that effect commanded him to disburie money for the charges, he made this speech unto them; My Masters, there is money ready for you, for I have provided so, as I purpose to deale among you at this feaft of Bacchavales, that every one of you may have halfe a Mna of Silver; now if you lift to employ the same money to the feeting out of a fleet, you may do what pleaseth you with your own, use it, or abuse it at your pleasure, it is all one to me: by this cuming device, having turned them from the rigging and manning of the Armado which they purposed to set out, and all for fear they should lose the benefit of the foresaid dole, or largeste which he promised and pretended, hestayed then from offending King Alexander, that he had no cause to finde himselfe grieved with them. Many such fits and humors are the people given unto, both hurtful and dammageable unto them; which it were impossible to break them of, going directly to work; but a man must go about with them, and by turnings and windings compasse them to his mind; like as Phocion did upon a time when the Athenians would have had him in all hafte to make a roade and invade the country of Baotia; for he caused incontinently proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet; That all Citizens from fourteen years of age upward unto threefcore, should shew themselves in arms and follow him; upon which proclamation, when there arose a great noise and stir among the elder fort, who began to murine, for that he would force them at those years to the Warres; What a strange matter sirs is this (quoth he) I my selse am sourscore yeares of age, and you shall have me with you for your Captaine. By this means a politick Governour may put by and break the rank of many unleasonable and needlesse embassages; namely, by joining many of them in commission together, and those whom he seeth to be unfit altogether for futh voyages; thus may be stay the enterprises of going in hand with many great buildings unnecessary and to no purpose, in commanding them at such times to contribute money thereto out of their own purses; also hinder the processe of many uncivil and undecent sutes; namely, by affigning one and the same time for appearance in Court, and for to be employed in solliciting causes abroad in forraign parts: and for to bring these things about, he must draw and associate unto him those principal authors who have drawn out in writing any fuch bills to be proposed, or have incited the people, and put those matters in their heads; and to them he shall intimate those croffe courses abovelaid; for either if they start back and keep out of the way, they shall seem themselves to break that which they proposed; or if they accept thereof and be present, they shall be sure to take part of the trouble and pains that is imposed upon them. Now when there shall be question of any exploit to be done of great consequence, and tending much to the good of the State, which requireth no small travel, industry, and diligence; then have a special regard and endeavour, I advife you, to chuse those friends of yours who are of most sufficiency, and of greatest authority, and those among the rest which are of the mildest and best nature; for such you may be fure will cross you least, and affist you most; folong as they have wit at will, and be withal void of jealousic and contention. And herein it behoveth a man to know well his own nature, and finding that whereunto he is leffe apt then another; to chuse for his adjuncts those rather whom he perceiveth to be better able to go through with the businesse in hand, then such as otherwise be like unto himselfe; for so Diamedes being deputed to go in espial for to view the Camp of the ene-mies, choic for his companion the wariest and best advised person of all the Greeks, and let passe the most valiant fouldiers. By this means all actions shall be counterpoised best, and lesse jealousie and emulation will grow between them who are defirous to have their good parts and valour feem indifferent in vertues and qualities. If you have a cause to plead, or be to go in embassage; chuse for your companion and affiltant (if you find your felle not meet to speak) some man that is eloquent, like as Pelopidas in the like case chose Epaminondas. If you think your selfe unmeet to entertain the common people with courtefie and affability, and of too high and lofty a mind for to debase your felfe, and make court unto them, as Callicratidas the Captain of the Lacedemonians was; take one unto you who is gracious, and can skill to court it and give entertainment. If your body be weak or feeble, and notable to endure much pains; have one with you who hath a stronger body, and who can away with travel, as Nicias did Lamachus; for this is the reason that Gergones was so wondeful, because that having many legs, many arms, many eyes, yet he with all them was ruled and governed by one soul. But wise governors if they accord and agree well, may confer and lay together not only their bodies and goods, but also their fortunes, their credits, and their vertues, and make use of them all in one affair, in such fort that they shall compass and execute fully whatsoever they enterprise, much better then any other whatsoever: and not as the Argonauts did, who after they had left Heroules, were constrained to have recourse unto the charms, forceries, and enchantments of women for to fave themselves, and to steal away the golden sleece.

Certain Temples there be, into which whosoever didenter, must leave without doors all the gold that they had about them, and as for iron they might not presume to go withal into any one what-soever. Considering therefore that the tribunal and judical sea of judica is the Temple of Jupiter, furnamed the Counsellor and Patron of Cities, of Themis also and Diese, that is to say, equity and justice; before ever thou set foot to mount up, into it, presently rid and clearthy soul of all avarice and covetous fires of mony, as if it were iron, and a very malady sull of rust, and throw it far from thee into the Merchaust Hall, into the Shops of Tradesimen, Occupiers, Banquers and Ulivers.

shumit Isay, as far off as you can, and make this reckoning, that whosoever enricheth himselseby the managing of the Common-weale, is a Church-robber, committing facriledge in the highest degree, robbing Temples, stealing out of the Sepulchres of the dead, picking the Coffers of his friends: making himselse rich by treachery, treason, and false-witnesse: think him to be an untrusty and faithelesse Counsellor, a perjured Judge, a corrupt Magistrate, and full of bribery; in one word pollared and defiled with all wickednesse, and not clear of any sin whatsoever that may be committed; and therefore I shall not need to speak more of this point.

As for ambition, although it carry with it a fairer shew then avarice, yet neverthelesse it bringeth after it a traine of mischiefes and plagues, no lesse dangerous and pernitious unto the government of a Common-wealth: for accompanied it is ordinarily with audacious rashnesse more then it in as much as it wieth notto breed in base minds, or in natures seeble and idle, but principally in valiant, active, and vigorous spirits; and the voice of the people, who by their praises lift it up many times and drive it forward, maketh the violence thereof more hard to be reftrained, managed, and ruled. Like as therefore Plato writeth, that we ought to accustom young Boys, even from their very infancy to have this fentence refounding in their ears: That it is not lawful for them neither to carry gold about their bodies as an outward ornament, nor so much as to have it in their purses, for that they have other gold as a proper chaffer of their own, and the same incorporate in their hears: giving us to understand by these anigmatical and covert speeches (as I take it) the vertue derived from their Ancestors, by descent and continuation of their race; even so we may in some fore cure and remedy this defire of glory, by making remonstrance unto ambitious spirits, that they have in themselves gold, that cannot corrupt, be wasted, or contaminated by envy, no nor by Momus himfelfethe reprover of the gods, to wit, Honour, the which we always encrease and augment, the morewe discourse, consider, meditate, and think upon those things which have been performed and accomplished by us in the government of the Common-weale: and therefore they have no need of those other honours, which are either cast in moulds by founders, or cut and graven in brasse by mans hand, considering that all such glory cometh from without foorth, and is rather in others then in them, for whom they were made.

For the statue of a Trumpeter which Polyclerus made, as also that other of an halbarder are commended in regard of the maker, and not of those whom they do represent, and for whose sake they were made. Certes, Caro at what time as the City of Rome began to be well replenished with images and statues, would not suffer any one to be made for himself, saying: That he had rather men would ask, why there was no image set up for him, than why it was? For furely fuch things bring envy, and the common people think themielves endebted fill, and beholden unto those, upon whom they have not bettowed fuch vanities: and contrariwile, fuch as receive them at their hands are odious and troublelome unto them, as if they had fought to have the publick affairs of the State in their hands, in hope to receive such a reward and falary from them again. Like as therefore he that hath failed without danger along the Gulfe Syris, if afterwards he chance to be cast away and drowned in the mouth of the Haven, hath done no such doughty deed, nor performed any special matter of praise in his voyage and navigation; even io, he that hath escaped the common Treasury, and done well enough and saved himselfe, from the publick revenues, cultomes, and commodities of the State; that is to fay, hath not defiled his hands, either with robbing the City money, or dealt under-hand with the Farmers & undertakers of the Cities lands, revenues, &c. and then shall suffer himselfe to be overtaken and surprized with a defire to be a President and sit highest, or to be the head man and chiefe in Councel of a City, is run indeed upon an high rock that reacheth up alofe, but drenched he is over the ears, and as like to fink as the rest, neverthelesse. In best case he is therefore, who neither seeketh nor desireth any of these honours, but rejecteth and resuseth them altogether. Howbeit, if peradventure it be no eafiematter to pur back a grace and favour, or some token of love, that the people otherwhiles desire to shew unto them who are entred into combat, as it were in the field of government, not in a game and mastery for a filver prize, or for rich presents, but in the game indeed which is holy and sacred, yea, and worthy to be crowned, it may suffice and content a man to have some honourable inscription, or title, in a tablet, some publick act, or decree, some branch of Lawrel, or the Olive: like as Epimenides, who received one branch of the facred Olive, growing in the Castle of Athens, because he had cleanfed and purified the City; and Anaxagoras refusing all other honours which the peoplewould have ordained for him, demanded onely, that upon the day of his death the Children might have leave to play, and not go to school all that day long. The seven gallant Gentlemen of Persia, who killed the Tyrants, called Magi, were honoured only with this priviledge, that both they and their posterity might wear the Persian pointed Cap, or * Turbant, bending forward on * Tiera. their heads; for this was the fignal which they were agreed upon among themselves when they went to execute the said enterprise. Likewise the honour which Pitracus received, did shew some modefly and civility; for when his Citizens had permitted and granted unto him to have and enjoy those Lands which he had conquered from the enemy, as much as he would himselfe; hee stood contented with so much, and no more as lay within one fling, or shot of the javelin which helanced himselfe. And Cooles the Roman took so much ground only as he in his own person could eare with a plow in one day, being as he was a lame and mained man. For a civil honour ought not to be in the nature of a falary for a vertuous act performed, but a token rather, and a memorial that the remembrance thereof might continue long, as their did whom erewhiles we named: whereas in those three hundred statues of Demetrius Phalereus there gathered not so much as ruft, canker, or any ordure, or filth whatsoever, but were all of them ere himselfe died, pulled down and broken. And as for the images of Demades, melted they were every one, and of the mettal were made Pilpots and Basins for close stools : yea, and many such honours have been defaced, as being displeasant and odious to the world, not in regard only of the wickednesse of the receiver, but also of the greatnesse and richnesse of the thing given and received: and therefore the goodlieft and furest safeguard of honour, that it may endure and last longest, is, the least costlinesse, and price bestowed thereupon: for such as be excessive massie and immeasurable in great nesse, may be well compared unto huge Colosses, or Statues not well ballanced and counterpossed, nor proportionably made, which foon fall down to the ground of themselves. And here in this place I call Honours, these exteriour things which the common people (so far forth as beseemeth them, according to the saying of Empedocles) so call. Howbeit I also affirm as well as others, that a wise Governour and man of State ought not to despile true honour, which consisteth in the benevolence and good affection of those who have in remembrance the services and benefits that they have received; neither ought he altogether to contemn glory, as one who forbare to please his neighbours among whom he liveth, as Democritus would have him: for, neither ought horse-keepers, or Elquires of the stable, reject the affection of their horses lovingly making toward them; nor hunters the fawning of their hounds and spaniels; but rather seek to win and keep the same, for that it is both a profitable, and also a pleasant thing, to be able for to imprint in those creatures who are familiar, and do live and converse with us, such an affection to us as Lysimachus his dog shewed towards his master; and which the Poet Homer reporteth that Achilles horses shewed to Patroclus. For mine own part I am of this mind that Bees would be better entreated and escape better, in case they would make much of those, and suffer them gently to come toward them, who nourish them and have the care and charge of them, rather then to sting and provoke them to anger as they do; whereas now, men are driven to punish them and chase them away with smoak: also to break and tame their frampold and unruly hories with hard bits and bridles, yea, and curst dogs which are given to run away, they are faine to lead perforce in collars, or tie up and hamper with clogs. But verily there is nothing in the world that maketh one man willingly obetiant and subject to another, more then the affiance that he hash in him for the love which he beareth, and the opinion conceived of his goodnesse, honesty and justice; which is the reason that Demossberre laid very well: That size collection are under the collection and preserve themselves from Tyrants, then to distruss them; is of that part of the soll whereby we beleeve, is it, which is most feasie to be taken captive. Like as therefore the gift of prophesic which Cassand, flood her country men and sellow Citizens in nostead, because they would never give credit, or beliefe unto her: for thus she speaketh of her selle,

Godwould not have my voice propheticall When I forcell of things, to take effect, Nor do my country any good at all:
For why: always they do my words reject, In their diffress, then would correct Their folly pass, then an I wise and fage;
Before it come, they say I do but rage.

even so, on the other side, the trust and considence that the Citizens reposed in Architas, the good will and benevolence which they bare unto Battus, served them in right good stead: for that they used and followed their counsel, by reason of the good opinion which they conceived of them.

This is then the first and principal good which lieth in the reputation of States-men, and those who are in government, namely, the trust and confidence which is in them; for it maketh an overture, and openent the door to the enterprise, and execution of all good actions. The second, is the love and affection of the people, which to good Governors is to them a buckler and armour of defence against envious and wicked persons:

putting back envy that might arife against them; and in regard of might and credit, making equal a man meanly born, and of base parentage, with those who are nobly descended, the poor with the rich, and the private person with the magistrates: and to be brief, when vertue and verity are joined together with this popular benevolence, it is as mighty as a firong and fleady gale of a forewind at the poop, and driveth men forward to the managing and effecting of all publike affairs whatfoever. Confider now and see what contrary effects the diposition of peoples hearts, doth produce and bring forth by their examples following. For even they of Italy, when they had in their hands the wife and Children of Denys the Tyxant, after they had villanously abused, and shamefully forced their bodies, did them to death, and when they had burnt them to ashes, threw and scattered the same out of a ship into the Sea. Whereas one Menander who reigned graciously over the Bactrians, in the end, when he had lost his life in the wars, was honourably interred: for the Cities under his abeifance joined altogether, and by a common accord folemnized his funerals and oblequies with great mourning and lamentation; but as touching the place where his reliques should be beflowed, they grew into a great strike and contention one with another, which at the last with much ado was pacified upon this condition and composition, that his ashes should be parted and divided equally among themall, and that every City should have one Sepulcher and Monument of him by it felfe. Again, the Agrigentines after they were delivered from the Tyrant Phalaris, enacted an Ordinance: That from thence forth, it should not be lawful for any person whatsoever, to wear a robe of blew colour, for that the Guard and Penfioners attending about the faid Tyrant, had blew cassocks for their Liveries. But the Persians took such a love to their Prince Cyrus, that because he was Hawk-nosed, they ever after, and even to this day, affect those who have such noses, and take them to be best favoured. And verily of all loves, this is the most divine, holy, and puissant, which Cities and States do bear unto a man for his vertue: as for other honors so fallely called, and bearing no true enfigns indeed to testifie love, which the people bestow upon them, who have builded Theaters, and shew-places, given them largesses, congisaries, and other doles, or exhibited combats of sword-sencers at the sharp these wrong entituled honours do resemble the glosing flatteries of Harlots and Strumpets, who smile upon their Lovers, so long only as they give them any thing, or gratifie them in any pleasure; and such a glory as this lasteth not long, but after a day or two passeth away and is gone

He whosoever he was, that said first; That he who began to give money by way of largesse unto the people, taught the very high way to overthrow a popular State, knew very well, that the people lose their authority, when they make themselves subject and inseriour by taking such gitts: and even they also who are the givers must know thus much: That they overthrow themselves in buying their reputation so costly, and as so high a price: and by that means they make the multitude more haughty and arrogant, because thereby the people do presume, that it is in their power to give, or take away so great a thing. I write not this, as though I would have a man of estate in his lawful expenses, and allowable liberalities, to shew himselfe too neer and mechanical. especially when his state will bear and maintain the same: for that, in truth, the people carry a greater hatred to a rich man, who will not part with any of his goods among them, then a poor man who robbeth the common cheft: for they suppose the one to proceed from pride and contempt of them, and the other from meer need and necessity. I would wish therefore that first and principally these largestes should come by way of gratuity, and for nothing, for that in such a fort, they make the authors thereof better eleemed and admired, and befides they bind and oblige the receivers so much the more. Secondly, I would that they were done upon a good honest, and laudable occasion, as namely, for the honour of some god: a thing that draweth on the people more and more to devotion and religion, because withal, it imprinteth in the hearts of the people a vehement, opinion, and strong apprehension that the Majesty of the gods, must needs be a great and venerable thing, when they see those who honor them, and whom they repute for so worthy and noble personages, to affection ate unto them, as for their service and worship to be at such cost, and fpend foliberally. Like as therefore Place forbade young men who went to the Musick Schoole, that they should not learn either the Lydian and Phrygian harmony; for that the one stirred up in our hearts all lamentable, doleful, and dumpish affections, the other encreased the inclination to pleasure, riot, and voluptuous seninality seven so, as touching these largesses and publick expenses, banish and chase out of your City as much as you can, those which provoke in our hearts beastly, barbarous, and bloody affections, or such as feed loosenesseand scurrility: or if you be not able to rid them out clean, yet do your endeavour at least wile to hold off and contest against the people, to your uttermost power, who call upon you for such spectacles; and order the matter so always, that the subject matter of your dispense may be honest and chast, the end and intention good and necesfary, or at least wise that the pleasure and mirth be without wrong and hurt to any person. But if peradventure your State be but mean, and that the center and circumference of your goods contain and comprehend no more then to serve and supply necessities, know well this: that it argueth neither a bale mind nor an illiberal and ungentleman-like heart to be known of your poverty, and so to give place unto other, who have therewith to defray fuch ambitious expenses and liberalities, and by endebring and engaging your felfe in the Uturers Books, to be a spectacle both to be pittied and laughed at for such publick ministeries; for a much as they who sever they be that so do, cannot go to work (ofecretly, but it will be thought and known how they enterprize above their abili-ty, be driven to trouble and make bold with their friends in borrowing of them, or else to flatter and court Usurers to take up money at interest, in such sort as that they shall win no honour and credit, but rather shame and contempt by such expenses; in which regard, good it were in these cases to fet always before your eyes the examples of Lamachus and Phocion. For Phocion one day when the Athenians at a folemn sacrifice called instantly upon him to contribute some money roward the charges: I would be ashamed (quoth he) to give you any thing, and in the mean while not be able to keep my credit, and pay that I owe to this man here, and withal he pointed unto Callicles the Ulurer, unto whom he was then endebted. As for Lamachus in his accounts of charges whiles he was Lord Generalof an Army under the Athenians in any expedition, put in alwayes, Thus much for a pair of shoes or pantofles for himselfe: Item, so much for a garment. The Thessalians ordain ned and allowed unto Hermon who refused to be their Captain General, because he was poor, a flagon, or little runlet of Wine monthly, and a measure, or bushel and halfe of meale every four days: whereby you see it is no shame for a man to consesse his poverty; neither have poor men less means to win credit and authority in the government of Cities, then they who lay out and spend much in making feasts or exhibiting publick shews and spectacles, for to gain the good will and favour of the people; provided alwayes, that by their vertue they have gotten reputation and liberty to speake their minds frankly and freely unto them. And therefore a good Governour ought wifely to mafter and rule himself in these cases; hemust not (I say) enter into the plain and champion ground on foot for to encounter with horse men; nor being poor, to be seen in the race and shew place for to fet our games, or upon the Scaffold and Theater to represent Playes, or in great Halls full set with Tables to make feafts, and all to contend with rich men about glory and magnificence; but he is to fludy how to mannage the people by vertue, by gentleneffe, by wit and underflanding joyned al-wayes with wife words, wherein there is not only honefly and a venerable port, but also a kind of gracemore amiable, attractive, and defirable.

Then Crassus coin of silver and gold, Or all the money that can be told.

For to a good man it is not necessary to have a surly, coy, and presumptuous look; neither is it required that a wise and sober person should carry a stem and rigorous countenance.

Who as he walks along the streets, in city or in town, Doth cast a sharp and hideous eye, and on his neighbours frown.

But contrativite, a good man is first and formost affable and lightsome of language, of easie accesses, and ready to be spoken withal whosoever comes, having his house open alwayes, (as it were) an Haven, or Harbour of refuge, to as many as have occasion to use him. Neither is this debonairity and care of his, seen onely in the businesse and affaires of such as employ him, but also in this; that he will as well rejoyce with them who have had any fortunate and happy fine cesse, as condole and grieve with those unto whom there is besiden any calamity, or missfortune; never will he be known to be troublesome, and look for double diligence of a number of servitors and veriets to waite upon him to the baines, or flouphes; nor to keepe a stirre fortaking up and keeping of places for him and his traine at the Theaters where Playes and pastimes are to be seene, nor yet desire to be conspicuous, and of great marke above others in any outward signes of excessive delights, and sumptuous superfluities; but shew himselfe to be equal, like, and suitable to others in apparel, in his fare and furniture at the table, in the education and nurture of his Children, in the keeping of his Wile for her state and array, and in one word, be willing to carry and demeane himselse in all things, as an ordinary and plain Citizen, bearing no greater port and shew then others of the common multitude; moreover, at hand to give advice and coun-tel friendly to every man in his affairs, ready to entertaine, defend, and sollow their causes as an Advocate, freely, and without taking fee, or any confideration what soever; to reconcile man and wife when they be at ods, to make love dayes and peace between friends, not spending one little peece of the day for a shew at the Tribunal seat, or in the Hall of audience for the commonwealth, and then afterwards all the day, and the rest of his life, drawing unto himselfe all dealings, all negotiations and affairs from every fide for his own particular behoofe and profit, like unto the North East Wind Cacias, which evermore gathereth the clouds unto it: but continually bending his minde and occupying his head in careful study for the Weale-publick, and in effect making it appear unto the World, that the life of a States-man and a Governour, is not as the common fort think it, easie and idle, but a continual action and publick function; by which fashions and semblable courses that he taketh, he gaineth and winneth unto him the hearts of the people, who in the end come to know, that all the flattering devices and enticements of others be nothing else but false baits and bastard allurements, in comparison of his prudence and carefull diligence. The flatterers about Demetrius youchsafed not to call any other Princes and Potentates of his time, Kings, but would have Seleucsu to be named the Commander of the Elephants; Lysmachus the keeper of the Treasury; Prolomesus the Admiral of the Sea; and Agashocles the Governour of the Islands. But the people although peradventure at the first, they reject a good wife and fage person among them; yet in the end after they have seen his truth, and known his disposition and kind nature, they will repute him only to be popular, politick, and worthy to be a Magistrate indeed, and as for the rest, they will both repute and call one, the Warden and serter out of the Playes; another the great Featler; and a third, the President of Games, Combats, and publick exercises. Moreover, like as at the feasts and banquets that (allias, or Alcibiades were at the cost to make, none but Socrates was heard to speake, and all mens eyes were cast upon Socrates : even so in Cities and States governed aright, well may Ismenias deal largestes; Lichas make feasts, and Niceratus defray the charges of Playes, but Epaminondas, Ariftides, Ly (ander, and fuch as they, are those which beare the Magistracy, they govern at home, they command and conduct Armies abroad. Which being well and duly considered, there is no cause why you should be discouraged, or dismaid at the reputation and credit that they win among the people, who have for them builded Theaters, and erected thew-playes, founded Halls of great receit, and purchased for them common places of Sepulture, for to bury their dead: all which glory lafteth but a while, neither hath it any great matter, or venerable substance in it, but vanisheth away like smoak, and is gone even as foon as either the Playes in fuch Theaters, or Games in shew-places are done and

They that have skill and experience of keeping and feeding Bees, doe hold opinion and fay, that those Hives wherein the Bees yield the biggest found, make most humming and greatest stir within, like best, are most sound, healthful, and yield most store of honey; but he upon whom God hath laid the charge and care of the reasonable swarm (as I may say) and civil society of men, will judge the happinesse and blessed state thereof most of all by the quietnesse and peace therein, and in all other things he will approve the ordinances and statues of Solon, endeavouring to follow and observe the same to his full power; but doubt he will and marvel what he should mean by this, when hee writeth, that he who in a civil sedition would not range himselfe to a side, and take part with one or otherfaction, was to be noted with infamy: for in a natural body that is fick, the beginning of change toward the recovery of health, cometh not from the diseased parts, but rather, when the temperature of the found and healthy members is so puissant, that it chaseth and expelleth that which in the rest of the body was unkind and contrary to nature; even so in a City or State where the people are up in a tumult and fedition, so it be not dangerous and mortal, but such as is like to be appealed and ended, there had need to be a far greater part of those who are sound and not inse-&ed. for to remain and co-habit fill; for to it there cometh and hath recourse that which is natural and familiar, from the wife and discreet within, and the same entreth into the other infected part and cureth it: but such Cities as be in an universal uproar and hurly-burly, utterly perish and come to confusion, if they have not some constraint from without, and a chastisement which may force them to be wife and agree among themselves. Neither is my meaning, that I would have you politick person, and States man in such a sedition and civil discord to sit still, insensible, and without any passion or feeling of the publick calamity, to sing and chaunt your own repose and tranquility of bleffed and happy life, and whiles others be together by the ears, rejoyce artheir folly; ifor at such a time especially you are to put on the buskin of Theramens, which served as well the one leg as the other; then are you to parley and commune with both parties, without joining your iesse to one more than to the other; by which meanes, neither you shall be thought an adveriary, because you are not ready to offend either part, but indifferent to both, in aiding as well the one as the other, and envy shall you incurre none, as bearing part in their misery, in case you seem to have a fellow-feeling and compassion equally with them all; but the best way were to provide and forecass, that they never break out to tearms of open sedition; and this you are to think for to be the principall point, and the height of all posicy and civill government; for evident it is, and you may easily see, that (of those greatest) blessings which Cities can desire, to wit, peace, liberty, and freedome, entry and sertility, multitude of people, and unity and concord) as touching peace, Cities have no great need in these daies of wise governours, for to procure or maintenine the same, for that all wars both against the Greeks, and also the Barbarians, are chased away and gone our of sight; as for liberty, the people hath as much as it pleaseth their Sovereigns and Princes to give them, and peradventure if they had more, it would be worse for them: for the fertility of the carsh, and the abundance of all seasons are the dail fruits, the kind disposition and temperature of all seasons of the yeer, and that children so born, may live and be live-like; every good and wife man, will crave at Gods hands in the behalfe of his own fellow-Citizens. Now there remaineth for a States-man and politick governour, of all those works proposed one onely, and that is nothing inferiour to the rest of the bleffings above-named, to wit the unity and concord of Citizens that alwaies dwell together, and the banishing out of a City all quarrels, all jarres and malice, as the manner is in compofing the differences and debates of friends; namely, by dealing first with those parties which teem to be most offended, and to have taken the greatest wrong, in seeming to be injured as well as they, and to have no lesse cause of displeasure and discontent then they; afterwards by little and little to teek for to pacific and appeare them, by declaring and giving them to understand, that they who can be content to firike faile a little, doe ordinarily go beyond those who think to gaine all by force; furmount them I fay not onely in mildnesseand good nature, but also in courage and magnanimity, who in yeelding and giving place a little in in all matters, are mafters in the tend and conquerours in the best and greatest; which done, his part is to make remonstrance both particularly to every one, and generally to them all, declaring unto them the seeble and weake estate of Greece, and that it is very expedient for men of found and good judgement to enjoy the fruit and benefit which they may have in this weaknesse and imbecillity of theirs, living in peace and concord one with another as they do; confidering that fortune hath not left them in the midft any prize to win or to strive for. For what glory, what authority, what power or preeminence will remaine unto them that haply should have the better hand in the end, and bemasters over their adversaries, but a proconfull with one commandement of his, will be able to overthrow it, and transport it unto the other fide, as often and whenfoever it pleaseth him; but say that it should continue still, yet is it not worth all this labour and travell about it. But like as scare-fires many times begin not at state y Temples, and publike edifices, but they may come by some candle in a private and little house, which was neglected or not well looked unto, and so fell down and took hold thereof, or haply fraw or rushes and such like stuffe might catch fire and suddenly slame, and so thereupon might enfue much loffe, and a publike wasting of many faire buildings; even so it is not alwaies by means of contention and variance about affairs of State, that feditions in Cities be kindled, but many times braules and riots arifing upon particular causes, and so proceeding to a publike tumult and quarrel, have been the overthrow and utter subversion of a whole City. In regard whereof, it perteineth unto a politick man, as much as any one thing elie, to foresee and prevent, or else to remedy the same, to see (I say) that such diffentions do not arise at all, or if they be on foot to keep them down from growing farther and taking head, or at leastwife that they touch not the State, but rest still among whom it began : confidering this with himselfe and giving others to understand, that private debates are in the end causes of publike, and, small of great, when they be neglected at first, and no convenient remedies used at the very beginning. Like as by report the greatest civill diffention that ever happed in the City of Delphos, arose by the meanes of one Crates, whose daughter Oreslaus the some of Phalis, was at the point to wed: now it hapned by meer chance that the cup out of which they were to make an effay or effusion of wine in the honour of the gods first, and then afterwards to drinke one to another, according to the nuptiall ceremonies of that place, broke in. pieces of it selfe, which Orgilam taking to be an evill presige, for sook his espoused bride, and went away with his father, without finishing the complements of matriage. Some few daies after when they were facrificing to the gods; Crates conveied covertly or underhand a certaine vessell of gold, one of those which were facred and dedicated to the Temple, unto them, and so made no more adoe but caused Orgilaus and his brother, as manifest Church-robbers, to be pitched down headlong from the top of the rock at Delphos, without any judgement or form and processe of law: yea, and more then that killed some of their kinsfolke and friends, notwithstanding they intreated hard, and pleaded the liberties and immunity of Minerva's Temple, furnamed Provident, into which they were fled, and there took functuary. And thus after divers fuch murders committed, the Delphians in the end put Crates to death, and those his complices, who were the authors of this ledition. and of the money and goods of these excommunicate persons (for so they were called) seized upon by way of confication, they built those Chappels which stand beneath the City. At Syracuse also, of two young men who were very familiarly acquainted together, the one being to travell abroad out of his Country left in the cultody of the other a concubine that he had to keep until his return home againe; but he in the abience of his friend abuled her body: but when his companion upon his returne home knew thereof, he wrought fo, that for to cry quittance with him he lay with his wife and made him cuckold: this matter came to hearing at the Councell table of the City, and one of the ancient Senatours moved the rest, that both twaine should be banished out of the City, before there arose surther mischiese, and lest the City by occasion of their deadly sewd should be filled with parts-taking of both sides, and so be in danger of utter destruction; which when he could not periwade and bring to passe, the people grew into an open sedition, and after many milerable calamities, ruinated and overthrew a molt excellent State and government, You have heard I am fure of domesticall examples, and namely, the enmity of Pardalm and Tyrrhenus, who went within a very little of overthrowing the City of Sardis, and upon small and private causes, had brought the same into civill war and open rebellion by their sactions and particular quarrels. And thereforea man of government ought alwaies to be watchfull and vigilant, and not to neglect, no more than in a body naturall the beginnings of maladies, all little heart-burnings and offences that quickly passe from one to another, but to stay their course, and remedy the same with all convenient speed. For by a heedfull eie and carefull prevention, as Caro faith, that which was at first great, becommeth small, and that which was small commeth to nothing. Now to induce and perswade other mento to do, there is not a more artificiall device, nor a better meanes, than for a man of government to shew himselfe exorable, inclined to pardon, and easie to be reconciled in like cases; in principall matters of weight and greatest importance, resolute and constant without any rancour or malice, and in none at all feem to be felfe-willed, peevish, contentious, cholerick, or subject to any other passion which may breed a sharpnesse and bitternesse in necessary controversies, and doubtfull cases which cannot be avoided. For in those combats at buffets which champions perform for pleasure in manner of foiles; the manner is to bind about their fifts certaine round musfles like bals, to the end that when they come to coping and to let drive one at another, they might take no harm, confidering the knocks and thumps that they give are so soft, and cannot put them to any paine to speak of; even so in the sutes, processes and trials of law which passe between Citizens of the same City, the best way is to argue and plead by laying down their allegations and reasons, simply and purely, and not to sharpen or envenometheir matters like darts and arrowes, with poiloned taunts, railing tearms, opprobrious speeches, and spightfull threats, and so to make deep wounds, and the same sestered with venome, whereby the controversies may grow incurable, and augment still in such fort, that in the end they touch the State. He that can so carry himself in his own affairs, as to avoid these foresaid mischiess and dangers, shal be able to compass others in the like, and make them willing to be ruled by reasons so that alterwards, when once the particular occasions of privy grudges be taken away, the quarrels and discords which touch a Commonwealth, are sooner pacified and composed, neither do they ever bring anyin conveniences hard to be cured or remedilesse.

That mothers inductimetheir babes into sheworld may beare, Refembling in all points their fires, to wit, their fathers deare.

Whether an aged man ought to mannage publike affairs.

The Summary.

The title of this discourse discovereth sufficiently the intention of the author: but, for that they who an annage affairs in State, and namely men in yeers all offensimes into one of these two extremities at touching their duty, namely, that they be either too stack, and remissing on else more stiffe and severe than they ought; these precepts of Plutatch, aman well conversed in high places and officer, and who (as we may gather by his words) was well stricken in age when he wrote this Treatise onghis to be dissently read, considered and practified by men of authority. And about this book containeth some advertisements in that behalfe, which sort not wholly with the order of government put in practife in these our datest yet so it is, that the sundamentall reasons are so well laid, that any Politicians or States—man building the response, may assume the beginneth with the refusation of one common objection of certaine men, who enjoin and command elder solls fill and remain quiet, and he proves the contrary, namely, that then it is meet that they should be the this correction and caves withall, that they have been a long time already broken (as it were) to the world, and beaten in publique affairs, to the end that they bee not taxed and noted for their slender carriage or light vanity, nor prove the cause of the ena tima two; or mediing as they do in that which they had no well compenhed before. After fome great milchiefe, mediing as they do in that which they had no well compenhed before. After this he propofeth and laieth abroad the examples of men well qualified, who have given good proofe of this he propofeth and laieth abroad the examples of men well qualified, who have given good proofe of their sufficiency inoldinge: whereupon he inferreth, that those be the persons indeed, unto whom government doth appertaine, and that to go about for to make such idle now in their latter daies, were as absurd, and as much injury offered unto them, as to confine a prudent Prince and wife King to some house in the Country: and this he inforceth and verifieth by eloquent comparisons, and by the example of Pompeius, Which done, he fetteth down the causes which ought to put forward, and move a man well st pt in years to the government of a Common-weale, confuting those who are of the contrary opinion, and proving to the government of nontimon-none, companie more was are of the contrary opinion, and proving that elderly perform are more fit therefore than joinger, because of the experience and mukerity that age doth assorbether, as also in regard of many other reasons: then he returneth the objection upon them, and showeth that young folke are numers for publike charges, until et hey have been the disciples of the aged, or he directed and guided by them; he refureth those also who esseem that such a vication resembleth some particular traffick or negotiation : and when he hath so done, he taketh in hand againe his principall point, detecting and laying open the folly of those who would be rease old men of all administration of publike matters; and then he exhortes them to take heart and shundlen. I e (which he doth defame wonderfully) and festeth before their eies their duty : which he alfo considereth in particular: then he adviseth them not to take so much uson them; not to accept any charge unworthy, or not befeeming that gravity which time and age hath given them, but to occupy and bufie themselves with that which is honourable and of great consequence; to endeavour and strive for to serve their Country, and above all in matters of importance; to use good discretion as well in the refusal as the acceptation of dignities and offices, carrying themselves with such dexterity among young men, that they may induct and agemiss with open of virtue. And for a conclusion, he teacheth all preson who deale in State-affairs what resolution they bould put on and carry this her; that they have an assured testimony in themselves? that they be affectionate servitours of the Common-wealc.

E are not ignorant O Enphanes, that you are wont highly to praise the Poet Pindarus, and how you have oftentimes in your mouth these words of his, as being in your conceit well placed and pithily spoken to the point,

When games of prize and combats once are fet, Who shrinketh back and doth pretendsome let, In darkenesse hides and deep obscurity, His fame of vertue and activity.

But for a fmuch as men ordinarily alledge many causes and pretences, for to colour and cover their floth and want of courage to undertake the businesse and affaires of State, and among others, as the very laft, and as one would fay, that which is of the facred line and race, they tender unto us old age, and inppose they have found now one sufficient argument to dull or turn back the edge, and to cool the heat of feeking honour thereby, in bearing us in hand and faying: That there is a certaine convenient and meet end limited not only to the revolution of yeers, proper for combats and games of proofe, but also for publike affairs and dealings in State. I thought it would not be impertinent nor besides the purpose, if I should send and communicate unto you a discourse which sometimes I made privately for mine owne use, as touching the government of Common weale mannaged by men of yeers; to the end that neither of us twaine should abandon that long pilgrimage in this world which we have continued in travelling together, even to this present day, nor reject that civil life of ours, which hitherto we have led in swaying of the Common-weal, no more than a man would cast off an old companion of his own age, or change an ancient familiar friend, for another with whom he hath had no acquaintance, and who hath not time sufficient to converse and be made familiar with him. But let us in Gods name remain firm and constant in that course of life which we have choien from the beginning, and make the end of life and of well living all one and the same if we will not (for that small time that we have to live) discredit and desame that longer time which we have already led as if it had been spent soolishly and in vaine, without any good and laudable intention. Fortyrannicall dominionis not a fair momument to be enterred in, as one said sometime to Denis the tyrant: for unto him this monarthical and absolute sovereignty gotten and held by so unjust and wicked means the longer that it had continued before it failed, the greater and more perfect calamityit would have brought; according as Diogenes afterwards feeing the faid Dionysius his ion become a poor private man, & deposed from the princely & tyrannical dignity which he had, O Diony sine (quoth he how unworthy art thou of this estate, & how unfitting is it for thee! for thou oughtest not to live here inliberty, and without any fear or doubt of any thing with us, but remain there stil as thy father did immur'd up and confin'd (as it were) within a fortrels althy life time, until extream old age came. But in truth, a popular government which is just and lawful, wherein a man hath been conversant & shewed himself alwaies no less profitable to the Common-wealth, in obeying than in commanding, is a faire Sepulcher for him, to be buried honourably therein, and to bestow in his death the glory of his life: for this is the last thing (as Simonides faid) that deicendeth and goeth under the earth; unlesse we speak of them whose honour, bounty and vertue dieth first, and in whom the zeale of performing their duty doth faile and ceale before that the covetous defire of things necessary to this lie giveth over: as if the divine parts of our foule, and those which direct our actions were more fraile and died sooner then the sensual and corporall; which neither were honesty to say, nor good to believe, no more than to give credit unto those who assime that in getting and gaining only, we are never weary: but rather we are to bring that faying of Thucydides to a better purpose, and not to beleeve him who was of minde, that not ambition alone and defire of glory, aged in a man, but alio (and that much rather) lociality or willingnesse to live and converse with company, and civility and affection to policy and mannaging publike of affairs; a thing that doth persevere and continue alwaies to the very end even in Ants and Bees: for never was it known, that a Bee with age became a Drone; as some there be who would have those who all their life time were imploied in the State, after the vigor and ftrength of their age is past, to fit still and keep the house, doing nothing else but cat and feed as if they were mued up, fuffering their active vertue, through ease and idlenesse to be quenched and marred, even like as iron is eaten and confumed with ruft and canker, for want of occupying. For Caro laid very wife y: That fince old age had of it selfemileries enough of the one, they ought not to add moreover the reunto the shame that proceedeth from vice, for to mend the matter, Now among many vices that be, there is not one that more shameth and desameth an old man, than restivenesse, sloth, delicacy and voluptuousnesse: namely when he is seen to come down from the Hall and Courts of Justice, or out of the councel chamber and such publike places, for to go and keep himself close in a corner of his house like a woman, or to retire into some farm in the Country to oversee his mowers reapers, and harvest-folke, of whom it may well be said, as we read in Sophocles:

What is become of wife Oedipus, Inriddles a-re: ding, who was so famous?

For to begin to meddle in affaires of State in old age, and not before (as it is reported that one Epimenides laid him down to fleep when he was very young, and wakened an old man fifty years after) and ere he have fhaken off and laid afide fo long repole and redt that hat flucke fo clofe unto him by ufe and cuftome, to go and put himfelfe all at once upon a fudden into fuch travels and laborious negotiations, being nothing trained nor insured therein, not framed nor exercised thereto in any meature without converting at all beforehand with men experienced in matters of effates, nor having practifed worldly affairs might peradventure give good occasion to one that were disposed to reprove and find fault, for to fay that which the Prophetelle Pythias answered once to one who confuted with the oracle of Applia about the like case:

For government and rule of City state, Who ever thou be, thou commest too late: An houre this is undecent and past date, Thus for to knock at Court or Palace-gate, like an unmanerly guest who commeth to a feast; or a rude traveller, who seeketh for lodging when it is dark night; for even so thou wouldst remove not to a place, nor to a region, but to a life whereof thou hast no proofe and triall. As for this fentence and verse of Simonides:

The City can instruct a man.

True it is, if it be meant of them who have fufficient time to be taught and to learne any fcience, which is not gotten but hardly and with much ado after great fludy, long travell, continual excitie and practitie; provided also, that it meet with a nature painfull and laborious, patient, and able to undergo all advertices of fortune. Their reasons a man may seem very well, and to the purpose to alledge against those who begin when they be well stricken in yeares to deale in publike affaires of the State, And yet we see the contrary how men of great wisclome and judgement divert children and yong men from the government of Common-weal, who also have the testimony of the lawes on their side, by ordinance whereof at Athems the publike Crier or Beadle celleth and summonent to the pulpit or place of audience, not such as yong Asteiniads so Pythias, for to stand up first and speak before the assembly of the people, but those that be above fifty yeers of age; and such they exhort both tomake orations, and also to deliver their minds, and counsell what is most expedient to be done.

And Cato being accused when he was fourescore yeers old and upward, in pleading of his own cause, thus answered for himselse: It is an harder matter my masters (quoth he) for a man to render an account of his life, and to justifie the slame before other men than those with whom hehat lived, And no man there is, but he will consesse that the acts which Casar Angustus atchieved a little before his death in deseating Antonius, were much more roial and profitable to the weal-publike, than any others that ever he performed all his life time before: and himselse in restraining and reforming secretly by good customes and ordinances, the dissolute riots of young men, and namely, when they mutined, said no more but thus unto them: Listen young men, and heare an old man speake, whom old men gave eare unto when he was but young. The government also of Periceles was at the height and of greatest power and authority in his old age, at what time ashe persuaded the Athenians to enter upon the Peloponnesiack warre: but when they would needs in all hiss, and out of salon, set forward with their power to encounter with 60000 men all armed and well appointed, who forraged and wasted their territory, he withstood them, and hindered their defigned enterprife, and that in manner by holding fure the armour of the people out of their hands, and (as one would fay) by keeping the gates of the City fall locked and lealed up. But as hands, and (as one worked) of mortism of Ageiliams, it is worthy to bee delivered word for word, as he fetteeth it down in these teams; What youth (quoth he) was ever so gallant, blue his age furpassed it? what man was there ever in the flower and very best of all his time, more dread and terrible to his enemies, than Ageflaus was in the very latter end of his daies? whole death and territore on a checkers, the state of Agricultural Reins patter whose death at any time was more joyill to the enemies than that of Agricultural though he was very old when he died? what was he that emboldened allies and confederates, making them afforced and confident, if Agefilau did not, notwithstanding he was now at the very pits brinke, and had in manner one foot already in his grave? What young man was ever more miffed among his friends, and lamented more bitterly when he was dead than Ageilam, how old so eyer he was when he departed whis life?

The long time that these noble gerson ages lived, was no impediment unto them in archieving such noble and honourable services; but we in these daies play the delicate wantons in government of Cities where there is neither tyranny to suppresse, nor war to conduct nor sieguro be raised; and being secured from troubles of war, we fit still with one hand in another, being groupled only with civil debates among Citizens, and some emulations, which for the most partare voided and brought to an end by vertue of the lawes and justice only with words. We forbear (Ifay) and draw back from dealing in these publike affairs for feare, consessing our selves herein to be more cowardly and falledealing in the property of the property of the property of the people in old time, but even worfe than Poets, Sophifters and Platers in Tragedies and Comedies of those dates. If it be true, as it is, that Simonides in his old age wan the prize for enditing ditties, and fetting fongs in quires and dances, according to the epigram made of him, which testifieth no lesse in the last verses thereof, running in this manner.

Fourefore years oldwas Simonides
The Poet, and some of Treoprepes,
When for his carrols and musicall vaine,
The prize he won and bonour did gaine.

It is reported also of Sophocles, that when the was accused judicially for dotage by his own children, who laied to his charge that he was become a child againe, unfitting for governing his house, and had need therefore of a guardianibeing convented before the Judges, he rehearted in open Court the entrance of the Chorus, balonging to the Tragedy of his, entituled Ocalpus in Colono, which beginneth in this wife: Welcome firager as the entrance.

peth in this wife:

Walcome stranger as thy entry.
To village best of this Country,
Renowned for good sheeds in sight,
The Tribe of faire Colonus high:
Where nighting ale doth of resport.
Her dolefull moanes for to report:
Amid green bowers which she doth hauns,
Her sundry notes and laies to chans,
With voice so shrill as in no ground,
Essenber her songs so much resound,
Essenber her songs so much resound,

And for that this canticle of former wonderfully pleafed the Judges and the reft of the company, they all arose from the bench, went out of the Court, and accompanied him hometo his house with great acclamations for joy, and clapping of hands in his honour, as they would have done in their departure from the Theater where the Tragedy had been lively acted indeed. Also it is confessed for certeine, that an epigram also was made of Sophoeles to this effect?

When Sophocles this sonnet wrote To grace and honour Herodote; His daies of life by just account; To fiftie five years did amount,

Philemon and Alexis, both comicall Poets, chanced to be atrefted and surprised with death even as they plaied their Comedy upon the stage for the prize, and were about to be crowned with againands for the victory. As for Paulns [or Palus] the actour of Tragedies, Eratoshtenes and Paluschows do report. That when he was threestore years old and ten, he acted eight Tragedies within the space of soure daies, a little before his death. Is it not then a right great shame, that old men who have made profession either to speak unto the people from the tribunall seat, or to sit upon the bench for to minister justice, should shew less generosity and magnanimity than those who play their parts upon a scassfold or stage? and namely, in giving over those facted games and combats indeed, to cast off the person of a politician and man of honour, and to put on another (I wor not what) in stead thereostor I assure you, to lay down the rolal diguity of a King, for totake up the personage of an husbandman, were very base and mechanicall and considering that Demosshemes said how the facted galley Parasha was unworthly and shamefully mibiled, when it was put and emploied to bring home for Meid as, wood and timber, slates and tiles, sed muttons or such like satings: if a man of honour and effate should at any time give up and resign his dignity of superintendency over the publike seafs of Beastary, or government over Bassia, of presidents ship in that great Councell or assembly of estates called Amphystiones, and then ascerwards be seen occupied in measuring and selling meale, of the refule and cakes either of grapes and olives after they be pressed, or to weigh sleeces of wooll, or to make merchandise of their fels; were not this as much altogether, as (according to the old proverb) to put on the age of an old horse without constraint of any perion? Moreover, to go to any bale and vile occupation or handicraft, or to traffick in therchandile, after one hath Borne office of government in the Common-weale, were all one as to turne a gentle-woman well descended, or a sober matron, out of all her fair and decent apparell, for to give her an apron only or fingle petitioarto cover her shame, and forto let herfor apparell, for to give her an apron only or ingle pettroar to cover her iname, and to to tet her for to keep in home taven or victualling house; for even for, all the digarry mightly and continuance of vertue politick is quite 10th, when it is debated to any fuch vile miniferies and trades, imelling only of have and gaine. But in case (which is the only point remaining behind) they call this a fiven and then this limit is and the only point remaining behind) they call this a fiven and then this limit and the only point remaining behind) they call this a fiven and then this thick and the only point remaining behind) they call this a fiven and then this point and the only point remaining the first of the latter of the minute of the two pictures, dishonethe and themelous both twaine, this like of his were better to be likened; who ther to that of the Mariners, who would folemine the feat of Venus all their life rime, being not yet between with their thip into the haven or harbor, but leaving it full under faile in the open less or to the painted table of Herculet; "whom some painters merily and in sport, but nor seemly and with reverence, depaint how he was in the rotall Palace and Court of the Lydian Queen Omphale, in a yellow coat like a wench; making wind with a fanne, and fetting his mind with other Lydian damosels and waiting maids; to broid his haire and trick up himselse : even to we despoiling a man of effate of his lions skin, that is to fay, of his magnanimous courage, and a minde to be alwaies profiting the Common wealth, and fetting him to take fils eafe at the table, will makehing good cheer continually, and delight his eares with pleafant longs, with found of flutes, and other musicall infruments: being nothing at all ashamed to heare that speech which sometime Pompeius Magnus gave unto Lucullus, who (after his wars and conducts of armies, giving over all regiment of State, wholly was addicted to banes and ftoupnes, to feating, to wantonnelle and company with women in the day time, to all diffolure life and superfluous delights, even so much, as to build sumptuous edifices, beseeming rather men of yonger yeers) reproved Pompeius for his ambicion and defire of government above that which became his age; for Pompeim answered unto him, and faid: It is more unfeafonable for an aged man to live loofely and in superfluity, than to govern and beare role. Againe, the same Pompey being one day falken lick, which his Physician hadprescribed him a black-bird for to ear, which was at that time out of season, and could not be had in the market for any mony, and one made answer that Lucultum had good store of them, for he kept and fed them in mue all the yeare long; he would neither fend to him for one, nor receive any from him, saying withall: What? unlesse home be a belly gold and glutton, cannot Rompe tell how to recover and live? For say that nature seeketh by all means possible to take her pleasure and delight, yet surely she disableth the body of old solks, and denieth it the fruition of all pleasures. fures, unlesse it be in some few necessities of this life;

As Euripides the Poet faith, but also their appetite to eat and drink is for the most part dull and overthrowen with mois, and as one would fay toothlefs, in such fort as they do but mymble, touch their siduals a little aloft, and hardly and with much adoe enter and pierce inwardly into the fame, In which regard they ought to be furnished and provided of pleasures of the mind, not such as are base, slibberall, and sile as Simonides said unto those who reproached him for his avarice; for being bereft of all other fleshly and corporall pleasures by reason of his yeers, he entertained one still which fed and mainteined his old age, and that was the delight which he took in gerting money, and gathering goods: but the life politick of those who mannage affairs, hath many pleasures, and those right great and honest, in which onely or principally it should seem that the gods themselves take joy and contentment; and these be they that proceed from beneficence, ordoing good unto many, and the glory of some worthy and noble act. For if the painter Nicias pleased his owne mind to well in his workmanship, and was so affectionate to the operation of his art, that oftentimes hee forgat himselfe, and would aske his servants whether he had washed, and whether hee had dined, or no: If Archimedes also was so bent and intentive unto the table before him, in which he drew his figures geometricall, that his fervitours were faine to pluck him from it by force, forto wash and annoint him, and yet in the mean time that they were annointing of him, hee would be drawing and describing of new figures upon his owne body : If Canus likewise the plaint of the fluit (a man whom you know well enough) was wont to fay: That men wist not how much more mirth hee made unto himselfe in his playing, than he did unto those that heard him sound; and that they that came to heare his musick, ought rather to receive a reward of him, than bellow any money upon him. Do we not conveive and imagine in our selves, what great-pleasures vertues do yield unto those who effect any commendable action tending to the good of their Country, and turning to the profit of the Common-weile? they tickle not they itch not, neither do they aftera stroking manner give contentment, as do these sweet motions, and gentle pricks of the slesh; for fuch bring with them a certaine impatient itch, an unconstant tickling mingled with a furious heat and inflammation; but those pleasures which come from notable and praise-worthy deeds, such as

How then commethit; that an elid man should be afraid to meddle in State-affaires, as if it were a charge unsupportable; full of infinite and innumerable travels, without any comfort and consolation at all? considering that there be allowed at times, vavels, without any comfort and confolation at all P confoldering that there be allowed at times, variety of plaies and games, goodly fights and flowers; foldering that there is and warriety of plaies and games, goodly fights and flowers; foldering the flowers; and hately pomps, public doler and targeties; fraithers; mitch and teaths and ever anoth the flowerable fertice and worthip of only dolers and with the flowers and himbelief the browley; fighthately and the flower the flower and the flower that the f thither; but after it is accultomed and acquainted once with the glory of a man, and when it hath been nourified and fed therewith it is not for troublefome and churliffs but becommeth more kinde and gentle; and this is the reason that some have likened envy unto a smoak, which at the fift when the fire beginneth to kindle, arileth groffe and thick, but after that it burneth light and clear, vanisheth away and is gone. In all other preeminences and superiorities, men are wont ordinarily to debate and quartell, namely, about vertue, nobility of blood and honout, as being of opinion, that the more then yield ware others, the more they doe abridge from themselves; but the pre-rogative or precedence of time, which properly is called Presbeion, as if a man would say; the ho-nour of age, or Time-right is void of all jealouse and emulation; and there is no man but will willingly yeeld it rollis companion; neither is there any kind of honour whereunto so well forter this quality, namely, to grace him more who give h the honour, than the party who is honoured, as to the pterogative, which is given to old men. More oversall men do not hope nor espect to have to the pierogative, which is givening out men, more pressure not not note not expect to have credit one time or other by their riches, by their eloquence or wifedome; whereas you shall not feeld much as one of those that mig in Common wealth, to defpaire of comming one day to that authority and reverence which old age bringest menunto. He therefore who after he hath wrethled long against eavy; retireth in the end from the administration of the Common weal, at what time as it is well appealed, and at the point to be extinguished or laid along, should doe like unto that pilot, who in a temper having winde and waves contrary, spreadeth falle, and rewerh in great half protes who he semper that may write a my ways contains a present and a semperative and a gentle gale of forewind fewerths, doth goe about so firshe faile and ride at anchor in the plealant funne-thine; he findled, I fay in 6 doing, abandon together with his publike affairs, the fociety, fellowship, alliance and intelligences, which he had with his good friends; for the more time that he pad, the more friends by good reason be ought to have gotten, for to fland with him and take his part, whom he neither cannor all at once lead forth with him, like as a mafter of catols his whole quire of finging men; no meet it is and readon, that hee should leave and fortake them all: but as it is not an ease piece of worke to fock up by the root old trees, no more is it athing, foon done to eatip a long government in the Common weale, as having many great roots, and those enterlaced and enwrapped one within another, by reason of fundry and weighty affaires, the which no doubt must needs work more trouble and veration to those that retire and departurem it, than to those that tarry still by it; and say there remained yet behind so; old men some reliques of envy, emulation, and contention, which serves much et me of their governments it were sare better to extinguish and quench, the same by powers and authority, than to turn both side and back upto them, all naked and disarmed: for envisions persons and exill, willers never do affaile them same to the same desired, who make head againe and stand their ground, as they do by contempt those who yeeld back and retire; and so this accordets well that which in times past, that great Epogrisands said unto the Thebans. For when the Accadians had made offer unto theirs, year and repureded them to enter into their Cities, during the winter season, and there to lodge and abide under covert; he would not permit them so to does now to accept of their courtese: For now (quoth he), all the while that they behold you exercing and wrefilling in your amour, they have you in great admiration, as valiant and hardy men; but if they should see you once by the fire side punning and stamping, beaness, they would take you to bee no better than themselves; exer so I would make my application, and inserte hereupon; that it is a venerable and goodly sight to behold a graye, and, ancient personage seaking to, the people, dispatching affaires of State, and generally to be honoured of every man; but he who all the day another, by reason of fundry and weighty affaires, the which no doubt must needs work more troudispatching affaires of State, and generally to be hopoured of every man; but he who all the day long this not out of his warm bed, or it he be up, fitteth fill in some corner of a gallety, prating and talking vainly, or elle reaching, hauking, spitting, or wiping his nose that drops for cold; such an one I fay is exposed to contempt. Homer werely himselfe hath raughr us this lesson, if we will marke and give good ear to that which he hath written. For old Nesson being at the war before Trop, was had in honour and reputation; whereas contrariwise Peleus and Laertes who tarried behind at home, were ser little by and despised. For the habitude of wiledome doth not continue the same, nor is any thing like it selle, in those who give themselves to ease, and doe not practice the same ; but through idlenesse and negligence it diminisherh, and is dissolved by little and little, as having need alwaies of some exercise of the cogitation and thought which may awaken the spirit, clear the dis-

Like as both iron and brasse is bright and clear,

All while mans hand the same doth assenting and weare;

Whereas the heals wherein onne dwels as all,

Neither is the infimity and feeblenesse of the body so great an hinderance unto the government of States in those who above the strength of their age deem either to mount into the tribunall, or to the bench, or to the generals pavilion and place of audience within the camp, as otherwise their years bring good with them, to wit, considerate circumspection, and stated witedome: as also not to be troubled or driven to a non plus in the mannaging of any businesse, or to commit an absurdity and error partly for want of experience, in part upon vaine-glory, and fo to draw the multitude therewith and do mulchiefe to the Common-wealth all at once 3 like unto a fea to fled with winds but to treat and negotiat gently; mildly, and with a feeled judgement, with those who come unto them for advice, or have any affairs, or to do with them. And hereupon it is, that Ciries after they have sufferned some great shake or adverte calamitte, or when they have been affrighted, defire streight-waies to he ruled by ancient men, and those well experienced; in which cases they have many times drawn perforce an old man out of his house in the Country, for to govern them, who thought or defired nothing lesse; they have compelled him to lay his hand upon the helme, for to set all streight and upright againein security, rejecting in the meane while green headed generals of armies, eloquent Oratours alto, who knew well enough how to speake aloud, and to pronounce long clauses and periods with one breath, and never fetching their wind; yea, and beleeve me brave warriours and worthy Captains indeed, who had been able and sufficient to have affronted their enemies, and fought valiantly in the field, Like as upon a time at Athens, the Oratours there shewing before Timothem and Iphicrates, who were farre stept in yeares, one named Chares the some of Theochares, who was a lufty young man, in the flowre of his age and mighty of body, stripped out of his apparell, defired that he who was to be Captaine Generall of the Athenians, were such an one as he for years and for perion: God forbid (quoth Timothem) but rather I could wish the generals varlet to be fuch an one, who is to carry after him his bed and the furniture thereto belonging. As for the Commander and leader of an Army, he ought to be a man that knoweth how to see into the State, both before and behind, and who will not fuffer his counsels and resolutions for the weal publike, to be troubled and difordered by any paffion what foever: for Sophacles when he was now become aged: I am well appaid (quoth he) that I am now escaped from wanton love, and the delights of Venus; as being delivered from the Subjection of a furious Lord and raging Master. But in the administration of the Common-wealth, a man is not to avoid and flye one fort of Masters, to wit, the love of boies and wenches, but many others which be more outragious than it, and namely, emulation and a contentious spirit, defire of vaine glory, and a longing to be alwaies, and in every thing the first and the greatest; a vice that engendereth most of any other, envy, jealousies, conspiracies, and factions; of which old age doth let flack some, and dull their edge, others it cooleth and extinguisheth cleane, neither diminisheth and impaireth it the inclination and affection to well doing so much, as it represent and cutteth off the passions which are too violent and over-hot, to the end that it may apply unto the care and study about assays, the discourse of reason, sober staied, and well fetled: howbeit in very truth, and in the judgement of the readers, let this speech of the Poet

Stirre not from thence and have no dred,
be alledged and spoken for to distinate and distract him, who would with his grisled beard and gray head begin now to be young and play the youth, as also to tax and reprove an old grand-fire, who after long repose in his house, out of which he hath not stirred, no more than in the time of a languishing disease, will needs start up now on a sudden, and all at once bestirre his old bones to be a Captaine forfooth in all haft, to lead an army, or elfe to take upon him the charge of governing a City. But hee that would call away and reclaim one, who hath been trained and emploied all the daies of his life in politick affairs, and throughly beaten to the world, and the administration of the Common weale, not suffering him to runne forward in that course of life untill he have atteined the goale, nor untill he have gained the prize of his victory, but will feem to turn him out of his long journie for to take another wayshe (I say) is altogether senslesse and unreasonable, and nothing resembleth the man we speak of Like as he who to divert an old man being set out like a youth, with a chaplet of fresh flowers upon his head, perfumed with sweet odours, and already to be married, would alledge those verses which in a Tragady were sometime said unto Philosteres,

What maiden young, what fresh and lusty bride Will marry thee, to be close by thy fide? Alas, poor man for pity, at this age were nothing abfurd nor out of the way, and befide the purposes for even old folk themselves, when they are disposed to be merry, have many such jests as these passe current among them:

I marry old, how faire I am bested

Well wot I, for my neighbour I do wed.
But hee that would perswade a man already married, to leave his wife with whom he hath lived so long in wedlock, and dwelt together in one house without quarrels and complaints, supposing that because he is now grown in years with her, he should forsake her, and live either a single life, apart by himselse, or else keep a lemon or concubine instead of his lawfull wedded wife, in my conceit were a very abfurd for in the highest degree; even so it standeth to good reason, for to deale with an old man who having one foot already in his grave, or with one Clidon who had been an husbandman all his life time; or with one Lamporthe Merchant adventurer, who hath done nothing all his daies, but used shipping and traffick beyond seasor with some of these Philosophers out of Epicurus his orchard, who love a life to sit still and do nothing, to admonst and disting them from approaching unto the publike affairs of the people, and to counsell them to hold them still to their former accultomed courie of life farre from troubles and busie dealings in Common weale: mary, he thattook such an one as Phocion Cato or Pericles by the hand, and said: My friend of Athens or Rome, whoever you are now that you be arrived to withered old age make a divorce with the Commonweale, quit from this day forward all publike administration, all cares and affairs, aswell of councell as of war; abandon both the tribunall feat in the City, and also the pratory or pavilion of State in the camparetire your felse into an house in the Country, and live the rest of your life there with 322

one maid-fervant to attend upon you; follow your husbandry, or else imploy your selfe in your private houshold, to take accounts and reckonings of your receivers and tactours; surely he should pertivade him to unjust things, and exact of a Statef-man and politician that which neither pleateth nor yet beseemeth him. How then? will some man say unto me, never heard we the old sould dier how he speaketh thus in the Comedy?

My hoary haires from warfare set me free, That from henceforth enroll'd I shall not be

Yes for footh good Sir, it is very true; for requilite it is, and fit, that the squires and servitours of Mars should be in the flower and full strength of their age, as those who make prosession of warre, and the painfuls services belonging the reto, whose gray shaires, although the shead-piece and morion of ohide and cover, yet inwardly their limmes are heavy and decaied by yeers, and their strength is not to their good will, nor their shand answerable to their heart. But of the ministers of Jupiter, stranged Counseller, Oratour, and Patron of Cities, we require not the works of seet nor of hashs, but of counsells, sorcast and eloquence; and yet not such cloquence I meane, as should make astit, or raise a noise, out-cry and shout among the people, but that which is stull of inpenderstanding, of considerate wisedome, and of good directions and plots well and surely laid. In which persons, the white head and gray beard (which some laugh and make good gameat) the crow-foot about the cies, the surrowes in the forehead, the rivels and wrinkles inthe face besides appearing, bear witnessed of long experience, and add unto them a reputation and authority, which help much to persivade and to draw the minds of the hearers unto their will and purpose. For to speak truly, youth is made (as it were) to follow and boey, but age to guide and command: and that City State is preferved, wherein the sage counsels of the Elders, and the matriall prowesse of the younger, bearefway together. And for this cause highly and wonderfully are these verses following praised in Homer, and namely in the first place:

Then to begin, a goodly fort of ancient captaines bold, Assembled he in Nestors ship,
a counsell there to hold.

Upon the same reason also, that counsell of the wisest and principall men assistant unto the Kings of Lacedamon for the better government of the State, the Oracle of Apollo Pythius first called HeroBuyéroas, i. Elders: and Lycurgus afterwards directly and plainly tearmed Γέρντας, i. Old men; and even at this very day, the Councell of Estate in Rome is named a Senate, that is to say, an assembly of ancient persons. And like as the law and custome, time out of minde, hath allowed unto Kings and Princes the diadem, that is to fay, a royall band or frontlet, the crown also to stand upon their heads, as honourable marks and enfignes of their regall dignity and fovereign authority; even fo hath nature given unto old men the white head and hoary beard as honourable tokens of their right to command, and of their preeminence above others. And for mine own part, I verily think that this Noun in Greek, viege, which fignifieth a prize or reward of honour, as also the Verb reguleur, which is as much to fay, as to honour, continue still in use, as respective to the honour due unto old men (who in Greek are called preferres) not for that they bath in hot waters, or fleep in softer beds; but because in Cities well and wifely governed, they be ranged with Kings for their prudence; the proper and perfect goodnesse whereof, as of some tree which yieldeth winter fruit which is not ripe before the latter end of the yeer, nature bringeth forth late and hardly in old age: and therefore there was not one of those martiall and brave couragious Captains of the Greeks, who found fault with that great King of Kings, Agamemnon, for making such a prayer as this unto the

That of the Grecian hoft which stood of many worthy men, Such counsellers as Nestor was, they would vouch sife him ten.

but they all agreed with him, and by their filence confessed, That not only in policy and civillgovernment, but also inwarre, old age carieth a mighty great stroak: for according as the ancient proverb beareth witnesse:

One head that knowes full wifely for to reed,
Out-goes ten hands, and maketh better speed.

One advice likewile, and fentence grounded upon reason, and delivered with perswasive grace, effecteth the greatest and bravest exploits in a whole State. Well, say that old age hath many difficulties and discommodities attending upon it. yet is not the same therefore to be rejected: for the absolute rule of a King, being the greatest and most persechestate of all governments in the world, hath exceeding many cares, travels and troubles; insomuch as it is written of King Sclaucous, that he would oftentimes (ay, if the people wist how laborious and painfull it were to read and write only so many letters as he did, they would not deinto take up his diadem, if they sound it thrownin their very way as they go, And Philip being at the point to pitch his camp in a fair ground, when he was advertised that the place would not affoord forage for his labouring beafts: O Hercules (quoth he) what a like is this of ours, that we mult live (torsooth) and care to serve the necessity of our Ales Why, then belike it were high time to perswade a King when he is aged, for to lay down his diadem, to cast off his robes of purple, to clad himself in simple array, to take a crooked staffe in hand, and so to go and live in the Country, for fear lest if he with his gray hairs reigned stil, he should seem to do many inperfluous and impertanent things, and to direct matters out of season? Now if it were unfeemly and a meer indignity to deal with Agessilans, with Nums and Darius, all Kings and monarchs, after this fort; unmeet likewise it is, that we should remove and diplace Solon out of the Councell of Areopagus, or depose Cato from his place in the Romane Senate, because of their old age. Why should we then go about to perswade such a one as Perioles, to give over and resigne his government in a popular State? for over and besides, there were no sense at all that if one have leapt and mounted into the tribunall feat or chaire of estate in his young yeers, and afterwards discharged upon the people and Common-wealth those his violent passions of ambition and other furious hts, when ripe age is now come, which is wont to bring with it differentian and much wildome gathered by experience, to abandon and put away (as it were) his lawfull wife, the government which he hath fo long time abused. The lox in Lop's fables, would not suffer the urchin to take off the tiques that were setled upon her body: For it (quoth shee) thou take away these that be already full there will come other hungry ones in their place; and even fo, if a State rejected evermore from administration of the Common-wealth those governous that begin once to be old, it must needs be quickly full of a fort of young Rulers, that be hungry and thirsty both after glory, but altogether void of politick wit and reason to govern: for how can it otherwise be? and where should they get knowledge, if they have not been disciples to learn, nor spectators to follow and imitate some ancient Magistrate that mannageth State-affairs? The Cards at sea which shew the feat of failing and ruling ships, cannot make good sea-men or skilfull Pilots, if they have not been themselves many times at the steam in the poop, to see the manner of it, and the consider against the waves, the winds, the black storms and dark tempests,

How then possibly can a young man govern and direct a City well, perivade the people aright, and deliver wife counfell in the Senate, having but read one little book treating of policy, or haply written an exercise or declamation in the School Lyccum touching that argument? un esse besides he have flood close unto the reines, or hard by the helme many a time, and by marking both City Rulers, and martiall Captaines, how they have but been put to their triall, and according to the fundry experiences and accidents of fortunes, enclining now to the one fide and then to the other, after many dangers and great affairs, have gotten sufficient knowledge and instruction before hand? I cannot fee how it can be: but if there were no other thing at all besides; yet surely an ancient manis to mannage still the affairs of State, and it were but to traine and teach the younger, that be to come up after him : for like as they who teach children musick, or to read do themselves Sol, fa, and fing the note, they finger and firike the key or firing, they read and spell the letters before them; and all to shew how they should do; even so the ancient politician doth frame and direct a young man, not onely by reading unto him, by discoursing and advertising him without foorth; but allo in the very mannaging and administration of affaires, fashioning, forming and calting him (as it were) lively in a monld, as well by operation and example, as by words and preceits. For he that is schooled and exercised herein, not in the Schools of the Sophisters that can speak in number and measure, as in the wrestling hall where the body is annointed with a composition of oile and wax together against exercises performed without any danger at all-but (as it were) at the very publike games indeed, in the view of the whole world, such as the Olympicks and Pythicks were: he (Isay) followeth the tracts and footsteps of his Master and teacher, as faith Simonides:

As sucking foale that keeps just pace, And runs with dam in every place.

Thus did Aristides under Callisthenes Cimonunder Aristides, Phocion under Chabrias, Catounder Fabius Maximus, Pompeius under Sylla, and Polybius under Philopemen. For all these personages when they were young, drew neer and joined themselves with others that were ancient, and having takenroot close by them, grew up together with them in their actions and administrations, whereby they got experience, and were inured to the mannaging of the State with honour and reputation. Alchimes the Academick Philosopher, when certaine envious Sophisters of his time charged him and laid: That he made a semblance and shew, that he had been the Dif. iple and hearer of Carneades, whereas he never was. I say unto you (quoth he) that I heard the man, when as his speech abandoning the bruit applaule and tumultuous noise of the people, by reason of his old age was shut up close and housed (asit were) for to do good more familiarly in private conference. And even foit is with the government of an aged perion, when as not only his words, but also his deeds befare remotefrom affected pomp in outward shewes, and all vaine glory. Much like as it is reported of the black Storke, called Ibis, who by that time that she is become old, hath exhaled and breathed forth all that firong and flinking savour wich she had, and beginneth to yield a sweet and aromaticallsmel; even so, there is no counsell nor opinion in old men, vain, turbulent or inconstant, but all grave, quiet, and fetled. And therefore in any wife (as I faid before) if it were but for young mens sake onely and no more, elder persons are to weld the affaires of State: to the end that as

Plato speaking of wine mingled with water, said that it was to make the furious god wise, by chassis fing him with another that was fober and temperate: the staied wisedome of old age tempered with youth, welling and boiling before the people; and transported with the greedy denre of honour, and with ambition, might cut off that which is furious, raging and over-violent.

But over and befides all that hath been faid before, they who think, that to be emploied in the mannaging of publike affaires, is all one as to faile for traffick, or to go forth to warre in some expedition, are much deceived: for both navigation and also warre, men undertake for a certaine end, and no sooner have they attained thereto but they cease: but the mannaging of State-affairs is not a commission or office precending or intending any profit and commodity for the stope the i.i. fhootethat; but it is the life and profession of a living creature, which is gentle, tame, civill, and sociable, born to live so long as it pleaseth nature, civilly honestly, and for the publike good of humane fociety. This is the reason, that of a man it should be said, that he still is occupied in such asfairs of Common-weal, and not that he hath been for emploied: like as to be true, and not to have been true; to be just, and not to have been just; to love his Countrey and Citizens, and not to have loved them, is his duty and profession. For even nature her selfe directeth us hereto, and singeth this lesson in our eares (I speak to those who are not altogether corrupted and marred with sloth

Thy father thee a man hath once begat: To profit men alwaies in this or that. Againe:
Let us not cease nor any end finde
To do all good unto mankinde.

As touching them who pretend and alledge for excuse, feeblenesse or impotency, they do accuse ficknesse and the maimed indisposition of the body rather than age. For you shall see many young men fick and feeble, and as many old folke lufty and ftrong; fo we are not to remove aged persons simply from the administration of the Common-weale, but the impotent onely and unsufficient; nor to call unto that vocation young men, but such as be able to undergo the charge: for Arideus was young enough, and Antigonus in yeers; and yet this man as old as he was, went within a little of conquering all Asia; but the other had never but the bare name onely of a King, like as in a dumb shew upon a stage, making a countenance onely with a guard of partizans and halberds about him, without speaking one word; and so he was a ridiculous pageant and laughing flock among his Nobles and Peers, who were alwaies his Rulers, and led him as they lift. And even as he who would perswade Prodicus the Sophister, or Philesas the Poet (young men both, howbeir lean, feeble, fickly, and for the most part of the time bed-ridden) for to meddle with government, of state, were a very soole and senselies as on the were no whit better, who should debarre such old men as Phocion, as Musanissa the African, or Cato the Romane, from exercing publike magistracy in the City, or taking the charge of a Lord General in the field: for Photion one day when the Athenians all in the hafte, would needs have gone forth to warre at an unseasonable time, commanded by Proclamation that as many as were not above threefcore yeers of age, should arme and follow him. Now when they were offended and wroth hereat: Why? my masters (quoth he) what cause have you to complaine? I will go with you my selfe and be your Captaine, who carry already above fourescore yeers on my back. And of Masanista, Possius writeth in his story, that he died when he was four sore and ten yeers old, and left behind him at his death a sonne of his owne body begotten, but foure yeers old: also that a little before his dying day, he overthrew the Carthaginians in a ranged battel, and the morrow after was ieen eating favourly at his very tent door a piece of brown bread and when some marvelled at him why he so did, hee answered thus ont of the Poet Sophocles:

For iron and brasse be bright and clear All while mans hand the same doth weare, But the house wherein none dwels at all In time must needs decay and fall.

And even as much may be faid, of the luftre, glosse and resplendent light of the minde, by which we discourse, we remember, conceive and understand. And therefore it is generally held and faid, that Kings become much better in wars and military expeditions, than they bee all the whiles they fit fill quietly at home. In fuch fort, that it is reported of King Attalus, the brother of Eumenes, how being enervate by long peace and rest, Philopamen one of his favourites led him up and downe as he lift by the note, and indeed being fed as fat as a beast, he might do with him what he would so as the Romans were wont to aske by way of mockery ever and anon, as any sailed out of Asia, whether the King were in grace and favour with Philopamen, and might do any thing with him? There could not eafly be found many Roman Captains more sufficient warriours in all kinde of fervice than was Lucullus, so long as he was in action, and mainteined his wit and understanding entire; but after that he gave himselfe over once to an idle life, and sate mued up (asit were) like an house-bird at home, and medled no more in the affairs of the Common-weal, he became very dul, blockish and benummed, much like to sea-spunges after a long calm, when the salt water doth not dash and drench them; to that afterwards he committed his old age to be dieted, cured and ordered unto one of his affranchifed bond-flaves, named Callifebenes, by whom it was thought he was medicined with amatorious drinks, and bewitched with other charmes and forceries, untill fuch time as his brother Marches displaced this servitor from about him, and would needs have the government and disposition of his person the rest of his life, which was very long. But Darim the sovermicht ar Merker was wont to say, That in perillous times and dangerous troubles, he became the better and much wifer than himselse. * Eleas a King of Southia said, that he thought himselse no better than his horse-keeper, when he was idle. Dionysas theelder being demanded upon a time, whether he were at leiture and had nought to do? God defend (quoth he) that ever it should be so with me: for a bow (as they say) if it be over-bent will breake, but the mind if it be over-slack. For the very Musicians themselves, if they discontinue overlong the hearing of their accords; the Geometricians likewile, to prove and resolve their conclusions; the Arithmeticians also to exercife continually their accounts and reckonings, together with the very actions do impaire by longtime and age the habitudes that they had gotten before in their feverall arts, albeit they be not io much practike as speculative sciences : but the politike habitude, which is Prudence, Discretion, Sage advice, and Justice, and besides all these, Experience which can skill in all occurrences how trongs grant and the very point of occasions, as also a sufficiency to be able with good words to perswade that which is meet; this habitude (Isay) and knowledge cannot be pre-terved and maintained, but by speaking often in publike place, by doing affaires, by discoursing and by judgement: and a hard case (it were) if by discontinuing and leaving off thesegoodly exercises, it should neglect and suffer to void out of the mind so many faire and laudable vertues for very like like ir is, than in to doing all humanity, sociable courtesie, and gratitude in time, for want of use and practice would decay and sade away, which indeed should never cease nor have an end. Now if you had Tithonns for your father, who indeed was immortall, howbeit by reason of extreme age flanding in need continually of great help and attendance, would you avoid all good means? Would you deny or be weary of doing him dutifull fervice, namely, to wait upon him, to speake unto him, to find talke with him, and to succour him every way, under a colour and pretence that you had minifired unto him long enough? I trow you would not. Our Countrey then, refembling our father, or our mother rather according to the terme Mirges, which the Candiots gave it, which is more aged, and hath many more rights over us and straighter obligations of us, than hath either father or mo-ther, how durable and long lived soever it be, yet not with standing subject it is to age, and is not sufficient of it felfe, but hath alwaies need of some carefull eye and good regard over it, and requireth much fuccour and vigilance; she (I say) plucketh unto her a man of honour and policy, she takes fure hold and will not lethim go,

And holds him fast, lest that he from herwind.

Youknow well that there be many Pythiades, that is to fay, five yeares termes gone over my head, fince I began first to Minister as Priest unto Apollo Pythian: but yet (I suppose), you would not say thus unto me: Plutarch, you have factificed enough now; you have gone in procession often enough, already, or you have lead a sufficient number of dances in the honour and worship of your god; how you are grown in yeares and become aged. it were time now, that you laid off the coroner which you weare on your head in token of your Priethood, and give over the Oracle by reason of your old age. Neither would I have you thinkethat it is lawfull for you, not with standing you be far stept in yeares, to relinquish and resigne up your holy service of Jupiter the tusor and patron of Cities, the president of civill assembles and counsels; you (I say) who are the soveraigne high Priest and the great Prophet of the ceremonies of Religion politike, wherein you thus long time have been entred and professed.

But laying afide, if you thinke good, these arguments that may distract and pull an old man from the administration of the State; let us discourse philosophically, and consider a little upon the point: namely, that we do not impose upon old age any enterprise and travel, which is either too grievous or unbesceming, considering that in the universall government of the common-weal, there be many parts befitting well enough and agreeable to that age; wherunto both you and I at this prefent be arrived. For like as if of duty we were commanded to continue finging all our life long, we are not bound after that we be grown to great age for to reach unto the highest, lowdest, and most shrill notes considering that there be in musick many divers tunes and different intensions of the voice, which the Musicians call harmonies; but reason would that we make choise of that which is easiest for our yeares, and most surable to our nature and disposition; even so since that to speake and mannage affaires is to men more naturall during their whole life, than finging to swannes even unto their houre of death, we must not abandon that effection of saying and doing, as if we should fling away an harpe too high set, but we ought to let the same down by little and little, taking in hand those charges and offices which be less painfull, more moderate, and better according with the strength and manners of old folke: for even our very bodies, we that are aged, do not suffer to rest still without all exercise, and allow them no motion at all, because we canno more handle the spade to dig the ground, nor weld the plummets of lead in the exercise of dan-cing, nor pitch the bar, fling the hammer, cast the coit, or throw assone far from us, or fight and skirmish in our armour, or handle sword and buckler as we could have done in those daies; yet we can abide to swing and hang at a rope for to firetch our limbes, we can away with shaking of our bodies moderately in a pendant ship, coach, or easie horse-litter; we like well enough of walking gently, and deviling one with another upon the way, and maintaining pleasant discourses, wakening and reviving our vitall spirits, and blowing as it were the coales to kindle our natural heats and therefore let us not fuffer our lelves to grow over cold, nor stiffe and starke as if we were frozen and congealed through our floath and idlenesse; neither on the other side over-charge ourselves with all offices, nor be ready to lay our hand to all ministeries and functions, nor enforce our old age convinced of impotency to come at length to their or fuch like words,

Ah good right hand, how gladly wouldst thou take

The lames to conclude and piece in skyrmylo flode:

But now alias, this forwardswill to fight,

For neither is the man himselle, who is able enough and in the flower of his yeares, commended, if he should undergo and lay upon his shoulders all the affaires of the Common weale, and not suffer anyman elle with him to take some part (like as the Stoicks affirme that Jupiter is content to do but engaging himselsein all things, and medling in every matter, either upon an unsatiable desire ofglory, or for envy that he beareth to those, who in some measure would have their part of honour and authority in the Common-weale. But unto an antient person I assure you, (although you should eak him of infamy in this behalfe) yet it were a painfull ambition, and a most laborious desire of rule to be present personally at all elections of Magistrates; yea, and a miserable curiosity to wait and attend every houre of judgement in Court, and all meetings and affemblies in counfell; also an intollerable humour of vaine-glory to stand at receit and catch every occasion of embassage, or know every verdict of our Grand-pury or undertake the patronage of all publike causes what oever 5 and fay that all this might be performed with the favour and love of every man, yet grievous it is, and above the ordinary Brength of that age. But what will you say if they meet with the cleane contraty? For to young menthey be odious, became they let nothing passe their own hands, but inter-cept from them all occasion and meanes of actions not giving them leave to artis and put themselves forth; as for their equals, this coverous delire obshehrs to hold the highest place in all things, and to have the fole authority every where is no leffe trated of them, and accounted infamous, than either avarice or loofelife, and voluptuouineffe in other old folke. And therefore like as (by report) King Alexander the Great, not willing to overcharge his horse Bucephalus when he grew in age, wied to mount other couriers before the fight began, for to ride up and down to review his Army, and all the quarters and Regiments thereof, but after he had ranged it in array, and fer his Squadrons and Companies in ordinance of battell, and given the fignall, he would alight and get upon his backe againe as he was wont, and prefently march directly affront his enemies, give the Charge, and hazard the fortune of the field; even so a politike man of State, if he be wile and of sound judgment, will favour his strength a little, when he feeleth himselse aged, as he holdeth the reines in his owne hand, he will forbeare to deale in those charges which are not altogether so necessary, and suffer younger men to mannage matters of lesse importance; but in weighty affaires of great consequence, he will lay to both his own hands in good earnest, contrary unto the practice of the Champions in publike games and combates of prife, who carefully looke unto their bodies without touching at all any necessary workes, and all to employ land the them in needlesse, unprofitable, and superfluous feats: but we contrariwite letting paffe by the petry and fleight charges are to referve our felves wholeand entire unto those that be ferrous and of moment indeed; for a young man as Homer faith, all things befeeme indifferently and alike, all the world smileth on him, every body loveth him; if he enterprile small matters, and many in number, they say he is a good Commonwealths man, he is popular, he is laborious; if he undertake great workes and honourable actions, he hath the name of generous, noble, and magnanimous yea, and divers occurrences there be, wherein rashnesse it selfe and a contentious humour of emulation have a kind of grace, and become gaily well fuch as be fresh and gallant youths; but for a man of yeares, who during the administration of the Common-weale, undertaketh these and such like ministeries and commissions; namely, the letting to farmethe customes and revenues of the City, the charge of maintaining an haven, or keeping of the Market-place and Common Hall in order and reparation; over and befides, the embaffies and voyages in forraine parts to Princes and Potentates, or the riding in post thither, to treat about no matter of necessity nor weighty affaires of any importance, but only to falute them or make court unto them, or performe some offices of course and curtesie: In my conceit, and be it spoken unto you my good friend, he isto be pittied for it, and his case is rather lamentable than commendable. To others haply it may seeme an odious trouble and a burdensome matter for him to to be employed; for furely this is not an age wherein a man should be encumbred with any offices, but such as wherein there is dignity, grandeur, and reputation, such as that is, which your selfe at this time do execute in Athens, to wit, the presidence of the counsell or senate called reopague, and verily of that kind also is that dignity of being one of that honourable councell and affembly of the States, called Amphiltiones which your countrey hath conferred udon you by patent to hold all your life time, the labour belonging whereto is pleasant, the paines easie, and the traveil tollerable. Howbeit I would not have an ancient perion to range and huntafter these offices, nor to accept them, as demanding the same, but to receive them by way of retutal, so as he may seeme to take them volens notens, not as meanes for to be himselfe in honour, but as one that meant by his acception to grace and honour them. For it is no shame as Tiberius Casar was wont to say, for men above threescore years of age to reach forth their hand to a Physician for to have their pulse felt; but rather to firetch out their hands to the people, in praying them to give their voices or infrages with them at the election of Magiltrates; for this is a very vile and bale thing: as contrariwise there is in this a certaine venerable Majelty, and a dignity right honourable: that when the countrey hath elected one to be a Magiltrate, when they call upon him and give attendance at his doore, he should then come down unto them out of his house, with a kind of reciprocall honour of his part, a cheerefull countenance and courteous behaviour to the people againe to faute embrace, welcome, and accept this their prefent, worthy indeed and beseeming honourable old age. Semblably also in some sort, an ancient man ought to use his speech in the congregation and attembly of the people, not running ever and anon and leaping up into the pulpit or place of audience to make an oration unto the people, nor ready alwaies like as a cock croweth againe when he heareth others, to counterchaunt (as it were) to all those that make any fpee. h. nor in faitning upon them, and firiting to take hold and vantage of their words, to unbridle the reverence that young men beare tow ard him, nor to breed in them by that meanes matter to exervise and accortome themselves in disobedience and unwillingnesse to hear him : but he must otherwhiles feeme to passe by, and make temblance as though he saw and heard nothing, and give them leave a little to braveit, to fling out, and call up the head like a wanton young horse, neither to be prefent among, or to fearch curionfly into every thing that is done or faid, elipecially when the dan-ger is not great, nor a matter touching the fafety of the Common-weale, nor any honour and reputation; for there in such cases he ought not to stay until he be called, but to put forth himselfe and to run even above the ordinary frength of his age, or elle if he be not able, to yeeld his body to be led by hand and susteined up by folks armes, yea and to be carried in a chaire; as the history doth report of Appins Claudins, who having heard that the Senate of Rome after a greatfoughten field which King Pyrrhus had won of the Romans, inclined to accept of articles and capitulations tending to a composition and to peace, could not endure that indignity nor containe himselfe, (blind though he were of both his eyes) but would needs be carried through the common place, even to the Senare house; and being entied in upon his feet, he flood in the midt of them all and said, My Masters, hitherto I have been grieved for the loffe of mine eye-fight, in that I could not fee; but now I wish that I had lost the use also of mine eares, and that I might not heare the shamefull counsels and courfes that you take befides the lewd exploits that you performe: then partly by reproving them sharply, and in part by his effectuall reasons and remonstrations exciting them he wrought so, that perswaded they were presently to resume armes for to fight with Pyrrhus, for the seigniory and Empire of Italy. And Solon at what time as the flatterers of Piffrains wherewith he abused the people of Athens, were openly detected and discovered, and that it appeared once that he aimed at nothing elle but to usurpe tyranny over them, and when no man durit make head against him and empeach or crosse his defignes, himselfe alone bringing forth armour out of his house, and laying the ame in the fireet before his very doores, cried with a loud voice unto the Citizens for to aide him; which when Pififtratus heard, he tent unto him for to demand and know upon what affurance that he had, he durft be to bold as thus to do? Mary (quoth he) I prefume upon mine old age. Su h occurrences as thefe fo necessary do re-kindle and let on fire againe old men, who were in monner extinct and cleane dead before provided, that there remained in them any sparke or breath at ail: but in other smaller occafions, an ancient personage shall do well and wisely to excuse himselfe otherwhiles, and resuse base or vile ministeries, wherein greater toile and paines groweth unto them that be employed therein, than profit and commodity doth accrue unto the parties for whose take they be undertaken. It falleth out also sometimes, that if he stay untill he be called and sought unto untill he be defired, and that they fend to feek for him at his house, he shall win more credit and authority among his Citizens by comming among them in the end at their request: and say that he be present in place, he fhall be filent himselfe for the most part and suffer younger men to speake, as being the judge of ci-vill contention and emulation among them, provided alwaies that the same exceed not a certaine meane; for then he shall reprove them mildly, after a kind and loving forccut off all opinionative debates, all head-strong opinions, all opprobrious termes and heat of choler. Now, in the advices and opinions delivered of any matter in question, his part is to comfort & encourage him that commeth short of the point, not reproving and blaming him at all. but rather teaching him how to do better against another time, yea, and to praise him boldly who hath done well, and suffer his own selfe willingly to take the worle and be overcome giving the place to some many times, & not disdaine to be over-matched and perswaded by reason to the end that they may take the better heart and be more bold, and ready to help out and upply others in their defects, and that with good words and faire language, like as that old N for did in Homer:

Of all the Greeks there is no man, Who blame these words or gainsay can: But yet for footh you far not all, Nor come are to the finiall. For why? you feeme but young by your vifage, And well my son you may be for your age.

Moreover, this were more civilly done, not to reprove and checke them openly nor in publike place, although it be without any great biting and nipping, which is enough to abate and cast down the courage of young men; but rather apart and privately, especially such as be well framed and disposed by nature to government of State another day; instructing and leading them gently into the right way, fetting before their eyes some excellent sayings, examples, and inventions tending to policy, and inciting them alwaies to good and honelt enterprises, heartening and emboldening them by that meanes, that they may shew alively and lightlome spirit, and even at the beginning, making the people cast a liking and loveunto them, and be more gentle and tra-Etable afterwards: like as it is the manner of those, who when they teach young men to sit and ride an horse, bring them first one that is gentle and easie to be mounted upon; now if perad-venture one of them at his first entrance do saile and catch a sall, he must not let him lie along, and fo breake the heart of a youth for ever, but lift him up and fet him on his feet againe, yea, and give him comfortable and gracious words. Thus did Ariftides in times patt by Cimon, and Mnefighilus by Themsflocles, whom the people at the first could not abide and brooke, as having but a had name in the City for their audaciousness and loose life; and yet these good men stood their friends, brought them into credit, and mightily encouraged them. It is reported also even of Demosthenes himselfe, that the first time he came to the barre, he suffered a disgrace, and was rejected by the people, which he tooke to heart, and was wondrously dismaied, untill such time as an ancient and fatherly Citizen, one who had sometime heard Perioles making orations to the people, tooke him by the hand, and faid unto him, That he refembled Perioles for all the world in ipeech and gesture, and that he did himselse great wrong upon such an occasion to be faint-heat-ted and cast downe. Semblably, Euripides after the same manner imboldned Timotheus the Mufician, who at his first comming upon the stage was hissed out by the people, as one that by his novelties which he brought up, feemed to violate and breake the laws of Mufick; but he willed him to be of good cheare for all that, faying, It would not be long after but he should be able to draw and lead the whole Theater after him as he would, and have the people at his devotion, To be briefe, like as the terme of time limited and appointed for the veftall Virgins or Nuns votaries at Rome, was divided into three parts: The first, to learne that which pertained to the Religion; the second, to practise; and the third, to teach the younger. And likewise, as in the City of Ephefusevery one of those maidens vowed to the service of Diana, was at the beginning called Melliere, which is a smuch to say, as a Novice to be a Priestesse hereaster; then Hiere, that is to say, a full Priestesse indeed; and last of all, Pariere, which signifies one that had power to initiate and professe others in the same orders; even so, he that is a perfect Polititian and States-man at the first is but a learner and a questionist (as it were) to do his acts, and so to commence in that profession; but in the end, he teacheth others, he is a regent over novices, and sheweth them the fecrets of policy. For to be a prefident and overfeer of others that try masteries or combates, is not to be a fenser or champion himselfe; but he that instituteth and traineth a young man to publike affaires and matters of State, framing and fitting him for his countrey anotherday, in shewing him is a good and profitable member of the Common-wealth, not in a small and base kind of service, but in a ministery of great consequence; and to which especially and principally, Lycurgus having given himielfe and aimed at, accustomed young men even from their infancy to obey and do reveren eto every elder, no lesse than to a ruler and law-giver. For in what regard else, and to what other purpose said Lysander? That there was no place in the world, where it was so honourable for to be old, as in Lacedamon. Was it because it waspermitted and lawfull there for elder perions more than for any other to till the ground, to put out money to utury, to play at dice, being fet together, and to keepe good fellowship, drinke merrily as they are close at their game, and playing hard at hazzard? I suppose neither you nor any man else will so say. But it was because all such, being after a fort inplace of rulers, of fatherly governours and tutours over youth, have not a vigilant eye. over the publike affaires only, but a particular regard also alwaies to every action of young men, enquiring and learning not sleightly, and as it were passing by their whole demeanour, namely, how they exercise their bodies in publike place; how they play and disport themselves; what their diet is, and how they converse and live together, shewing themselves dread and terrible to thosethat do ill, but venerable and defirable to the good; for in truth young folk alwaies observe and look after them, and to such they make court; for that ancient persons do labour for to make them better, and augment the generofity of their mind, without all envy. For this passion, as it beseemeth no time of mans age, how foever in young men it been tituled with a number of faire and honest names, to wit, emulation, zeale, and defire of honour; so in old men it is altogether unseasonable, absurd, rude, favage, unmanly, and base. And therefore a man of yeares, who is a politician, must be very far off from this humour of envy, and not like unto old runt-trees or dodils, which repining as it were at others, do manifefly hinder and take away the spring and growth of young poles and plants which come up under them, or grow neare about them: but contrariwife, he ought to admit and receive them kindly, yea, and to offer himselse lovingly unto those that make toward him, and be glad to fort and converte with him; such he ought to enforme, to direct, to dade and lead by the hand, yea, and to cherish and nourish them, not only with good instructions, sage counsels and wife admonitions, but also in yeelding unto them the place and meanes to exercise some functions of government, whereby they may grow unto lome them honour & glory, in preferring them to those charges and commissions which be not hurtfull to the State, but pleasing and acceptable to the common people. As for others, which at the first entry be untoward and shew some resistance, be difficult, dangerous and hard to be atchieved (like unto some medicines and potions which presently dognaw and wring the belly, or make the flomack fick) and whereof the honour and profit enfueth long after; it is not good to put fuch into young mens hands, nor to help them to fuch hard bargaines, ne yet to expole them raw as they be and unacquainted, to the mutinous exclamations and obloquies of the rude multirude, which is hard to be pleafed; but rather he himselfe is to undergo the displeasure and ill-will of the people for the weale-publike; for this will cause the youndergothe diple and a section at each other willing a great deale to enterprife all other fer-yices. But over and befides all that hath been delivered already, this would be well remembred, that to administer and governe the Common-wealth, lieth not only in bearing an office, or going in Embassage, or in crying with a loud voice to an assembly, or in the Pulpit or Tribunall for publike Orations, to fare as if he were mad and out of his wits, in vehement preaching to the multitude, or in penning a number of Decrees, Acts, and Edicts, wherein the common fort sippole that all policy and government doth consist, like as they imagine also; that to be a Philosopher, is nothing elle, but to discourse and dispute in the schooles at certaine times of philosophical points aloft in a chaire, and read lectures at their houres out of their books, and in the meane while be ignorant of that civill administration and philosophy which is continually seen in works and daily actions. Forthis were all one according to Dicearchus, as if one should say, that they only walked, who fetched many turnes up and down in galleries, and not they, who went into the countrey on foot, or visited their friends. But we must thinke, that to governe a Common-wealth, is very like unto the profession of Philosophy: for Socrates was not to be thought a Philosopher only, when he caused stooles and formes for to be made ready to situpon, against a conference, or when he sate him down himselfe in a chaire, or when he observed precisely the houres of lecture, of disputation, or of walking in the schooles, which were appointed for his disciples and familiar followers; but also otherwhiles, when he was at his game and play, as it fell out, when he dranke and eat, when he was in warfare or in the campe with some, bargaining, buying and selling with others; and finally, when he was in prison, and eventhen, when as he drunke that cup of hemlock for his poison; having taught and proved plainly before, that mans life at all times, in all parts, in every occasion and accident, and generally in all affaires admitteth the use of Philosophy. And even so, we are to make account of civil government; namely, to thinke that fooles or lewd persons do not administer the Common-weale, either when they be Generals of Armies, or L L, Chancellors, or when they seem to lead the people after them with their eloquent tongue; but rather raise tumult and sedition among them, or fletter and infinuate into their favour, or declame for oftentation, or else execute iome charge and office, and do that which they do compelled by force. Whereas contratiwife, a good and true politician indeed, who affecteth his Citizens, loveth his Countrey, hath a care and heedfull regard of the weale-publike, although he never be clad in his rich coat of armes, nor have the royall mantle of estate upon him, yet he is daily and housely employed in the administration of publike affaires, inciting and exhorting to action those that are sufficient, instructing such as be unskilfull and wanting, affilting as many as come to him for countell, reclaiming them who are ill-given and about to practice milchiefe, confirming and encouraging those who be well minded, and shewing evidently in effect, and not for forme and fashion, that he is amused and wholly bent upon the good of the State: not because there is to grow thereby any interest to him or his, or in regard that he is called by name to go first into the Theater, or to be the principall and first man in the Alsembly of counsell or otherwise by way of recreation, as if he came thither to see plaies and games, orto heare some pleasant musick when he is there; but contrariwise, when he cannot be present perfonally yet to be there in spirit and advice; and after he hath intelligence of the proceedings there, to approve seme things well done, and to shew himselse displeased in other things. For neither Arifides the Athenian, nor Cato the Roman, were in place many times of chiefe government, yet they ceased not for all that, during their whole life, to be in action for the good and service of their Countries. And Epaminondas archieved (I must needs say) many noble acts and valiant exploits, whiles he was Captaine Generall for Baotia; howbeit, one act there is reported of his, when he was neither Generall nor in any office at all, which he exploited in Theffaly, not inferiour to any one of his other worthy deeds : for at what time as the Captaines of Thebes had engaged a battalion or regiment to far into a difficult place, and a ground of much difadvantage, whereby the enemies charged fore upon them to violently, that they were in great affright, and ready to be defeated, he being in the fore-front among the footmen heavily armed, was called back, and at his first comming appear fed all the trouble and affright of the army, and put them in affured hope with his very prefence: afterwards he fet in order and arranged in battell-ray, that foundron which had broken their rankes and were in confusion, delivered them easily out of this streight and difficult passage, and made head gasine upon the enemies, who hereupon were so daunted, that they changed their minds and retired. Also when Agis the King of the Lacedamonians led his Army in ordinance of battell ready to fight with his enemies in Areadia, there was one ancient Spartan cried aloud unto him, and faid, My Lord, you thinke to remedy one michiefe by another: (giving him thereby to underitand, that his meaning was by this prefent and unfeafonable forwardnesse of his, in giving battell unto the enemy, for to falve and cure (as it were) his former speedy retreat and departure from the fiege beforethe City Argos, according as Thucydides reporteth in his story) which when Agis heard he gave credit unto the man, retired presently, but afterwards he had the victory. This Agis caused his chaire of estate to be set every day before his palace gate, and many times the Ephori would rife from their Consistory, and repaire unto him thither, for to aske his advice, and consult with him about the affaires of greatest importance; for he seemed to be a man of great reach, and is renowned in the hiltories for a most wife and fage Prince. And therefore upon a time, after that the ftrength of his body was utterly decayed, in such fort as for the most part of the day he kept his bed and stirred not forth; when the Ephori sent unto him and requested that he would give them meetting in the Common Hall of the City, he arose out of his bed, and strained himselfe to walk thither; but when he was gone a pretty way with much paine and difficulty, he chanced to meet with certainelittleboies in the street, and demanded of them, whether they knew any thing more powerfull then the necessity to obey their master? and when they answered No, he made this account, that his impotency ought to be the end and limit of his obeifance, and fo returned back immediately to his own house. For furely, ones good will ought not to shrinke before his power; but when might faileth, the good will would not be forced further. Certes, it is reported that Scipio both in war abroad, and also incivill affaires at home, used the counsel of Cains Lating, infomuch as some there were, who gave out & faid, that of all those noble exploits Scipio was the actor but Lelius the author. And Cicero himselfe consesset, that in the bravest and most honourable counsels which he exploited during his confulfhip, by the meanes whereof he faved his countrey, he confulted with Publius Nigidist the Philosopher. So that we may conclude that in many kinds of government and publike functions, there is nothing that impeacheth and hindereth old men, but that they may well enough shew their service to the Common-wealth, if not in the best simply, yet ingood words, lage counfell, liberty, and authority of franke speech, and carefull regard, according as the Poets say: for they be not our feet, nor our hands, nor yet our whole body and the ftrength thereof, which are the members and goods only of the Common-weale; but first and principally, the soule and the beatties thereof, to wit, justice, temperance, and prudence; which if they come slowly and late to their perfection, it were abfurd and to no purpose, that men should enjoy house, land, and all other goods and heritages, and should not themselves procure some profit and commodity to their common Countrey, by reason of their long time, which bereaveth them not so much of strength ablefor to execute outward ministeries, as it addeth sufficiency of those faculties which are requisite for rule and command. Loe, what the reason was that they pour traied those Hermes, that is to say, the statues of Mercury, in yeares, without either hands or feet; howbeit, having their naturall parts plumpe and fliffe; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that we have least need of old menslabour and corporall travell, so that their words be active, and their speeches full of seed and fruitfull, as it is meet and convenient.

The Summary

If speech be the signe and lively pitture of the mind, as it is indeed, a man may judge by these Apophithegmess or notable Sajing 1, and collected here together how excellent in seats of armes, in palitike government, or otherwise particularly these prolages were, who are here represented unto us; like as some special distinctions their sound should be prospected to the properties of the state of the stat

But here in this discourse there is to be seen nothing effected, nothing borrowed from others, nor far set, but there is represented autous a certaine open, simple, and admirable nature in this diversity of graves, site sant and learned speeches, wherein speeches see insingled with prosses, and to get apit applied unto their manners and behaviour, of what calling and degree sover they be in the world, stem, bere in are represented atts proceeding from great wit, deepe reach, and high conceit, of valour, of equity, madely, good disposition, and singular carriage in the whole course and management of mans life: the which are proposed and manifisted unto us to this end, that the wisdome and boarty of the Almighty might so much the letter appears, in that he hath vouch softed such or naments to publike States, for to maintaine and uphold mans this amidst these confusions which were brought into the world by occasion of sin. Moreover, this first collection may well be droided into five principal parts, where for the sir containes the notable system in such as the singus and deeds of the Kings of Persia, and other strange nations. The second of the governours and potentares of Sicily. The third of the Macedonian Kings, and namely, of Alexander the Great and bis successfully. The third of the successful Captains of Greece, to wit, Athenians, Lacedemonians, and Thebans. The sist and less of the ancient Captains of and Consults together with the two sinst Emperours of Rome.

As touching the profit that all forts of perfous may gather bereout; it is ineffimable, by reafon of the goodhis infinition that the leasts and words so seemed and for their brevity so easies to be remembred, and ford: the substance whereof is to reclaims at from wice, and to bring us into the way of vertue; the which we ought is much the more to love and esteeme, in this great light which is presented to us in the set is the most of the soveraigne good inwhen as we do see that those persons who were overwhelmed in such signorance of the soveraigne good inmore dealy have neverthelessed, and a randomme. I do not dealy have neverthelessed, and a randomme. I do not dealy but there he some traits savouring of ambition and other pussions, as extravagant as it, sowed here and there among the gathering; but an easse matter it will be to discreme them, year, and to make use of them associated with a other respectively. I see a substance without wrine often attions, for the good of our neighbour, and to follow that which is therein commendable in divers sort, and all to frame and fashion us more and more to every good duty. I have entred in the margine some part of the artificial framing of such senences, nor generally throughous if or words there be that many times have divers sense indicated and any of the sense of the sense of the sense of the substance of the artificial framing of such sense.

Le may be able to sound the matter to the very bottome, and in this collection to apply that sity to his own assenting the sense.

The Apophthegmes or notable Sayings of Kings, Princes, and great Captaines.

Reaxernes King of Persia (O most mighty Emperour Cafar Trajanus) esteemed it an act of no lefte magnanimity and royall bounty to take in good worth, and to receive with gracious countenance, small presents, thanto give great rewards: and therefore upon a time as he passed by the way in progresse, when a poore and simple man who got his living by the weat of his brows, and his hand-labour, #Wing nothing elle to give, offeed him water which he had laden out of the running river with both his hands, he curreoutly accepted it with a lightion mean fining counternance, meaturing the grace of the girk, not according to the valour and worth of the thing, but the good will of the giver. And to the like purpose Lymphere and the property of the property o gus ordained in the City of Sparta, facrifices of the least cost that might be: To the end (quoth he) that the Citizens might have meanes at all times, and in every place, to honour the gods readily and at ease, with fuch things as they had at hand. And therefore fince that (most gracious Prince) with the like mind and intention I render unto your Highnesse these small presents and tokens, even the most common first fruits (as I may so say) gathered from Philosophy; I beseech you to receive together with my good affection the profit and use of these worthy and memorable fayings which I have collected for your fake: for that they may serve you in good stead, to know the nature, disposition and manners of great personages who lived in times past, considering that oftentimes they appeare better and are discovered more clearly by their words than by their deeds. True it is that in another worke I have compiled the lives of the most noble and famous personages, as well for seats of armes, as for counsell, to wit, Captaines, Law-givers, Kings, and Emperours that ever were among the Romans and the Greeks: but in the greater parts of their acts, Fortune is intermingled among and bath her place; whereas in the speeches and sentences which they have delivered, and the antivers by them made at the very time of their acts, their paffions, their accidents and occurrences of Fortune, a man may perceive most purely (as it were) in to many mirrours, what their thoughts were, and how the hearts of every one flood affected. And verily one Siramines a Gentleman of Perfia, when tome marvelled at him that his enterprifes sped no better, and had no more fortunate successe, considering that his speeches were so wise, answered unto them in this manner: Because (quoth he) I am my selfe master of my words, but of my actions, Fortune, and the King together. Now in that other Volume of Lives aforefaid, the excellent fayings of those renowned persons be joyned with the narration of their deeds written at large, so that they require a man of great leisure, and one that will take pleasure in reading and hearing the same : but as for this booke, wherein their words are gathered and comprehended together by themselves, as the very scannillons (as I may so say) and seeds extraded apart from their lives, and yet testifying of the same; the reading thereof, in my conceit, will not hinder the rest of your affaires, nor take up any time due thereto, considering that in few words you shall there see the nature of many memorable persons lively described and depainnone by right for to command and rule, unlesse they were better than those whom they ruled. A-Men flowed gaine, when the Persians were minded to change their country, being hard, rough, and hilly, and to inhabite another that was mild, plaine, and champaine, he would not permit them to to do (c) faying: That like as the feeds of plants; fo the lives of men became sutable to the places and regions, wherethe one were lowed, and the other lived. Darius the father of Xerxes in praise of himselfe, used to say, (d) That in battels and perils of war he became evermore wifer. And one yeare having taxed and fet down certaine payments and fubfidies which he would have to be levied of his subjects, he tent for the principall men of every Province under his dominions, and demanded of them, if those tributes which he imposed were any thing grievous unto the people or no? And when they answered, that they bare the same but indifferently; (e) he gave order that none should be charged but with the one halfe of the foresaid exactions. One day when he had opened a Pomgranare, which was (in truth) a very faire and goodly great apple; one of those who were about him asked him, What thing it was whereof he delited to have as many as were kernels in the faid Pomeranate? (f) Mary (quoth he) of fuch men as Zopyrus. Now this Zopyrus was a brave man of war and a faithfull friend, who having himselfe whipped his own body and mangled it with many flripes, and befides cut off his own nose, and cropt his own eares; by this device and stratagem to beguiled and overwrought the Babylonians, that they committed unto him the government of their City, which afterwards he betraied and delivered into the hands of Darius: whereupon many a time afterwards he gave out and faid, Thathe would chooserather to have Zopyrus whole and found of all his limbs, than win a hundred such Cities as Babylon, Queen Semiramis having cauted her own Sepulcre to be made, gave order that this Inscription should be engraven upon it: What King foever hath need of money, let him demolish this monument, and he shall find within it treasure as much as he desireth. Now this Darius having opened the faid sepulchre, could meet neither with filver nor gold there; but instead thereof he light upon other letters written to this effect; (g) If thou hadft not been a wicked man and of infatiable avarices thou wouldst never have stirred and disquieted the graves and monuments of the dead. Arimenes, brother of Xerxes the ion of Darius, making claime to the Kingdome of Perfia against his brother came down out of the Province Battriana, where he had kept his refiance; and unto him his brother sent before certaine presents to meet him upon the way, willing the messengers who should tender them unto him to deliver these words withall: (b) Thy brother Xerxes honoureth thee for this time with these presents; but he assureth thee, that if he be once declared and proclaimed King, thou shalt be the greatest man in the whole Realme next under him. And in very truth when as Xerxes was adjudged to be King, 'Arimenes was the first who did homage unto him, and put the royall Diadem about his head; and femblably the King his brother made him the fecond per-ton in honour and authority, and next to him in the Realme. This Prince Xerxes before named, taking great displeasure and indignation against the Babylonians, for that they were revolted and did rebell; after he had subdued them againe, and brought them under his obedien e, (i) forbad them expresly to beare armes any more; but he commanded them to dance, to sing, to play upon the flute and hautboies to keep harlots, to haunt taverns, and to weare their garments loofe, fitting full, and spreading large. When there were brought him certain dried figs out of the countrey of Atticato be fold, he said, (k) That he would not eat any of them until he had conquered the land which bare them. Having surprized and apprehended certaine spies of the Greeke nation within his Campe, he did them no (1) hurt or displeasure at all; but after he had caused them to see in what security his army and campe flood, he permitted them to returne and go their waies in peace.

Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he who was turnamed Longhand, because he had one hand longer than the other, nied to fay, That it was a more princely (m) and royall property to put to than to take n It befremeth away: he was the first that gave those leave who hunted with him, to strike a wild beast (n) first, if they could and were so disposed; he it was also who ordained for those his Nobles and Lords who had offended and broken their allegiance this punishment: that (whereas before time the manner was to scourge their bodies) now they should be stripped indeed out of their apparell, (a) and their cloaths be beaten and whipped for them; and whereas before they were wont to have the haires of their heads plucked up by the roots, now their turbants or copped caps only which they wore should be raken from them, and so to stand bare-headed for a time. A chamberlaine he had, named p Les danger Satibarzanes, who sued unto him for a thing which was neither just nor reasonable to be granted; Prince to late and being advertized that he followed this fute in the behalfe and favour of another, who had prohis own pri-vate treasure, miled him 30000, Persian Crowns, called Dariques, he commanded his Treasurer to bring him thirty than to break thousand Dariques, and when he gave them unto the said chamberlaine: (p)Here(quoth he)Satibarzanes, take this money at my hand, for the departure from so much treasure will not make me poorer, but if I granted thy request I should be more unjust.

Crus the younger for to move and sollicite the Lacedamonians to enter into a league and make alliance with him, said of himselfe: (9) That he had an heart more weighty and substantiall than his brother King Arraxerxes; that he dranke more flrong wine pure without water, and bare it better than he: as for him when he rade a hunting, he could hardly hold himselfe upon his horse-backe, and in time of danger could not well fit upon his throne; and to draw them on, for to fend unto him auxiliary fouldiers; he promifed to as many as came on foot for to bellow horses upon them, and to thole who had horses, for to mount them upon chariots, to those who were possessed of lands and tenements, he promised to give villages; and them who had villages of their own he would make Lords of Cities; and as for gold and filver they should have it at his hands by weight and measure, and not by tale and number.

Arraxerxes the brother of this younger Cyrus, and who for his fingular memory was furnamed Milimon, not only gave free accesse and audience to all suters and those who had any thing to do with him, but (r) that (which is more) commanded his lawfull wedded wife to take away the rich r An affable hangings and curtaines that covered her chariot, to the end that who soever would, might have the winnesh the full light both of him and her, and speake with them upon the way. When a poore peafant of the heart of the h countrey presented unto him a faire apple or costard of exceeding bignesse, he received it with a cheerefull countenance, and faid, (f) By Mith a, i.e. the fun that shineth, (and that was the Persians CA good will oath) this man(I suppose verily) if he might be put in trust, were able to make a great City of a small, entering micro time when he was put to flight, and all his baggage rapiacked, and provision lott, infomuch as endered. for want of other viands he was faine to eate a few dry figs and barry bread: (r) Oh what a deale of are noticed pleasure have I missed heretofore, and never so much as once tasted.

Oromes, son in law to King Artaxerxes, by marriage with his daughter, being upon the Kings Wrathfull dipleasure condemned, and deprived of his estate, said, That the (x) minions of Kings and wrathfull dipleasure condemned, and deprived of his estate, said, That the (x) minions of Kings and with the saure Princes resembled very properly the singers of those that counted by Arithmeti k; for like as they of great yet. make a finger sometime to stand for one, and another while for tenthousand; even so those who be rather to be about Princes at one time can do all at once, and another time againe as little or rather just nothing, rebuted.

This Prince being by nature halty and angry, and ready to funish his houshold fervants extremely, if they did amisse and faulted in their service: when a friend of his in whole house he lodged, had bestowed a present upon him of many earthen vessels exceeding fine thin, and easie to be burst, but singularly well and artificially made, with divers prints embossed and wrought upon them most daintily, he gave again unto thing but this hoft of his other rich gifts of great prize, (c) but all the faid earthen place he brake every piece into shivers presently, for leare lest upon sudden fits of choller he should chastice his servitors too command, fore whenfoever it hapned that they brake any of them.

His mother being now far stept in years and past the ordinary time of marriage, would neverthelesse in all the haste be wedded to a certaine proper and well-favoured young man; whereupon Dionyfius came unto her, and faid (t) Wellmay it be in our power mother to violate the Laws of the City Syracufa, but to breake the Laws of nature we may not. That when hee was once a King, he ought to carry the gravity and majesty of a Lord, and do justice uprightly. Hee advised him also to endevour for to purchase the love and amity of those who were of credit and authority in great Towns and Cities, even the bad aswell as the good; that hee might afterward use the one and abuse the other. Philo a Thebane Gentleman had done him many pleafures during the time that he remained as hostage within the City of Thebes; for hee was lodged in his house: neither would the faid Philo ever at any time alterwards receive gifts or presents from him; whereupon Philip took occasion to say thus unto him: Take not from me this title in my stile, of Invincible, in suffering my selfe thus to bee vanquished and over ome by you, in courtese and liberality. Hee had in one battell taken a mighty number of priloners and was himselse in person to see them sold in port-sale, sitting in a chaire, with his clothes turned or tuckt up higher than was feemly and decent: now one of the prifoners among the reft, when he should be fold cried unto him with a loud voice: Good my Lord, I beleech you pardon me and let me not be fold in any case, for I am a friend of yours, and to was I your fathers before you: Why good fellow (quoth Philip) whence grew this great triendstip between us? and how is it come about? A friend not with a and host of his had invited him to his house upon a time to supper, and thither he went but by the fall con way he met with divers of his acquaintance, whom he drew with him along to the place; whereat rewarded, he perceived well that his forefaid hoft was exceedingly troubled, and could not tell how to do, because he was not sufficiently provided for to entertein so many guests: Philip (I say) being aware hereof, fent fecretly unto every one of them as they fate at the boord, and caused them to be rold in their ear that they should keep their stomacks and reserve one corner in it for a dainty tart or marchpain; who thinking that he meant in good earnest did so, and looking for the said tart, made spare and did forbear to eat of many other dishes before them : by which means he pleased all parts, and so there was sufficient. When he heard of the death of Hipparchus an Eubeanborn it appeared well that he took it heavily; and to one about him, who faid that the man had lived long enough, and died in a good time: Yea mary (quoth he) in regard of himselfe, but for me he died too soon; for dead he is before he hath received at my hands any condigne recompence for the love which he bare unto me. Being advertised that his ion Alexander was male-content, and complained of him for having children by many wives, he faid unto him: Seeing that you shall have after my death many occurrents and competitours for the Kingdome, endevour you to be a good and honest man every way to the end that you may attain to the Crown, not fo much by me in right of inheritance, as by your felfe for your own worthinesse. He admonished him to give eare unto Aristosle, and to fludy Philosophy under him: And why so ? Because (quoth he) you may forbeare to doe many things which I have done, and for the which I do now repent. Hee had bestowed the dignity of a judge upon one who was recommended unto him by Antipater, but after he heard once that hee used to colour or dye his beard and haires of his head, hee displaced him, saying :

a Effeminate He that will be falle unto his owne haires, is not worthy to be trufted in weighty affairs. There

His familiar friends were highly offended and angry, that the Peloponnesians, who had received so many benefits at his hands, hissed so at him, as they did at their festivall Olympian games: What would they do then (quoth he) if we should offer to do them any displeasure? Lying in the camp upon a time, he slept one morning longer then his accustomed manner was; and being awakened in the end, he gat up and faid: I might fleep well enough in fecurity, so long as Antipater is awake. Another time when he slept in the day time, insomuch as the Greeks who thronged about his pavilion doors, and gave long attendance, were displeased and complained of him for it; Parmenio spake unto them in his behalfe faying: Marvell not my masters if he now take his rest; for many times when you are fast asleep, he lieth broad awake. A certaine minstrell or musician had plaied before him on a time as he fate at supper, and the King would seem to correct him in some points, yea, and begin to reafon and enter into fad disputation with him about the stroke and true fingering of certaine instruments: Now (7) God forbid (quoth he) O King, that you should come to so low an ebbe and hard fortune, as to be more skilfull in these matters than I am. He was fallen out upon a time with his wife Olympias, and his sonne Alexander, during which jarre and difference, Demaratus a noble man of Corinth came to visit him:and Philip asked him in what tearms the Greeks stood one with another? You do very well indeed O Philip (quoth Demaratus) to take care of the union and concord of the Greeks, when those persons that touch you neerest, and whom you ought to hold most dear can agree no better with you. These words of his wrought so with him, that he began to think berter of the matter, appealed his wrath, and was reconciled unto them. Alexander [the Great] being yet a child, was nothing well pleased and glad, when he heard the report that went of his father how he won and conquered all, wherefoever he came : but faid unto those noble mens children who were his play-feres, and brought up with him: My father I fee well will leave me nothing to do, nor to win: What need you care for that? faid they againe, confidering that it is for you that he maketh these conquests: What will it do me good (quoth he)(a) to have much, and to doe nothing for it? He was wonderfully nimble and deliver of body but in footmanship especially he excelled; insomuch as his father was in hand with him one time to runne a course in the race, for the prize in the Olympick games. I could be very well content and willing (quoth Alexander) fo to doe, in case I might have Kings to bee my concurrents, and to run with me. One evening when it was very late, there was brought unto him a young wench for to be his bedfellow: and when he demanded of her the cause why she came so late? she answered, that shee tarried untill her husband was in bed: whereupon hee chid and rebuked the pages and grooms of his chamber faying: (b) I went within a very little of committing adultery, and all by your means. When he facrificed on a time to the gods, he spared for no sweet persumes and odours but would run oftentimes to the frankincense, and take whole handfuls thereof to cast into the fire; which his governour and school-master Leonidas being present, marked well enough and reproved him for it, laying: When you have conquered that Province which yeeldeth this incense, then you may burn as much as you will of it. And therefore afterwards when he had made conquest of Arabia, he wrote unto Antipater a letter to this effect : I send unto you 500, quintals or talents weight offrankincense and of cassia; to the end that you may no more hereafter be a niggard in offering sweet odours unto the gods: for I doe you understand that now wee are Lords of that Province which bringeth forth these aromaticall spices. The day before that he sought the samous field before Granicum, hee willed the Macedonians to make good cheere and be merry at supper over-night; yea, and to spend all the provision of victuals which they had; for that the next morrow they should supp at their enemies charges. One named Perillus a friend of his, asked money of him for to give with his daughters in marriage and he caused to be delivered unto him fifty talents; but the other faid that ten only would content him; whereupon Alexander replied again and faid;

He commanded like- Hetheris m to much occurrence and able may be wife his treasurers to give unto Anaxarchus the Philosopher what loever he demanded: his treasure the bendless is rers brought him word, that he craved an excessive summe, to wit, 100, talents; unto whom he an-, pleases him fwered thus: The man doth very well, knowing as he doth that he hath fuch a friend ofme, as both can and will bestow so much upon him. But where were thele flour Champions (quoth hee) to the Milefians, when the Barbarians besieged, assaulted, and won your City? The Queen of Caria, named Ada, was evermore fending unto him many dainty Cates, and exquisite Marchanes and Junkets curiously wrought by most excellent Cooks, Confectioners, and workmen in pastry, which she did of a brave mind, and to shew her magnificence. But Alexander lent word agains unto her, that he had farre better Cooks and patte-makers more fingular then she had any; to wit, for to dresse his dinner, early rising in a morning; and travelling in the night before day light, and to prepare his Supper a spary dinner. When his army stood arranged and ready to give Darim battell, his Captains came unto him to know his pleasure, and what he had else to command them? Nothing (quoth he) but to shave the Macedonians beards; and when Parmenio among the rest marvelled at this commandement; Why (quoth Alexander) knowest not thou that in the conflict and medley, there is no better hold than by the beard to catch an enemy, fast? When Darius made offer unto him of ten thousand talents, and besides to part all Asia equally with him, insomuch as Parmenio said : Sir, I would accept of this offer if I were Alexander: And so would I too (quoth Alexander) if I were Parmenio; but unto Darius hee made this answer: (d) That neither the earth could abide, a Lordship were rarmento; but the control when he was at the very point to firike that last battell lowship. Amwith him, which was to try the fortune of the mainechance, and which was to try the issue, and de-bitton will cide all, neer unto the village Arbels, and to fight against the Persians, being ten hundred thousand have all or menstrong, and well armed, there came unto him certaine of his minions with tales and accusations of his fouldiers; for that they were heard in their tents to whitper and conspire together, yea; and to give out, that they would bring no part of the pillage into the Kings pavilion, but keep yea, and to give see Alexander hereat laughed a good, and faid unto them: I heare of no harm; (e) enwite chief chi these are very good tidings that you report unto me; for surely they be the speeches of resolute with his source. men, who are determined to winne the day, and not to run away. After a battell which he had won against King Dariss, when divers Greeks were come into his hands and his prisoners, who had served his enemy and received pay; as many as were Athenians he commanded to be kept in irons, for that having good meanes to live and be maintained in the flate wherein they lived, yet they would needs take wages of Barbarians; the Theffalians (n) likewife he fo ferved, because they having a rich foil and fertile Countrey of their own, would not flay at home to till and husband it, but chuse rather to ferve a barbarous nation; but as for the Thebans, he commanded that they should be fet free, inthighere and have liberty to go whither they would; and why so? because (quoth hee) wee have lest them nothing to do, recobe neither City to inhabite, nor ground to occupy and labour in. Having taken prisoner a certaine Indian, who had the name of an excellent Archer, and was no leffe indeed, for that he would never faile but shoot an arrow within the compasse of a little hoop or small ring, he commanded him to shoot in his presence, that he might see a proofe of his skilli the Indian refused so to do; whereat Alexander in great indignation gave order presently, that he should be put to death: but as hee was going to execution, he faid unto those who had the leading of him: That he had not for many daies past practifed nor exercised his hand, and in that regard he was afraid that he should faile, and therefore denied to shoot: which when the King understood, he wondered at the man, charged expressly that he should be let go, yea, and sent unto him a reward for that he should be let go, yea, and sent unto him a reward for that he shad shewed herein his (a) magnanimity, and choic rather to suffer death, than to be disgraced and sound unworthy of the fame that went of him. Taxiles, one of the Indian Kings, met Alexander upon the way as he marched, and praied him that they might not warre one against another: But let us grow (quoth he) to this composition: If you be inferiour unto mee receive favours and good turns atmy hand; but if you be greater then my felfe, I will take the like of you. To this motion of his, Alexander made arriwer thus: Be it fo (quota he:) yet we must fight first, even about this point, to know whether of us bee the superiour, and able to do more good to the other? Being advertised of a certaine fore fituate upon a rock in India, called Aorne, and namely, that it was impregnable in it felfe, howbeit, the Captaine who had the keeping of it was but a coward: (p) Why then (quoth hee) the place is easie to be won. Then Alexander put him against into that fort, and willed him to hold it as hee did before: hee laied unto it also more lands, which he bestowed likewise freely upon him, saying with all: This man hath done well and wifely, to repose more trust in the vertue of a Prince, than in a place of strength. After the winning of the strong hold Aorne aforesaid, one of his flattering favourites and minions came unto him, faying, that he had furmounted Hercules in glorious deeds: unto whom he answered: You may say your pleasure, and so forth; but for mine own part, I do not esteem all mine acts with my whole Empire and Dominion, to bee compared unto one word or faying of Hercules. Having intelligence that some of his familiar friends nied to play at dice not moderately for foort and pattime but excessively, even to the utter undoing of themselves; he set a good round fine upon their heads. Of all those that came about him and neerest unto his person he honoured Creterius most, but he affected Hephastian best : For Craterius (quoth he)loveth the King, and Heplastian loveth Alexander; meaning that Craterus a wife and valiant man, loved the greatnesse of his Lord and Master, but Hephastian, a good and kinde companion, embraced rather the perfon of his Prince. He fent upon a time fifty talents as a gift unto the Philosopher Xenocrates, who refused the same, and would take nothing at all; saying, that he had no need thereof. This was reported unto Alexander, who demanded againe: What ! had Xenocrates never a friend to bestow that mony upon, if he flood him elte in no need thereof? I affure you for mine own part, all the chievance and revenues of King Darius hardly served my turn for to deal among my friends. Porus, one of the Kings of India was taken prisoner by him in a battel; and afterwards Alexander came unto him, and faid: How would you have me to entreat you? Mary (quoth Porus) roially: and being asked the second time: If he would nothing elfe: No (quoth he) for in this one word, Roially, is comprised all. Alexander admiring aswell the wit as the valour of the man, not onely gave unto him his Kingdome again but alfoad joined thereto more lands and territories. Word was brought unto him one day that there was a certaine fellow at a feath, who did nothing else but miscall and revile him; he made anfiver againe: That it was a roiall and Kingly act, patiently to fuffer blame for welldoing. When he lay at the point of death, looking upon his familiar friends about him, he faid, Ifee well that my Epitaph and funerals will be very great; meaning, the troubles that would enfue upon the death

He espied upon a time within his camp, certaine common souldiers playing at the ball and bowling, having their corflets on their backs, and their morions upon their heads, he took a great pleasure therein, and called for their Cartaines, intending for to praise their heads, he cook a grave part of them for it: but when he understood that they were in a tipling house or tavern a drinking, he(q) and examine the forested (out). The selfe same sonne had (being a very youthfull gentleman) one time procured, that he should have his lodging within an ancient widowes house, who had three faire maidens to her daughters: the King his father being told thereof, fent for the marshall Hermodotus the Poet in certain Poems which he wrote, called him the sonne of the Sunne: but he to check that speech of his: He that useth (quoth he) to empty my close stoole, knoweth as well as Ithat it is nothing fo. Demetrius whiles he laid fiege unto the City of Rhodes, found in one of the villages or suburbes neer that City, the table of the famous Painter Protogenes, wherein he painted Jalyjus. The Rhodians sent unto him an herald of arms, and besought him to spare that excellent picture, and not to deface it: who returned this answer unto them: That hee would sooner destroy the portraits and images of his own father, than that picture. After he had compounded with the Rhodians, and was growne to agreement, he left behind him unto them that mighty fabrick of battery called Hdzpolis, that is as much to fay, as an engine to force Cities, which he did, to testifie unto posterity the grandeur of his works, and the valour of his courage. When the Athenians rebelled against him, he won by affault their City, which before was much diffressed for default of corn: but being master of the Town, he caused immediately the whole body of the City to be affembled before him, unto whom he declared that he bestowed upon them freely and in gitt a great quantity of grain : but in this speech of his unto the people, he chanced to commit an incongruity in grammer; then presently one of the Citizens who was fet there by to hear him, rose up, and with an audible and lond voice, pronounced that word aright, which he should have done: For the correction of this one sola-

Thus in saving the Greeks, he made semblant that he did all for his safety. An inhabitant of the little Isle Seriphos, said upon a time unto him by way of corn and reproach, that he was to famous, not for himfelfe, but in regard of the City of Athensywhereof he was a Citizen Thou faiest even true indeed (quoth Themistocles) to him.; for neither I if I were a Scriphian, nor thou if thou wert an Athenian could ever be renowned. Antiphates that faire boy, at the fifth disdained and avoided Themsstocles, being enamoured upon him; but afterwards when he per eived that he grew to great credit and reputation, he cameto seek him out, he flattered and sawned upon him; unto whom Themsfootes said: (f) My good youth, we have now more wit and are become wifer both of us I trow, although it be late first, Simonides the Poet, requested him to give judgement of his side in an unlawful and unjust cause; nut, simonaes the Poet, requested that to give judgenters or as the an annaviral an arrival and arrival table unto whom he made this answer: Neither were you, O Simonides, a good Poet or mufician, in case you sing against the rules of measures: Nor I a good Magistrate if I should judge against the lawes, He was wont to say unto a sonne that he had, who could make his mother do what him lift, and whom she made a wanton, that he was the mightiest person of all the Greeks: For why? (quoth he) the Athenians command all Greece befides; I command the Athenians; thy mother me, and thou thy mother. Two futers there were who wooed his daughter by way of marriage, and made meanes unto him for his good will; but he preferred the more honelt man before the richer; for he faid: Giveme a manthat wanteth goods rather then goods that want a man, He was to fell a piece of land that he had and gave order to the Crier who proclaimed the fale, to put in this and cry: That it had befides, good (r) neighbors neare unto it. When the Athenians being full of him, took pleasure to raise slanders and contumelious reproaches of him he said unto them. Why are you weary of receiving fo many good turns and services of the same persons? He was wont to say unto them: That he was like to thele great and broad plane trees, under the boughes whereof men are wont to runne and shroud themselves, when they are overtaken with a showre of raine or a tempest; but if the weather be faire they use to crop and firig the branches thereof, yea and revile it. He said unto the Eretrians in mockage that they relembled the two d-fishes for how soever they had blades and weapons enough yet hearts they had none Being banished out of Athens first, and afterwards out of all Greeces he retired himselse to the great King of Persia, where having audience given him to speak, he faid: That a mans speech might very well be likened unto clothes of rapestry, wrought with imagery and story work, for both the one and the other, if they be displaied and unfolded at length, difcover plainly and openly the figures drawn within; but if they be folded or rolled up, all the pourtraictures be hidden, and to no purpole: he requested therefore the tearm of a certein time, in which space he might learn the Persian language, to the end that from thenceforward he might be able to declare and deliver his own mind unto the King by himselfe, and not by a truch-man or interpreter. The King most honourably had bestowed upon him many rich presents; whereupon he quickly be-* As ill wind came exceeding wealthy, informuch as he would fay unto his fervirours about him: (n) My fonnes, that blewith we had been unterly undone for ever if we had not been undone. we had been utterly undone for ever, if we had not been undone, Myron des a Captaine generall of the Athenians, put himselfe into the field, purposing to make war upon the Brotians, having given commandement to thole of Athens for to follow him with their good of fame armies: but at the very point when they were ready to joine battell, certeine Centineirs came and brought him word that their men were not yet all come : Tush (quoth he) all those that are minded to fight are come already, and so leading those onely who were forward and resolute to serve, he encountered his enemies and won the honour of the day.

Aristides,

State by himselfe, who of set purpose avoided all banding, siding, and parts-taking of friends as being of opinion that authority (1) and credit gotten so, by the jugling practices and packing of the that are friends, did incite and move men in place of government to many bad courses and unjust proceedings. When the Athenians were affembled together in the general Councel, and horly fet to proceed unto that banishment which they called Oftrasifme: there was a certaine inde and russical indicat pefant, one that knew never a letter of the book, and could neither write nor read, came with a means like the his hand (as the manner was) unto Arifidei, and defired him to write within it the name of the there her then Ariffider: Why (quoth he) knowet thou Ariffider? Nay in good feath (quoth the clownish for) sood I ken him not, but ich am greeved to heare him called Just: Arifides answered him never a word. but wrote his own name within the shell, and gave it him againe. Being an enemy unto Themiftocles, and lent by the State together with him in emballage under one commillion; when they were gone as farre on their waysas to the attermost confines of Arrica Now (quoth he) to Themistocles, are you content that even hereupon the very limits of our countrey, we lay down and leave all our enmity (") and when we have performed our embassinge, and returned higher, we will take it to againe, if you think to good? After he had let down a certaine taxe to belevied dut of all Greece, and imposed upon every City what they strould pay, he () returned home poorer then he went, by and principle how much the charges came to by the way in his source, Asian the Poet had before time quarther. how much the charges came to by the way in his journey. Affolyling the Poet had before time written these verses in a certaine Tragedy as conching Amphiaraus:

He feeketh not to feem the very best, But for to be the best in word and deed, He sowed hath within his warthy brest, Infurrow deep all good and vertuous feed, Which yield beth linfe and fruit in feafon due, -1 I meane suge counsell joined with honour true.

which when they were rehearfed and pronounced in the open Theater, all the affiftance and audience, cast their eies upon Aristides.

Pericles whenfoever hee was chofen Captaine Generall, fo often as hee put on his rich coat of arms, was wont to fay unto himselse: Pericles take heed and look well about thee; thou goest forth now to command men of free condition, and those Greeks; yea, and that which is more, Athenians, A friend of his requested him, for his take to beare falle witnesse, where he was to bind the same also with an oath : You shall pardon me (quoth Perioles) I amyour friend indeed; but (7) so far only as the Altar, that is to fay, faving my conficience, and that I do not offend the gods. He periwaded forth in many the Athenians to take away the life Atims, which was a very eie-fore that troubled their Port of Haven Piraum. Lying at the point of death, and ready to yield up the ghoft, he was heard to say these last words: That he reputed himselfe happy, in that by his meanes there was never any one

Altibiades being yet a yong boy, chanced in wreftling to give another the vantage, to take fuch fure hold of him, that he could not well thist from him, and make the party leave his hold, infomuch as he made no more ado, but fet his teeth in his hand that held him: whereat the other tried; This is soule play, Alcibiades; bitest thou indeed as women do? No said he, but rather as lions do. Having a most beautifull and faire dog every way, which cost him seven hundred * drachmes, he cut off his raile quite: To the end (quoth be) that the Athenians may have matter to take of mee for my curtailed dog, and not otherwise busie themselves to search curiously into my doings any surther. He entred upon a time into a Grammar-school, and called unto the School-master for the Iliads of Homer: Who faid unto him that he had none of Homer's works; with that he gave him a box of the ear, and so passed by him and went his way. One day he knocked at Perioles his doore, and when answer was made him that he was not at leisure to be spoken with for that he studied and was amufed how to render up his accounts to the Athenians of their money: And were it not better for him (quoth he) to occupy his wits and cast about, not to yield them any account at all? Being called out of Sicily by the Athenians, and cited peremptorily to appeare and make his answer judicially in a criminall matter as much as his life was worth, he hid himlelfe and kept out of the way, faying: That he was a simple fool that would seek to quit himselse of a capitall crime, if he could otherwise avoid the tryall. And when one faid unto him, what, and will you not trust your own Countrey, and put your telleupon them, to be judged by them? No (quoth he) nor my own mother, for feare left ere the be aware, the thould upon an errour cast in a black beane for a white, and chance to fay guilty, for unguilty. Being advertised that himse se, together with his complices and adherents, were condemned by the Athenians to dye : Let us shew our selves (quoth hee) unto them that wee bee yet alive; and so he sided and banded with the Lacedemonians, and raised that war against the Athenians, which was called the Decelick warre.

Lamachus rebuked and checked a certaine Captaine of footmen, for some fault committed in his charge; and when the other said for himselse; That he would do no more so; he replied againe: Yea, but you must not (z) fault twise in warre.

Iphiorates became despited, for that he was taken to be a shoot-makers or cutriers son: but the mitted in was first reputation that hee won for valour and prowesse, was upon this, that when hee was himselse ble. wounded in fight, he feized upon his enemies body, and brought him perforce armed as hee was alive, out of his galley into his own. Being encamped in the land of his friends and confederates, yet neverthelesse he tortified his camp with a deep trench and high rampart round about very carefully: and when one faid unto him, what needs all this? and whom are we to feare? The worst speech (quoth he) that can come out of a Captaines mouth is this; Had I wift, or I never looked for such a thing. As he was putting his army in array, for to give battell unto the Barbarians; he faid that he feared nothing at all, but that they should not take knowledge of Iphicrates, whose very name and presence was enough to affright all their enemies. Being accused of a capitall crime, he said unto the Sycophant who had enformed and drawn a bill of enditement against him: Canst thou tell what thou dolt good fellow? when the City is environed with warre on every fide, thou perswades the people to confult about me, and not to take counsell with me. Harmodius (who was descended from the race of that antient and noble Harmodius) reproached him one day for his meane parentage, as being come from an house of base degree: The noblenesse (quoth hee) of my line beginneth in me, but thine endeth in thee. An Oratour making a folemne speech in the assembly of the people, grew to these tearms with him before them all: And what are you, six is we may be so bold as to know, that you beare your selfe so bigge, and think so well of your selfey, are you a man at armes ? are you an archer, a pike-man, or a foot-man? or what are you? I am not indeed (quoth he) any of thele; but he I am, who knowes how to command and direct all thele?

Timotheus had the name to be a fortunate Captaine, rather then otherwise a speciall warriour; and some who envied his good estate, shewed him a picture, wherein certaine Cities were entrapped, and of themselves fallen into the compasse of net and toile, whiles he lay asleep; whereupon he faid unto them: Consider now, if I can catch and take such Cities lying asleep, what shall I be able to do when I am awake? When one of these venturous and too forward Captaines, shewed upon a glorious bravery unto the Athenians, what a wound he had received upon his body: But I (quoth he) my selfe was (a) greatly abashed and ashamed one day, being your Captaine Generall before the City of Samos, that a shot discharged from the walls, light but neer unto me. When the Oratours highly praised and recommended Captaine Chares, saying: Lo what, a brave man is here to make the Generall of the Athenians, shewing his goodly personage. Timothem answered againe with a loud voice: Never say Generall, but, rather a good stout groom to carry the trusse of a Captaines bed-

Chabrias was wont to fay that they were the, best Captaines who had most intelligences of their enemies deligns and proceedings. Being accused together with Iphicrates of treason, he gave not over for all that, to frequent the publike place of exercises, and to take his dinner at his accustomed houres : and when Iphicrates rebuked him for being fo retchlesse, standing in such danger as he did; he answered him in this manner: In case the Athenians proceed against us otherwise than well, they shall put you to death, all soule and fasting, but mesull and faireclean washed, annointed, and having well dined. This was his ordinary speech: That an army of stags and hindes having a lion

Hege sppus surnamed Grobylus lolicited and incited the Athenians to take armes a gainst King Philip: and when one spake unto him aloud from out of the assembly: What, Sir, will you that we draw upon us war: Yea, verily (quoth he) and bring (b) in among us mourning robes, folemn and publike obsequies, yea, and sunerall orations too, if we desire to live free still, and not to be servile and subject to the Athenians.

Pytheas being but yet very young, presented himselfe one day in open place to cross and contradict the publike decrees which had paffed by the peoples voices, in the honour of King Alexander, what faith one unto him: Dare you prefume, so young as you are to speak of these so weighty matters? And why not (quoth he) leeing that Alexander whom you will needs make a god by your luffrages,

Phocion the Athenian was a man of so staied and constant behaviour, that hee was never seen of any person, eitherto laugh or weep. Upon a time in a great assembly of the City, one said unto him: You are very sad and pensive Phocion, it seemeth you are in a deep study. Guesse againe (quoth hee) and guesse worse; for I am indeed studying and devising with my selse, how I may cut off somewhat of that which I have to speake unto the Athenians. The Athenians understood by an oracle that they had one man among them in the City, who was thwatt and contrary to the opinion and advice of all others. Now when they caused diligent search and enquiry to be made for this fellow, and cried our upon him in great fury who foever he was: Phoeion flood up, and with a loud voice, I am the very man (quoth he) feek no further; for I am he (c) alone, who am nothing at all pleased with whatsoener the people either doth or say. One day when he had delivered his advice in a frequent affembly of the people, he pleafed the whole audience very well, and feeing that they all with one accord approved his speech, hee was abashed thereat, and turning towards his friends: What (quoth he) have I let fall and escaped some words that are not good, and otherwise than I meant? The Athenians were minded upon a time to solemnize a great and sestivall sacrifice; and for the better furnishing of this folemnity, they demanded of every man a contribution of money toward it:all others gave liberally, only Phocion after he had been called upon by name fundry times to do the like, in the end faid thus unto them: (d) I would bee abashed to give any thing (I trow) unto you, and not be able to pay him there, pointing with his finger to an uturer, thro whom he was indebted. When Demades faid unto him: The Athenians wil one of these daies kil thee, if they fall once into their furious fits: True indeed (quoth he) they will kill me in their mad mood, but thee they will put to death when they be come againe into their right wits. Arifogiton the lycophant or falle promoter, being condemned to death for troubling men with wrongfull imputation pnam of the point to be executed within the prilon, fent unto Phocion, requelting him for come and at the point to be executed within the prilon, fent unto Phocion is of the point to be executed within the prilon, fent unto Phocion's friends would not let him go to talk with such a lewd and wich and speak wheth the whole them in what place may honest men more willingly and better speake with Aristogiton? When the Athenians were highly offended and angry with the Bizantines, for that they would not receive into their City Captaine Chares, whom they had fest with a power to aid them against King Philip, Phocion, came among them, and faid: That they were not to bee displeased with their confederates for being mistrustfull, but rather with such Captaines as they mistrusted: upon which remonstrance of his, he was himselfe immediately chofen Captaine; who being admitted and well trusted by the Bizantines, desended them so valiantly against King Philip, that he forced him to raise his siege, and retire from thence without effeet. King Alexander the Great sent unto him a present of one hundred talents; but he demanded of the messengers that brought it, why the King their master sent unto sim alone, considering there were so many Athenians beside himselse; they answered : It was because he esteemed him to be the onely honest and vertuous man among them all: Why then (qubits he) could not be the me both to seem and also to be a good man still? Alexander upon a time demanded of the Atherican nians certeingallies; whereupon the people called unto Phocion by name, for to give his advice, and to counsell them what was best to be done in this case: then he stood up and said: My counfell unto you is this; That you make means either to be your felves the (e) ftronger in armes, of e la warm elle at the least wife friended by them who are mightier then you. When a brute was blazed abroad be strongest without any certaine author, that King Alexander the Great was deceased, the Oratonis at Athens or friended by the strong mounted the Pulpits by and by, and strave avie who could persivade the people most, even in all haste to put themselves in armes and rebell; (f) but Phocion was of a contrary minde to them all; hafte to put themleves in armes and recorn () Journ and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, untill more assured news cancer his transfer as the same his tread his transfer as the same his transfer as the same his transfe death: For (faith he) if he be dead to day, he will be so to morrow, yea; and afterwards also. When Leofthenes had fet the City all upon warre, feeding the peoples hearts with great hopes of recovering their freedome and the fovereignty of all Greece, Phocion compared these projects of theirs in dangerous (g) unto the Cypres trees: For they (quoth he) be faire, fireight and tall, but not a whit of fittit do they beare: howbeit, when the Athenians at the first speed well in fundry battels and wartise field, whereupon the City made artifices unto the gods for the good newes thereof, some would come unto him, and fay: How now Phocion, areyou not pleased herewith? and would you wish all undone againe? I am (b) contented very well (quoth he) that it hath fo fallen out, but yet I repent ha wife man never a whit of my former countell. The Macedonians immediately after this, made rodes into the willout re-Countrey of Attica, and began to over-run, harry and spoile all the sea coasts: for remedy Countrey of Attica, and began to over-run, harry and spoile all the sea coasts: for remedy goodcounte, whereof, he caused all the lusty men of the City, who were of age to beare arms, to enter into image and though the the field; and when many of them came running unto him; some calling upon him to seize faith an wear bear hill, others as instant with him to put his men in battel-ray in such a place: O Hercules (quoth fie) wherea. what a number of Captaines do I fee, and how few good fouldiers? howbeit, he gave the enemies battell, wan the victory, and flew Nicion the Captaine Generall of the Macedonians in the place. Not long after, the Athenians being vanquished in warre, were reflrained to receive a garrison from Antipater, and Menillus Captaine of the laidgarrison fent unto him in free gift, certeine money; wherewith he being offended, faid: That neither Menilla was better then Alexander, nor the cause so good, for which he should take any gift at his hand at this present considering that he refused the like from Alexander. Moreover, Antipater was wont to say: That he had two friends at Athens, the one of whom, to wit, Phosion, he could never perswade to take any thing; and the other, who was Demades, he could not fatisfie whatfoever he gave him. When Animater was in hand with him to do a thing that was not just: (i) Youcannot (quoth he) O Anipater, have if the him and that me to be your friend and a flatterer too. After the death of Antipater, when the Athenians had recoeer, will not vered their liberty and free state or popular government, concluded it was, and pronounced image-futered nerall affembly and counsell of the people, that Photon together with his friends and afforties must suffer death: as for the rest they went weeping and lamenting as they were led to execution, but Phocion marched gravely, and gave not a word: now as he was going upon the way, one of his enemies met him and sper upon his face; whereupon he turned back to the Magistrates, and said; Is there no man here to represe the infolency and villary of this wretched variet? one of them who were to fuffer with him, took on and tormented himselfe exceedingly: What (quoth he to him) O Exippies, (k) doth it not thee good that thou goeft to take thy death with Photion? And when the deadly kit is an hor he had any more to fay, or no: then addressing his speech unto his sonne: I charge thee (quoth he) and beseech thee, not to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the heart to the son to carry any rancor and malice in the son to carry and the son to carry a

Pifistratus, a Tyrant of the Athenians, being advertised that some of his strends having revolted and conspired against him, had seiled upon the Fort called Phyle, went towards them carrying himselse about at his back, a sardell of his bedding, and the furniture thereto belonging whereupon they demanded of him what hee would? I come (quoth hee) with an intent either to perfwade you to returne with mee, or elfe with a resolution to tarry here with you my selfe; and therefore have I brought my baggage with me. He was advertised that his mother loved a young man, who fecretly kept her and uled to lie with her; howbeit in great fear, and refusing her company many times; whe eupon he invited the man to supper, and after supper he asked him how he did, and how he liked his enterteinment? Gaily well (quoth he) Thou shalt (quoth Pifistratus) find no worse every day to thou content and please my mother. Thrasis ulus cast a good liking and fancy to his daughter; and as he met her one time upon the way, bestowed a kisse upon her; whereat her mother was offended, so as she exasperated her husband against him for it : but he mildly anfwered her in this wife: Why woman, if we fet our felves against them that love us and grow to malice them, what shall we do to those who hate us? and to he gave the maiden in marriage to Thrafibulus. Certeine lutty yonkers, after they had taken their cups well, went in a maske and plaid the fools through the City, and chancing to meet with his wife, abused her both in word and deed very unfeemly and dishoneltly; but the morrow after they came weeping before Pifistratus, acknowledging their fault, and craving pardon; who made them this answer: As for you, endevour to mA wife man will are be more wife and fober from hence forth: (m) but I affure you, my wife yellerday went no whiteheads and fober from hence forth: (m) but I affure you, my wife yellerday went no whiteheads and in the heads of the respective file. When he was about to marry a fecond wife; the children whom he had by the former demanded of the material of the respective file. credit of his dren whom he had by the former, demanded of him, whether he were in any respect disconten-wife whather ted with them, that he should in despight of them espouse another: No, (quoth he) that is the least of my thought; but clean contrary it is, because I like and love you so well, I would willingly have more children to refemble you.

Of Lattda.

Demetrius, furnamed Phaleress, counselled King Ptolomaus to buyand read those books which treated of pollicy and government of Kingdomes and Seigniories; for that which Courtiers and minions durst not lay unto their Princes, was written within those books.

Lycurgus who did fer down and establish the lawes of the Lacedamonians, accustomed his Citizens to weare their haire long: For that (laith he) fide haire maketh those who are faire, seem more faire and amiable; but those who were foule, more hideous and terrible. In the reformation of the Lacedemonians State, some one there was who perswaded him to erect the popular govertiment called Democraty, wherein every one in his course hath as much authority as another: unto whom he answered: Begin thou first to set up this government in thine own house. Hee ordefined that in building of houses thereshould be used nothing but the saw and the axe: For that (quoth he) it were a shame to bring into houses so simply builded, any plate of silver and gold, rich hangings, carpets and furniture of beds, or costly and sumptuous tables. He forbad his Citizensto fight at buffets, or to enter combat in that generall exercise of hand, toot, teeth, and all together, Called Pancratium, to the end that they should not accustome themselves so much as in sport and game rofaint, give over, or yeeld themselves overcome. Likewise hee debarred them from encountring often with their very enemies; for feare they should make them more warlike and better fouldiers: Wherenpon afterwards when King Agefilaus was brought out of the battell very grievoilly wounded; one Amalcida faid unto him: You have met with a faire reward at the Thebans hand, and no leffe than you well deferve for schooling and teaching them to fight whether they will or no.

Charillus the King, being asked the question why Lycurgus made so few lawes? answered thus: That they who nied few words, had no need of many lawes. One of those slaves whom they call Elotes, had behaved himselfe somewhat too insolently and knavishly against him: Now I sweare by the two twins (quoth he) Cafter and Pollux, were I not angry, I would do thee to death out of hand. Unto one who demanded the reason why the Lacedamonians weare long haire It is (quoth

he) because of all trimming and ornaments of the body, it costeth least. Telechus King of Lacedamon answered unto a brother of his, who complained unto him of the Citizens of Sparta, faying: They use memore uncivily and uncourseously, than they do you: It is for nothing else (quoth he) but because you know not how to endure and put up any wrongs.

Theopompus being in a certein City, was shewed by one of the inhabitants the wals, and demanded whether he thought them not to be faire and high: Faire (quoth he?) no in very truth, kept though they be by none but women.

Archimidamus during the time of the Peloponnelian warre, when as the allies and confederates of Lacedamon requested him to let them down a certain taxe and rate which they were to contribute toward the charges thereof; answered them in this manner: War knoweth not how to be gaged and feed within the teddar.
